Mr. BUTTON said those honourable members who desired to see publichouses put upon the same footing as other shops should not miss this opportunity of having that done. If there were two provisions in different Acts inconsistent with each other it was very advisable that one should be struck out, but in this case there was no inconsistency, and he was sure the country would be very much pleased indeed to see the provision in both Bills.

Mr. McNAB desired to point out that the Licensing Act did not contain all the provisions relating to publichouses, and therefore he did not see the inconsistency of including this provision in this Bill. It was a remarkable thing that the licensing-law was the only law as to which, if you wanted to get at the complete law, you had to go to the Lunatics Act. A hotel certainly had as great a relation to a shop as, for instance, had banking offices, insurance offices, and commercial offices.

Mr. R. McKENZIE said there was no need for licensed houses being included in a Shop-hours Bill. He could quite understand that his honourable friend the member for the Grey was somewhat sore at having lost his pet clause. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) interrupted him, and said it was not lost. He quite admitted it was not lost, because he believed it would be included in the Licensing Bill. That was the proper Bill in which to insert such a provision; and, if it was included in that Bill, to take effect at the expiration of the present licenses, he would be prepared then to consider whether to support it or not. The senior member for Wellington City knew very well that it could not be brought into force until the present licenses had expired.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said the honourable member for the Buller was always inconsistent. He had been returned to that House pledged to the Prohibitionists, and was returned on the Prohibitionist ticket.

Mr. R. McKENZIE.—You were.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said No, he was not. He was not the Prohibitionist candidate at the election, yet he was elected to represent a Prohibitionist constituency. Now, the honourable member for the Buller was inconsistent, inasmuch as he voted to close Bellamy's for seven days in the week, yet he would not vote to close hotels for one half-day in the week. Speaking for his own district, he might say that the hotelkeepers there would hail with delight the circumstances which would require them to close one half-day only in the week. He supported either the absolute closing of all places of business once a week or else no closing at all. That was the position which he had taken up from the first. That was a position which the Minister of Labour agreed with, and he expected to see the honourable gentleman in the same lobby with himself when the division took place presently.

Mr. O'REGAN said, with regard to the question of applying the compulsory half-holiday to hotels, he thoroughly agreed with those honourable members who had said that legislation affecting hotels should be provided in the Licensing Bill. Speaking for the constituency which he represented, the position was simply this: that if the Bill was so amended that it would apply to hotels it would not be operative. It was impossible to make the Bill operative in a scattered district like his. Of course he was not speaking with regard to city constituencies. It seemed to him ridiculous to contend that, if they closed shops, the inmates would make straight away for the nearest publichouse. He thought they ought to trust the good sense of the shop-assistants in that matter. There was altogether too great a tendency nowadays to try to make people virtuous by Act of Parliament, which, to his mind, was an impossibility. He was talking recently to some publicans in this city, and they assured him that, under the law as it stood at present, they did no increased business on the half-holiday. When shop-assistants and others got their holidays they were only too eager to go out into the country, or otherwise enjoy themselves, rather than go into publichouses. He thought they should trust the people in this respect, and allow them to enjoy themselves just as they pleased. He hoped, therefore, that this matter would be deferred until they had before them the Licensing Bill.

Mr. EARNSHAW might point to the case of chemists, whose shops were included in this Bill, and who were carrying on a trade as nearly like as possible to that of publichouses—that was, whether you viewed the sale of liquor as a drug or as a beverage. If they were determined to bring chemists' shops under this Bill, and were determined that chemists should close half a day a week, he failed to see why they should not deal with publichouses in this Bill, and why they should not compel them to close half a day a week. If the working-men were to succeed in this country, he thought it would only be by putting down the liquor-traffic, or closing it up as much as they possibly could. Closing the hotels for half a day a week was, in his opinion, worth more than half a dozen labour Bills put on the statute-book. He was hopeless of any real reform of labour in New Zealand, or any other country, so long as this other trade was allowed to run side by side with it. Therefore he would support this provision being put in this Bill, or any other Bill. If all matters connected with the liquor-traffic should be dealt with in the Licensing

Mr. T. Mackenzie

Bill, then provisions for the closing of chemists and druggists' shops should be placed in the Chemists and Druggists Act. The Premier was very adroit in his remarks as to dealing with this question in the Licensing Bill. But the honourable gentleman did not say that the Government would support such a provision being inserted in the Licensing Bill. Those who really believed that hotels should be closed for half a day in the week would determine that the barmaid should have a half-holiday in the week. He trusted that the time would soon come when they would determine that there should be no barmaids at all in New Zealand. He thought they should maintain the advantage they had got, and he would vote to keep this in the Bill.

Mr. COLLINS said he was not present in the House when this clause was inserted in the Bill, but if he had been he most certainly would have voted against it. To his mind, the clause had no business in a Bill of this kind. If it should be inserted in any Bill at all it should be in the Licensing Bill. He had endeavoured to take an impartial and just view of this matter, without any prejudice or proclivity of his own, and he thought one or two of the arguments advanced by honourable members were of a fallacious character. It had been asked, Why should not publichouses come under the same rules and regulations as shops generally? In the first place, shopkeepers did not have to pay £40 a year as a license-fee, which hotelkeepers had to pay. It was therefore quite unjust to interfere with licenses unless they made some corresponding reduction in the license-fees. And, next, the real crux of the question was that refreshment-rooms selling beverages which those who had temperance proclivities were able to indulge in were actually exempted from the operation of the Bill. A man might go to a temperance refreshment-room and get a cup of tea or coffee, but a man who wanted refreshment of another kind was to be prevented from getting on that one afternoon of the week what he required. This was class legislation of the worst character. It was totally unfair that one section of the community should be subject to one class of legislation and another to another class. It would not make the slightest difference to him personally if hotels were closed every day of the week. As a matter of strict justice it appeared to be manifestly unfair that, because a man happened to require a different kind of refreshment from what he (Mr. Collins) took himself, he should be subjected to a rule he (Mr. Collins) was not subject to. He considered it tyranny that, because a man could not take a particular kind of refreshment, he should be prevented from taking any refreshment at all. As a matter of impartial justice he thought that they should not agree to the amendment.

Mr. MEREDITH said the speech they had just listened to was of the most extraordinary character. The honourable member might just as well say he could not support any portion of the Bill, as every clause was of a coercive character. He did not question for a moment the right of the Minister of Labour to go before any Committee of the Legislature with a view of expressing his opinions on any measure before that Committee, but he did object to the Minister of Labour, who had strenuously opposed this particular clause when being debated by the House, carrying that opposition before a Committee of the Council after the House had adopted the clause, and influencing the Committee contrary to the wishes of the majority of this House. That was the point. It appeared to him that the Minister, in trying to make out that a liquor-shop or a hotel was not strictly a shop, was absurd. It was a distinction without a difference. If a settler in the country, in the midst of harvest, with his crops dead ripe and in danger of being destroyed by wind, had his machine broken and wanted a casting, a tradesman could not sell that casting. If the tradesman did so he would be subject to a fine of £5; but the same man could on the same afternoon spend as much money as he pleased in drink at a hotel. There were about fourteen hundred hotels in the colony at the present time, in which were employed, at a low estimate, about seven thousand persons, and he thought the seven thousand persons so employed were entitled to consideration. Several publicans had spoken to him on this question, and they agreed that it was an act of cruelty for the Legislature to compel them by law to keep their houses open and their employes at work seven days in the week. His attention had been drawn to this matter again and again by hotelkeepers.

Mr. W. KELLY.—Oh!

Mr. MEREDITH said the honourable member for the Bay of Plenty knew very well that hotelkeepers were compelled to supply liquor to travellers, and also to boarders in their houses. Therefore hotelkeepers were compelled to be there all day, and to supply liquor on Sundays; they had no time off duty, but had to keep the business going from Sunday morning to Saturday night. He thought a feeling of commiseration should lead the House, quite apart from the teetotal aspect of the question, to give those employed in hotels the same opportunity of having an outing with their families as other folk. He could not see that there was anything wrong in insisting that the words compelling hotels to close on the same afternoon as other shops should be reinstated in the Bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS hoped that the House would not be led away, by any side-wind which the Minister of Education had raised, to serve the interests of the liquor-sellers on this important question. The House had done the right thing, at the right time, and in the right place, when they refused to make the exceptions which the Minister had asked them to make in this Bill in favour of shops which were the last that should receive any exceptional treatment in their favour. It was the Minister of Labour who wanted them to go out of the way and to make a highly-improper exception in this Bill in favour of the most dangerous trades and the most dangerous shops they were called on to deal with. All that the temperance party proposed was that these dangerous shops should be treated in exactly the same way as all other shops. Why should the owners of shops in which bread, meat, groceries, and other wholesome and harmless things were sold be compelled to close, whilst the Legislature went out of its way to insist that shops offering a dangerous temptation, under which a certain proportion of those exposed to that temptation had always fallen, should be kept open? Far better that none of the shops should be closed than that we should first of all insist that our young people should leave their ordinary employment and then that these dangerous, and too often fatal, traps should be left open to allure them to destruction. He found no fault with the Minister of Labour for any efforts he might make to get the Legislative Council to conform to the wishes of the House, but he found great fault with him when he used his utmost efforts to get a Council, whose dangerous interference with the House he had always condemned so strongly, to set aside what the House had accomplished in removing temptations from the labouring-class, whom he ought to be protecting. The Minister of Labour had taken up a position in that House which was absolutely unique. No other Minister of Labour in any other part of the world would be found pretending to watch over the interests of the labouring-classes and yet constantly advocating, with far greater zeal, the interests of the liquor-sellers, who did so much in every part of the world to lessen the comforts and to lower the position of the toiling classes. John Burns and most of the great leaders of the labouring-classes in Great Britain, America, and Germany were also honoured leaders in every temperance reform, and there was no instance in which they were not watching to remove the dangers of alcohol as far as possible from the path of those in whose true interests they were labouring. All the other leaders of labour organizations he had ever heard of admitted that alcoholic drinks were the greatest enemies of the working-classes, and, without exception, they were doing everything they possibly could to withhold from the working-classes the greatest and most fatal temptation to which they were exposed. Such was the position the honourable member occupied in the House, and it was a very unfortunate position, and one which he was certain would lead him not only to oppose what they had already done, but it would cause him equally to oppose this principle being inserted in the Licensing Bill. That being the case, he hoped the House would not be misled by any efforts to make out that this was the wrong place in which to introduce a right thing. This was not a wrong place, and he hoped the House would not stultify itself by repealing a principle they had passed which would be of so much advantage to the country.

Mr. FLATMAN would like to suggest a compromise. He thought, if the Minister was prepared to allow this part of the clause to pass in the Bill, they should agree to transferring it to the Licensing Bill if the latter passed.

Mr. HALL-JONES thought the suggestion of the last speaker was an admirable one. The whole of this difficulty had arisen because the Minister had failed to grasp the proper aspect of the question—that all places should be closed or none at all. If he had proposed that, he would have been supported by a majority of the House. With regard to the clause now under discussion, he could not approve of the action the honourable gentleman had taken. This addition to the clause was not moved by the honourable gentleman, nor was it supported by him, but when it had been placed in the Bill it was his duty as representing the majority of the House to insist that it should be retained in the Bill. The question was, whether they were to have a Government or a majority of the House ruling, or whether the Minister was to carry out his own sweet will on any question. The question had been raised as to whether this was the right place to insert this clause, and it had been said that a hotel was not a shop. What was the definition of a shop in the Bill? He would read it: “‘Shop’ means any building, or portion of a building, or place where any person works for hire, and in which goods are exposed or offered for sale by retail.” Was it not a fact that goods were exposed for sale in hotels? There was clearly no distinction between a shop and a hotel according to the interpretation clause of the Bill. If a hotel was not a shop, why was a coffee-house a shop? Coffee-houses had been held to be shops, because they were placed among the exemptions. He was very much surprised at the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Collins) talking about the injustice that hotelkeepers would suffer by having to pay a license-fee of £40 and then having to close for one half-day in the week. Shopkeepers had to pay their rents, and many of them had entered into long leases, and the rents for their shops were sometimes exceedingly heavy, and yet under this Bill they were compelled to close. There was no greater injustice in the case of hotelkeepers than in the case of shops.

4.30. Mr. G. J. SMITH had not intended to speak on this question at all. He had intended to register his vote as he had done on previous occasions, for he thought they had debated the question very fully, and, as several other amendments were to be agreed to or disagreed with, the sooner they got to them the better. But the honourable member for Pareora had referred to him by name, and said he believed he (Mr. Smith) would not shake his head if he waited to hear what he had to say. He was not aware of the compromise the honourable gentleman was about to suggest, otherwise he would have supported it. He had a rooted aversion to compromises unless he could see that he was getting something very substantial by giving way. Now, the principle running through this Bill was a half-holiday for the employés, and he could not see a difference between a shop which retailed goods, such as bread, sugar, meat, or drapery, and a shop which retailed liquor. The definition given in the Bill was this: “‘Shop’ means any building, or portion of a building, or place where any person works for hire, and in which goods are exposed or offered for sale by retail”; and he contended that the bar of a hotel came within that meaning. So far as the payment of the license-fee was concerned, and the kind of privilege they had of selling liquor on the Sunday, that was taken away from them in England, no compensation being given or reduction made, and he did not see, so far as that was concerned, that there was any argument in it at all. They had here in this Bill, and, in fact, in most of the Bills passed by the House, provisions that were of a restrictive character. The Legislature by this Bill interfered with rights and privileges for the good of the community as a whole. They said shopkeepers should close their shops on a particular day; but when they sought to make it apply to this particular trade they were met with the cry that they were passing class legislation. They did not propose to close the hotel; they proposed to close the hotel-bar, or the shop of the hotel; and he hoped the House would insist that the alteration made by the Legislative Council should not be agreed to. He hoped members of the House would remember the vote they gave on a previous occasion, and would stand by their honest convictions.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL was entirely in favour of this amendment being disagreed with. He thought that the principle which underlay this Bill had been clearly stated by the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. G. J. Smith), and he did not think there was any class in the community so hard-worked as were the employés in the publichouses. They worked early and late; and if it was necessary to provide a holiday for those who were engaged in shops, and who now worked, on an average, seven or eight hours a day, it was very much more necessary that those employed in hotels should have this small concession. He felt fortified in asking for this provision by the new clause, 16A, which had been inserted in the Bill, and which, he presumed, was not objected to by the Minister. This provided that clerks in offices were to have the half-holiday. It was an entirely new departure in this Bill; and therefore he was justified in insisting on employés in hotels being placed on the same footing as those in shops or offices. With regard to what had been said as to the Licensing Bill being the proper place for it, if there was any reasonable prospect of the Licensing Bill becoming law, then they might be justified in allowing this Bill to pass, with the assurance of the Government that they would put the clause in the other Bill. But the Government were not prepared to give an assurance to this effect. All they were prepared to say was that the House would have an opportunity of inserting it in that Bill when it came on. But at this late period of the session there was comparatively little prospect of the Licensing Bill becoming law this year. The sooner they accepted the position the better; and, that being the case, it became their duty to insist that this concession to hotel employes should remain where it was.

Mr. CARNCROSS said the attention of those who voted with the Ministry, particularly those who approved of the Council's amendment, ought to be directed to the division which was taken when the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison) moved that these words should be put in. As far as his recollection served him, every vote of the Opposition except one vote was in favour of the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman. Now, they all knew very well that those honourable gentlemen were not in favour of this Bill, and therefore the only reason for their voting for the clause was to make the Bill still more unpopular than it was in its original form. It was not their idea to help the Minister or the Bill. Their whole idea was to kill the Bill if they could. That being so, he thought the Minister was perfectly right in the stand he had taken. Although he (Mr. Carncross) did not appreciate the Bill very much, still he felt it right to vote with him on this occasion.

Mr. STEVENS said a great deal had been said with respect to this proposal for the rejection of the amendment made by the Legislative Council, and he understood from the discussion which he had heard that every member who spoke in favour of the retention of this provision did so for the purpose of placing hotel employes on the same footing and giving them the same rights and privileges as the employes of shops of other kinds. Now, the position was this, and he had it from the very best authority: that if the employes in hotel-bars, whether male or female, were brought under the Shops and Shop-assistants Bill they would be required to work at least eighteen hours longer than they were required to work under existing circumstances, and that the salaries or wages which they would receive would be at least 25 per cent. less; and, such being the case, he took it that those honourable gentlemen who were endeavouring to do a kindness to a section of the community in this colony were doing them the greatest possible injury by retention of the words which had been rejected by the Legislative Council. He therefore would point out the fact that those honourable gentlemen who were so assiduous in the protection of that section of the community, who required no protection other than that which they got honestly and fairly from their employers, were only speaking theoretically, without any practical knowledge of the subject which they were discussing. They were speaking for the purpose of endeavouring to prevent the consumption of liquor in this colony. If every honourable gentleman in the House, and every one desirous of preventing the consumption of liquor in this country, would take this stand they would have his right hand and support: If they closed the ports of New Zealand against the importation of liquor, if they closed the distilleries, and closed every means of introducing liquor into this colony, he said that would be a practical and businesslike way in which to go about it.

But those honourable gentlemen who wished to pose as the great reformers on the liquor question were merely clipping off the twigs of the trees—clipping the twigs off the old oak with the idea that they were going to kill it. But the closing of the bars on an afternoon was not going to do it; and if honourable gentleman would do what he suggested they would have his support. He had always advocated it. He did not think that any good service or purpose could be achieved by deriving a revenue from that which a considerable section of the community said was not good for the population of this or any other country; and therefore let them come down, and let those strong and great advocates of the temperance cause make up their minds in a businesslike manner, and in a practical way say, "We are about to do this: We are about to introduce a measure for the purpose of making it criminal to import intoxicating liquor into this colony, or to manufacture liquor in this colony." Then the question would be as easy, as they said in bush parlance, as "rolling off a log." But no; they had not the courage of their opinions, because it would interfere very largely and very greatly with their material good, and it was necessary for their existence and well-being to benefit by the revenue derived therefrom. Now, he could assure honourable gentlemen that if they were going to retain this clause, which was struck out in another place, instead of doing justice to those whom they wished to protect they might be doing them grave and gross injustice. He was saying this from information which he was positive was conclusive, because it was information obtained from the very best source; and he said, in these matters as well as in others, that many honourable gentlemen spoke on these matters who had not had the opportunity of ascertaining what the facts were. He thought this question might be deferred until next session, and a Parliamentary Committee could take the evidence of both hotel employers and hotel employes, and find out whether hotels could be or should be placed on the same footing as a grocer's or a draper's shop. Under the existing law, with respect to the eight-hours system, or that which was considered to be the eight-hours system, every employe in every establishment that was not a hotel, whether a male or a female employe, must be there at the stroke of eight o'clock in the morning, and had to remain until noon, and be back again at one o'clock. The question now being discussed was for the purpose of determining whether it was right or wrong that hotel employes should be placed on the same footing as all other employes. It was contended by honourable gentlemen who had spoken on this subject that the reason why hotel employes should be placed on the same footing as all other employes was that they required, and it was just they should have, the same privileges. Now, he said this: that during the week hotel employes had about eighteen hours' more privilege than the majority of employes in any other business. That was what he wished to point out in connection with the matter now being discussed. If honourable gentlemen questioned that, he could bring the best proof to show that his statements were correct on this point. The arguments of honourable gentlemen who were so extremely anxious to protect that class of the community who were employed in hotels were purely fallacious, and they were doing the hotel employes an injury instead of a benefit by the course they were pursuing.

Mr. DUTHIE said he was opposed to the introduction of this clause at the time it was brought forward in the House, and he would again support the Minister on the point. It seemed to him that in dealing with the half-holiday question there were three sections connected with it. In the Factories Act the workpeople were dealt with, so in this Shops and Shop-assistants Bill the class of shop-assistants should be dealt with. In like manner, the proper place to deal with this question of hotel-bars being closed on the half-holiday was in the Licensing Bill. He thought it was very much to be regretted that those prohibition members should seek to insert and discuss clauses that ought not to appear in the Bill now under discussion. Let them deal with prohibition in the proper place. This measure was not the place to deal with it.

Mr. McLACHLAN said he generally supported the measure for the half-holiday, but he thought the temperance party were going a little too far in trying to compel hotelkeepers to absolutely close their hotels on the half-holiday.

Sir R. STOUT.—Only the bars.

Mr. McLACHLAN said this restriction would be a great inconvenience to travellers. What right had the Prohibitionists to say that a man should not get a drink if he paid for it? What right had they to say that travellers had no right to get what they liked, whether it was beer, tea, or coffee? He would vote against any measure to deprive people of what they ought to have in ordinary life. The senior member for Wellington City could take tea or coffee; and he did take a great quantity of it, there was not the slightest doubt about that. It would be an injustice to compel hotels to absolutely close for half a day in order to meet the wishes of a number of fanatics.

Mr. MASLIN was pleased to hear some of the remarks of the honourable member for Rangitikei, especially in respect to colonial prohibition. There was one thing very certain—that those who believed in local prohibition believed in colonial prohibition, and they would try as far as possible to educate the public up to their idea of things, and as soon as public opinion was ripe for the movement they would be prepared to take the necessary step in that direction. He was glad that when the Licensing Bill came up, and when the question of colonial prohibition was before the House, they would have the honourable member for Rangitikei voting for a clause in the Bill to give the people an opportunity to vote on the question of colonial prohibition. He was much astonished at some of the honourable gentleman's arguments, especially those in regard to employes in hotel-bars. He thought, if any one class required a half-holiday more than another, it was these persons. If they were employed for seventeen hours—from six in the morning till eleven at night—in the unhealthy atmosphere of a hotel-bar, it was a good reason why they should have one half-day to themselves to get a little fresh air. He did not see why the hotel-bars should not be included in the closing proposals of this Bill, because, as had been already pointed out, the Bill prevented persons from getting the necessities of life on the half-holiday; and why, therefore, should it not restrict them from getting the luxuries of life on that particular day? He believed if this exemption were allowed it would have a very demoralising effect, especially in country towns. The labouring-men were working out in the country the greater part of the week, and came home on Saturday night, and, if the Saturday half-holiday were adopted, what would be the spectacle? Every shop would be closed except shops which would be open for the sale of liquor; and these hotel-bars were nothing but man-traps. If he could close a man-trap he would endeavour to do so with all his might. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) tried to point out that the Licensing Bill was the place in which to make this provision for the closing of hotel-bars, because they did not come under the definition of a shop. He thought they should have two strings to their bow. A bar was as much a shop as were places in which they sold boots or anything else. They sold bottles of whiskey. Why should there be a distinction between selling a bottle of whiskey and selling a bottle of pickles? How could it be said that a place in which a bottle of whiskey was sold was not a shop? The member for Christchurch City (Mr. Collins) said injustice would be inflicted upon hotelkeepers, on the ground that they paid £40 a year for their licenses. The Legislative Council had introduced a clause by which the clerks of auctioneers, who also paid £40 a year for their licenses, must have a half-holiday. He quite agreed that they should; but, if auctioneers had to close their business places for half a day in order to give their employes the benefit of this holiday, why should there be any objection to the hotelkeeper closing his bar on the ground that he had paid for a license? Auctioneers paid for a license also, and, notwithstanding that fact, this Bill proposed that they should give their employes a half-holiday. He hoped the House would vote for the retention of this clause in the Bill.

Mr. Stevens

Mr. REEVES said he should not reply at any length to the remarks that had been made during the course of the discussion, because he believed that every honourable member had made up his mind as to how he intended to vote on this question. For himself, if he agreed with some honourable gentlemen that public-houses were places where poisons were retailed for the destruction of the human race, then he, like other honourable gentlemen holding that view of the matter, would of course vote with the senior member for Wellington City. But, as he merely looked upon hotels as places in which refreshments could be obtained, he would vote against that honourable gentleman. He and others had no doubt that alcohol taken in moderation was hurtful to nobody—in fact, for many people it was a good thing; and honourable members who took that view of the case would vote for having public-houses open on every afternoon in the week, just as they would vote for keeping every refreshment place open every afternoon. With regard to the attacks made upon him, these attacks reminded him of old times, especially during last Parliament, when so many onslaughts were made upon him in connection with his labour legislation; but he fought all those attacks out, and he got his Bills through, and he should fight the matter out again this Parliament if necessary. With regard to the tone adopted by the honourable member for the Grey, he had only to say the honourable member and himself belonged to the same party, they were usually on friendly terms, and they usually agreed with each other, but he thought the honourable gentleman might have expressed his views without adopting a tone quite so disagreeable or a manner quite so noisy. However, that was for the honourable gentleman to consider, not for him (Mr. Reeves). Then, with regard to the remarks of the honourable member for Selwyn, that honourable gentleman, of course, occupied a different position from that of Mr. Guinness. He was older than he (Mr. Reeves)—in fact, older than most of the members in that House. This was the sixth consecutive occasion upon which, without the slightest provocation, the honourable gentleman had made a personal attack upon him. Why he did not know. He should, however, not forget the member for Selwyn's age and venerable position, and should, therefore, neither reply to his attack of that afternoon, nor to any subsequent attack he might make during the session.

5.0. With regard to the attack that had been made upon him because he had gone before a Committee of the Upper House and made a general statement with regard to the Bill, he had frequently done so, and would do so whenever he got the opportunity again in regard to any Bill of which he might be in charge, or in which he might be interested. He only wished that, instead of only having the chance of going before a Committee of another place, he could have the chance of going before the Council as a whole. It would be an excellent reform if Ministers, who drew Bills up, and made a special duty of forwarding them, and who debated them and supported them in the House, were able to go before the Council and take charge of them there. That was the one good point in the Elective Executive Bill brought before the House by the honourable member for Waimate; it was the one thing he would willingly and cheerfully have seen passed into law, and it was one thing he would always support and advocate if ever he had the opportunity of doing so. He would like to know what would have become of some of the clauses of some of his Bills if he had not taken the trouble to go before Committees in another place and explain them there, and if he had not given the members of those Committees such information and special knowledge as he had with regard to those clauses. It was virtually impossible that Ministers in another place, who had not only to take charge of some five or six Bills which they had made a special study of, but of all the Government Bills—often on the very shortest notice—could have that special knowledge with regard to many points of those Bills that the Ministers who had special charge of them in the House possessed. He made no reflection on his colleagues, who did their work thoroughly, conscientiously, and industriously; but he thought the reform he spoke of would be a most excellent one, and he would support it whenever he had a chance. As regarded the charge that he had taken a special interest in the labour Bills, and that he was not satisfied to get them through the House and fling them on to the Council, and let them take their chance and live or die there—instead of that being a cause for blame, it was a thing of which he was justly proud, and for which he thought the labouring-classes would thank him in days to come. He would not be true to the trust reposed in him if he did not make every effort to get all the labour Bills passed not only in the House, but in another place, and put on the statute-book, or if he did not do his utmost to get them passed in the form which he considered best. It was stated that the clause in question was passed by the House by a majority; whereas it was passed by the casting-vote of the Chairman, who stated that he voted in favour of it in order to give opportunity for further consideration.

Sir R. STOUT.—Which it has not got.

Mr. REEVES said it had received consideration in another place.

Sir R. STOUT said that was not the point.

Mr. REEVES said, Well, it was getting further consideration in the House now. If it had been thrown out it would not have got that further consideration. That was a complete answer to that charge. He did not intend to be dictated to by any member as to what he did in order to get his Bills on the statute-book; if the majority thought he did wrong they could punish him by removing him from his position; but he would not take the dictation of any individual member as to his action in getting Bills on the statute-book after they had passed the House. He would do what he thought to be best, as he had done in the past. It was said this clause must be in its proper place in the Bill if such a section as the clause relating to banks and offices was in. If there were a Bill dealing specially with the hours to be observed by banks, and if that Bill were coming before the House in a few days to be amended and passed, he would say there was a special reason for not putting a clause in this present Bill; but, as there was no possibility of insuring a half-holiday or shorter hours to bank-clerks unless by provision in this Bill, they were justified in putting a clause in this Bill. If there were a Bill dealing with the hours to be observed by chemists and druggists, and if it were before the House, he would say they were justified in removing the clause relating to druggists which was in this Bill to that measure. But, as there was nothing of the sort, the clause was in its proper place in this Bill. The honourable gentleman said that paid employes in hotel bars had as much right to a holiday as others. He entirely agreed with that. There was a clause in the Bill to give them that half-holiday—not this clause. It was said this clause, if retained, would not injure the Shop-assistants Bill. He thought it would. He believed it would have a strong tendency to prevent Saturday from being adopted as the universal half-holiday throughout the colony. If publicans were compelled to shut up on the half-holiday, it meant that the publicans, who were a very powerful element in the municipalities, would use every effort to have the day on Wednesdays or Thursdays, and not Saturdays, because they would not want to close on Saturdays, of all days. That was one reason why the clause should not be inserted in the Bill. He was quite justified in keeping to labour Bills pure and simple. He was not there to argue as to the principle whether publichouses should be closed on a certain day or not, and he declined to argue on it. It might be right, but he would not discuss the point. This was a Bill dealing with shops, and the licensing-law should not be put into it. The Labour Department was not the proper department to administer the licensing-law, or any portion of it, and he had a very strong objection to have the administration of any part of the licensing-laws thrust on himself or his department. The department had neither the funds nor the ability to administer the licensing-laws, and it was putting it in a most invidious and unfair position. It would be unable effectually to discharge the duties, and odium would be cast on it in consequence. If the House wanted the licensing-law changed and more rigorously administered, in God's name let them have it, but let it be done by the Licensing Act, which was the proper place for it.

The House divided on the question, "That the omission of the words regarding bars of hotels, in clause 2, be agreed to."

AYES, 34.

Buchanan	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Carroll	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Crowther	Lang	Seddon
Duncan	Lawry	Smith, E. M.
Duthie	Mackintosh	Stevens
Fraser	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Graham	McKenzie, R.	Ward
Green	McLachlan	Willis.
Hall	Mills
Harris	O'Regan	Tellers.
Hogg	Parata	Carncross
Houston	Pere	Collins.

Mr. Reeves

NOES, 30.

Allen	Hutchison, W.	Russell, G. W.
Buddo	Joyce	Russell, W. R.
Buick	Maackenzie, T.	Saunders
Button	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Carnell	McGowan	Stout
Earnshaw	Meredith	Thompson
Flatman	Mitchelson	Wilson.
Guinness	Montgomery	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Maalin
Heke	Newman	McNab.
Hutchison, G.

Majority for, 4.

Motion agreed to.

On the question, That new clause 16A be disagreed with,

Sir R. STOUT would like to point out that this provision would cast a heavy additional burden on the Minister of Labour. At present he had only to deal with labour, but this clause would put all commercial offices, banks, and insurance offices under the Labour Bureau; and how they would be able to do that he was not aware. It would be an exceedingly heavy task. He would also point out to the Minister that, as there was a Bank Act dealing with bank-holidays, an amendment of the law in that respect ought to be made in a special Bill, and ought not to come within the general Shops Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON was afraid the last speaker failed to grasp the situation. The honourable gentleman would see that this Bill would give the Minister of Labour an opportunity of appointing a few more officers. The object of the Bill was to build up a big Labour Department. That department was now as large as was necessary to look after the working-men, and now we were going to look after the bank and insurance clerks. Of course, that would give the honourable gentleman an opportunity of providing for a few more of his constituents.

Mr. G. J. SMITH desired to know whether it was intended to include the export branches of shipping offices under the Bill. It would seriously affect mercantile transactions if these offices were closed. For instance, in the case of a direct steamer leaving, bills of lading, specifications, et cetera, had to be put through, and if these offices were closed it would mean that business would be much hampered.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL said it was ridiculous to say that "cashiers, ledger-keepers, and cash-book-keepers shall, before leaving their offices, balance the books in their charge of the day's transactions." They might be kept all night in order to do that. He thought the House ought to object to that part of the clause.

Mr. REEVES said he had no objection to the suggestion of the honourable member for Riccarton: not because he thought there ought not to be a reasonable provision made for allowing the books to be balanced, but because the word "shall" provided that they should stop after five o'clock and do this work whether their employers wished it or whether they did not wish it. He thought the clause was badly worded, and that they might improve the wording, and so he would ask the House to disagree with that part of the clause which he had indicated. As to the suggestion to deal with banks in a special Act, if he thought there was a powerful and determined party sworn to get such an Act on the statute-book or die in the attempt, he would be willing to try and have that done. But, as there was not, they had better have the bank-clerks in this Bill. The personalities of the honourable member for Marsden were such as they might expect from him. The Labour Department, instead of being a colossal department, was by far the smallest and cheapest department in the Government. He doubted whether any labour department in the world was worked so cheaply. The expense had not increased, as a comparison of the estimates this year with those of last year showed. He thought he could administer this clause without appointing a number of his friends to positions in the department.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Bell, Mr. Tanner, and Mr. Reeves were appointed to draw up reasons for disagreeing with the amendments made by the Council.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 3.—Deposits not exceeding £1,000,000 may be received.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved, That the words "one million pounds" be struck out, with a view of inserting "five hundred thousand pounds."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 37.

Carncross	Larnach	Parata
Carnell	Lawry	Pinkerton
Carroll	Mackintosh	Reeves
Duncan	Maslin	Seddon
Flatman	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Hall	McKenzie, R.	Steward
Harris	McLachlan	Thompson
Hogg	Meredith	Ward.
Houston	Millar
Hutchison, W.	Mills	Tellers.
Joyce	Morrison	Collins
Kelly, W.	O'Regan	Russell, G. W.

NOES, 23.

Buick	Heke	Newman
Button	Hutchison, G.	Russell, W. R.
Crowther	Kelly, J. W.	Smith, G. J.
Duthie	Lang	Stout
Earnshaw	Mackenzie, T.	Tanner.
Fraser	Massey	Tellers.
Green	McNab	Allen
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Buchanan.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Pere	Te Ao
Pirani	Wilson
Willis.	Bell.

Majority for, 14.

Amendment negatived, and "one million pounds" retained.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE moved, That the words "four pounds" be struck out, with a view to inserting "three pounds ten shillings."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 40.

Buick	Joyce	Parata
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Carnell	Larnach	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Lawry	Seddon
Collins	Mackintosh	Smith, E. M.
Duncan	Maslin	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	McGowan	Stevens
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Hall	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Hall-Jones	McLachlan	Ward.
Harris	McNab
Hogg	Mills	Tellers.
Houston	Morrison	Montgomery
Hutchison, W.	O'Regan	Pinkerton.

NOES, 22.

Allen	Hutchison, G.	Saunders
Buchanan	Kelly, J. W.	Stout
Buddo	Lang	Thompson
Button	Mackenzie, T.	Wilson.
Crowther	McGuire
Duthie	Meredith	Tellers.
Earnshaw	Millar	Fraser
Heke	Russell, W. R.	Massey.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Pere	Te Ao
Pirani	Green
Willis.	Bell.

Majority for, 18.

Words retained.

Mr. EARNSHAW moved to add, at the end of the clause, "and no Consols shall be issued at a price that will give more than four per centum interest."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 22.

Allen	Lang	Steward
Buchanan	Maslin	Stout
Button	Massey	Thompson
Crowther	McNab	Wilson.
Duthie	Millar
Hall-Jones	Newman	Tellers.
Heke	Russell, W. R.	Earnshaw
Kelly, J. W.	Smith, G. J.	Mackenzie, T.

NOES, 34.

Buddo	Hutchison, W.	O'Regan
Buick	Joyce	Parata
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Carnell	Lawry	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Mackintosh	Saunders
Collins	McGowan	Seddon
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Ward.
Hall	McLachlan
Harris	Meredith	Tellers.
Hogg	Montgomery	Graham
Houston	Morrison	Mills.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Bell	Willis
Fraser	Reeves
Green	Pirani
Hutchison, G.	Larnach
McGuire	Stevens
Mitchelson	Cadman
Te Ao.	Pere.

Majority against, 12.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4.—Date of repayment and interest to be fixed.

Mr. G. J. SMITH moved to strike out the words "forty years," with a view to reducing the term within which the deposits are repayable.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 31.

Buddo	Joyce	Pinkerton
Buick	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Carnell	Mackintosh	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	McGowan	Seddon
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Smith, E. M.
Duncan	McLachlan	Tanner
Hall-Jones	McNab	Ward.
Harris	Meredith
Hogg	Millar	Tellers.
Houston	Morrison	Hall
Hutchison, W.	Parata	Mills.

NOES, 22.

Allen	Heke	Steward
Button	Kelly, J. W.	Stout
Carncross	Lang	Thompson
Crowther	Maslin	Wilson.
Duthie	Massey
Earnshaw	Montgomery	Tellers.
Fraser	Russell, W. R.	Newman
Graham	Saunders	Smith, G. J.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Larnach	Hutchison, G.
Lawry	Mackenzie, T.
Pere	Te Ao
Pirani	Green
Stevens	McGuire
Willis.	Bell.

Majority for, 9.

Amendment negatived, and words retained.

Clause 7.—Deposits to be paid into Public Account.

Mr. WARD moved, That the clause be struck out, with the view of inserting a new clause.

Agreed to, and clause struck out.

Clause 32.—Minors may become Consols' holders, and transfer.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved, That the clause be struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause stand part of the Bill."

AYES, 38.

Buddo	Houston	Morrison
Buick	Joyce	Newman
Carnell	Kelly, W.	Parata
Carroll	Mackenzie, T.	Pinkerton
Collins	Maslin	Seddon
Crowther	McGowan	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Graham	McLachlan	Ward.
Hall	McNab	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Meredith	Lawry
Harris	Montgomery	Smith, E. M.
Hogg

NOES, 8.

Allen	O'Regan	Tellers.
Earnshaw	Russell, W. R.	Buchanan
Massey	Stout.	Wilson.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carncross	Button
Duncan	Kelly, J. W.
Hutchison, W.	Duthie
Larnach	Hutchison, G.
McKenzie, J.	Fraser
Millar	Heke
Pere	Te Ao
Pirani	Green
Stevens	McGuire
Steward	Lang
Willis.	Bell.

Majority for, 25.

Amendment negatived.

Clause retained.

Sir R. STOUT moved the addition of the following new clause :—

"No Consols or certificates issued under the authority of this Act shall be convertible into stock under 'The New Zealand Consolidated Stock Act, 1877,' or 'The Consolidated Stock Act, 1884.'"

The Committee divided on the question, "That this new clause be read a second time."

AYES, 21.

Allen	Mackenzie, T.	O'Regan
Buchanan	Maslin	Russell, W. R.
Buick	Massey	Stout
Collins	McNab	Tanner.
Crowther	Meredith	Tellers.
Graham	Montgomery	Earnshaw
Hall-Jones	Newman	Smith, G. J.
Heke

NOES, 21.

Buddo	Kelly, W.	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Lawry	Seddon
Carroll	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Ward.
Hall	McLachlan	Tellers.
Harris	Mills	Morrison
Hogg	Parata	Pinkerton.
Joyce

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Bell	Willis
Button	Carncross
Duthie	Hutchison, W.

Green	Pirani
Hutchison, G.	Larnach
Kelly, J. W.	Duncan
Lang	Steward
McGuire	Stevens
Mitchelson	Cadman
Te Ao	Mackintosh
Wilson.	Millar.

The CHAIRMAN gave his casting-vote with the "Ayes."

Mr. BUCHANAN said he forgot when the division was taken that he was paired with the Minister of Lands, and therefore his vote, which was given with the "Ayes," ought to be recorded with the "Noes."

The CHAIRMAN said that, having given his casting-vote, the matter could not be reopened. Clause read a second time.

The motion, "That the clause be added to the Bill," was subsequently negatived on the voices.

Bill reported, with amendments.

The House adjourned at five minutes past three o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Friday, 28th September, 1894.

Third Reading—Bank of New Zealand—Forest Reserves—Rating on Unimproved Value Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock p.m.

PRAYERS.

THIRD READING.

School-attendance Bill.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS asked the Government, in view of the provisions of the Bank of New Zealand Share Guarantee Act imposing on them the necessity for appointing a President of the Board of Directors within three months of the issue of the guaranteed shares, which time is about to expire, and also of the fact that the Board of Directors, whose election was also provided for by that Act, has been elected, when they will inform Parliament of the date on which the appointment of President will be made? He wished to say that, of course, he had no desire whatever to ask a question that might be in the least inconvenient to the Government in relation to the duty which they had to perform, and which, he admitted, was of a very delicate and important character. At the same time, he would say that the importance of the appointment mentioned in the question was such, considering the immense responsibility which the colony had recently taken with regard to the Bank of New Zealand, having regard also to the fact that the bank largely carried on operations outside the colony, and having regard likewise to the nature of the Assets Company and its important bearing on the position of the bank, that it appeared to him —in fact, he was aware—that there was very considerable anxiety in the country to know the decision which the Government had come to upon the appointment of a President of the bank. He had therefore thought it right to ask this question.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY was quite sure that his honourable friend would give the Government credit for being as anxious to have this important question settled as he was. Papers which would be laid on the table as soon as they were ready would show exactly the action of the Government in this matter. The matter was now under the serious consideration of the Government, and they had not yet decided as to the person to be appointed. A person would shortly be appointed, no doubt, and he trusted he would be one who would meet with the approval of the Council and of the country.

FOREST RESERVES.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH moved, That a return be laid upon the table of all lands set apart as forest reserves under "The New Zealand State Forests Act, 1885," during the years 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893, showing the area, and locality in which the lands so set apart are situate. His object in asking for this return was to ascertain how far the intention of "The New Zealand State Forests Act, 1885," had been carried out. Repeatedly papers were laid on the table withdrawing from the operation of the Act reserves made under it. He was anxious to know if further reserves were being set apart by the Government of the day.

Motion agreed to.

RATING ON UNIMPROVED VALUE BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Resuming the discussion on this Bill, I should like to say that, as I understand the Bill, it proposes for the future to take the land, without any improvements that may be placed upon it, as the sole basis of rating, and that it intends to make this applicable wherever in a district it is adopted by the vote of a meeting of ratepayers, to be called in accordance with the Act, and to apply this principle to all the rating by any local body within that area. I do not propose to discuss the question from the point of view of the single-tax theory, because I do not think that is exactly applicable, nor is it very convenient to bring that question into play in connection with a question of this kind. It appears to me rather that the better way to discuss this question is to consider whether this principle of the exemption of improvements from rating should be adopted. Instead of assuming, as appears to be the common practice, that this is in itself a good rule, I prefer to invite honourable gentlemen to consider it from the exactly opposite point of view, and to consider what reasons there are for its adoption. If it is said that we have already adopted this system in regard to general taxation, in the matter of land for general purposes, I would say this : The two objects for which money is raised on land are totally different. In the one case—of general taxation—there is an entirely different set of necessities to provide for: public defence, the protection of life and property, public debt, education, and the maintenance of all the departments of government. When we turn from that to local rating, we find the objects totally different, and they stand on a totally different basis. Instead of being for such objects as I have mentioned, they are for the purpose of improving the value of land, and for the personal convenience and comfort of ratepayers, passengers, and so forth. Sir, this is the point of view at which I propose to start, having, as I think, got rid of the point that might be raised that, because we have adopted the principle in one form of taxation and for one set of objects, we should therefore adopt it for local rating. The purposes for which we adopt rating I take to be generally these: the ordinary rate, special rates, and rates for such objects as drainage, river-conservation, harbours, and last, but not least, hospital and charitable aid—in point of fact, the poor-rate; and my honourable friend Mr. Montgomery, in the remarks he made yesterday, appeared to indicate that this Bill, in relation to its application to these subjects, gives to him and to the Government generally only partial satisfaction,—that he considers river-conservation and drainage should be excluded from the operation of this principle. Why, I, for one, am at a loss to understand.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY. — I said that was a matter for consideration.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS. — Yes, Sir, it is a matter for consideration whether, in respect to rating for these objects and all the others that might be mentioned, the principle should not be rejected. That is my idea of the consideration that should be applied to it. Before going into any other question, I should like to refer to this point. Take the case of special rates. Here are people, in innumerable instances, who have deliberately consented to the application of special rating to their properties for the purpose of getting some particular work done, and they did so on the understanding that a set of circumstances existed which they then saw. I merely mention this incidentally. It appears to me that it would be a great invasion of the position they then occupied, and one which it would be very difficult to justify after careful consideration. The main object of my remarks is this: to attempt to show the Council what must inevitably be the effect of this measure on different classes of the community. It appears to me the object of those who advocate this measure is simply to catch some person here and there who does not improve his property. A sort of popular notion has been got up that, because there are a certain number of such persons, an Act should be brought in to penalise them. I am not going to advocate unimproved property. Far from it. But what I wish to call attention to is that the present Bill proposes to establish a permanent principle on which local taxation should rest for the future, as far as we can see, and possibly for all time, whilst, on the other hand, the existence of property in an unimproved condition must of necessity be temporary. That state of things cannot continue for any long period of years under such a burden as land-tax and local rating. The aggregate of burdens placed on unimproved land must of necessity be dealt with in some manner by way of realisation. If the land is realised by a non-improving proprietor, the new owner will not buy it for the purpose of letting it lie idle. Let us now attempt to deal with the question of the effect on different classes of property. I am quite aware that in certain districts, certain bush districts possibly that might occur to the minds of honourable gentlemen, a system of this kind might be more or less acceptable. Some people have a strong prejudice in favour of the exemption of improvements, but I should like to ask, why should any one who has valuable improvements escape from taxation? I do not know any reason why he should. He has put improvements on his property for purposes of his own, for his own advantage—the improvement of his own position and his own convenience. There is some idea, I believe, abroad that he has been a great public benefactor by spending money on improvements. We all know that if he has spent the money judiciously it is a very good thing, but if injudiciously the argument would disappear. But it is unnecessary to go further into that. The point is this: By this Bill the person who spends money on improvements will be permanently and totally exempted from taxation, although those improvements may have been exhausted over and over again in the course of years, and may not have been renewed. It may be said, in the case of exhausted improvements and depreciation of their value, this state of thing would from time to time be corrected by valuation, and so it would; but this is no answer to my point: that the owner has made the improvements with the special and only object of benefiting himself. In examining different classes, I wish to show what the influence of this Bill may be, and will sum up its general effect. Take the case of a town. You can go down the streets in any of our towns, and you will find enormous buildings in the shape of banks or warehouses on a piece of land no larger than that held by a person of very small means. Such instances must be as common as possible to honourable gentlemen. And what is the effect of this? That the wealthy corporation or individual, having put up a large building for its or his own advantage, will pay no more taxation on that piece of land—being of the same area—than the small and poor person; and there is no question that such would be the case. Is this a fair state of things? Because an individual is not able to erect a building of the same size and value as another, because his building is no larger than he can afford, is that any reason why he should be punished to the extent of making up the deficiency out of the value of the land? I cannot conceive anything more harsh, or that would operate more unfairly and almost cruelly. Take, again, the case of residences. Every one must be familiar with the fact that the largest house very frequently—especially where the land is scarce—is put upon land no larger in size than a quarter-acre section. Such instances are as familiar to me as possible. The position is this: A large bank or warehouse is in numerous instances put up on ground no larger than an adjoining property on which are buildings not worth a tenth part of the bank or warehouse, and, nevertheless, the latter are as large as are required by the owner, and as much as he can afford. Yet the two properties would, under this Bill, pay the same rates. Again, a person puts up a house worth from £1,000 to £5,000 on a piece of land which is no larger than that of his neighbour, who occupies the whole of a piece of land of similar value with a building worth only £200 or £300. Exactly the same position of hardship occurs, and I say it is not a fair position; it is anything but a fair position. Again, coming to the country districts, every one is aware of the fact that valuable land is of a character which would justify in a general way a much larger expenditure of capital on it in the way of improvements than land of a poor quality. Such a position will not be questioned. I am not speaking of improvements in the way of manuring land or anything of that sort, but permanent improvements. You therefore start with this position: As regards the towns, you are making the poor man pay as against the rich; in the suburbs, where residences chiefly prevail, you are doing the same thing; and in the country, owing to good land being better worth improving than poor land, the same results must occur. I believe it would be utterly impossible to upset the position I have stated. Viewing it in the most impartial manner, that is the conclusion to which I have come. It is not my purpose to speak at any length; I have said virtually all I wish to say. But there is one point left, and it is this: The power will be left entirely in the hands of the ratepayers.

Hon. Mr. Stevens

An Hon. MEMBER.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—My honourable friend says, "Hear, hear." I am surprised that he should take so shallow a view. Does he imagine the people to whose interest it is, and who have great influence in the localities, will not induce their poor neighbours—and they would be quite justified in doing so—to have a public meeting got up for the purpose of adopting the scheme? Certainly they would. And as for numbers in a community being an element of safety, it is not a sufficient one. I am quite satisfied that the richer proprietors will, when they understand the meaning of this, get up an agitation—probably successfully—for the adoption of the scheme; and they will do it in their own interests; and for three years the poorer inhabitants in all these localities will be suffering without any chance of remedy until the expiration of three years. It does appear to me that the Bill has been brought forward under an entire misconception of what is proper in regard to the principle of local taxation, and that it is in itself mischievous to the last degree, and that it is calculated to inflict on those who are least able to bear it the heaviest burden.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—The honourable gentleman who has just spoken has answered most satisfactorily the arguments of my honourable friend Mr. Pharazyn in one respect. The Hon. Mr. Pharazyn was afraid this would injuriously affect the large landholders. The Hon. Mr. Stevens thinks it would injuriously affect the small holders.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—I said it would injuriously affect the holders of poor land.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—The honourable gentleman said it was an insidious attack on landed estate.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—Of course it is.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—I think, myself, it will not to any extent injuriously affect any one, but will tend to relieve the actual occupiers of land. Of course, I do not know what will be its effect on other districts so well as on my own District of Taranaki; and there, I think, so far as my judgment goes, it will be unanimously accepted by the public vote in rural districts. How will this operate? What are these local rates for? They are for the purpose of maintaining roads; and I think our interest ought to be to protect those who live on their properties, utilise them, and make use of the roads, in preference to those who are absent and hold land simply for speculative purposes. I think this Bill will effect that object. I do not think much difficulty will arise with respect to ascertaining the unimproved value, because we have already had some experience in this matter. A short time ago the Legislature passed an Act under which Valuers had to be appointed to ascertain the unimproved and the gross value of property; and the method they adopted to ascertain the unimproved value was this: They first ascertained the gross value of the land, including the improvements, they next ascertained the present value of the improvements, and from the gross value they deducted the value of the improvements, and the balance represented the unimproved value. It was found, practically, that the value of the improvements was from one-fourth to one-third of the gross, and therefore in a district like ours it will not materially affect those who have largely improved their land. This is not a new proposal at all. This method of rating was in operation in Taranaki in 1858. I have the provincial ordinance here, and will read the clause. The ordinance was passed in 1858, and we then had the benefit of the legal advice of a gentleman who now occupies the position of Judge of the Supreme Court, and who was then Provincial Solicitor—Judge Richmond. After providing for an acreage rate for the rural districts, the ordinance stated that—

"Within the town district a uniform rate per cent. to be assessed on the value of all lands within the district, exclusive of all buildings, erections, and improvements whatsoever, shall in every case be imposed, such value to be ascertained as hereinafter provided."

The rate was not to be less than $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and was to be fixed by a public meeting of ratepayers. Subsequently, the rate on the unimproved value was changed to a minimum of 2d. in the pound on the capital value, but not to exceed 8d. in the pound. This ordinance was in operation for a great number of years, until an Act was passed by this Legislature altering the mode of levying taxation. Therefore this was in operation in New Zealand before Henry George was ever thought of, or before his views had come before the public. The effect in the Taranaki District will be that it will discourage speculation in land, and reduce taxation on the improving settler. Under the present system the man who fells bush, and erects fences, buildings, and a house, is rated for all these improvements; whereas the man alongside of him, who makes no improvements and lets the bush remain, and who does not contribute—or, at any rate, contributes a very small proportion—towards making the roads, is rated about one-fourth as much; yet his land rises in value, and the time comes when the man who does nothing is able to sell and make a profit, and pockets the proceeds without contributing a fair share to local rates. This practice has caused a great deal of irritation in the district, and there have several times been complaints and difficulties that have arisen under the present system. The Bill cannot be put into operation by the local authority without a requisition of a certain number of the ratepayers, and, in fact, it cannot be done until one-half of the ratepayers agree to it; and it must be understood that at any rate the principle of "one man one vote" does not apply with regard to local government. Some of the ratepayers will have from two to five votes, and they can record their plurality of votes against the unimproved rating proposal to rate on the unimproved value. It is not the number of individuals who decide, but the number of votes recorded at the poll, that determines the matter, so that it is rather in favour of the large owners than otherwise.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The very class of people who do not want it.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—Then, they certainly will not vote for it, and therefore they have a remedy. I cannot say, of course, what will be done in the towns; the country will generally regard the Bill with favour. Then, with regard to local option in this matter, we have this local option already. I think the local-option system is a good one, and I think it might be extended in other directions in order to protect us from the results of a too advanced democracy. It is possible to amend our Constitution in that direction with advantage. But I am not at all satisfied with our system of local rating. Of course, if it were confined entirely to rates expended on roads and such purposes there would be no great objection to be urged against it, but when we come to take into consideration the very heavy levies that are made upon the local bodies for the purpose of charitable aid I think the system of rating with regard to that should be altered. I think the rate for this purpose should not be levied on the occupiers of land only, but that it should also be levied on the realised wealth of the country. I contend that the money required for charitable-aid purposes should to a large extent be drawn out of the pockets of the wealthy, and that the occupiers of land should not be called upon to pay more than a fair share of the amount. Of course, this is a large subject, and it does not enter so much into our calculations here, because I see under the Bill provision is made with regard to water rates and gas rates, which are to be levied on the gross value of the property. By simply amending the Bill the contributions required for charitable-aid and hospital purposes should be included in that category. I intend to support the Bill. I think, myself, it is an improvement so far as a large portion of the colony is concerned.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT.—This Bill brings before us two questions, one of which is of an exceedingly large and important character—that is, the question or the principle of taxing the unimproved value of land. The next question is of a more subordinate character—the utility, or, rather, the expediency, of applying that principle to the present system of local taxation. I should have thought, and I expected, that this discussion would have mainly hinged on the question of expediency, and I was prepared to listen and give every consideration to the opinions of honourable gentlemen in the Council who had devoted years of study to this question of local taxation. I say I thought this discussion would hinge more on the question of expediency; but I find that my honourable friend Mr. Pharazyn has opened up the larger question of the desirability or otherwise of imposing a tax on the unimproved values of land. And in order to support his own view he attempted to demolish the justice of the theory of taxing the unimproved values of land. In support of that he gave us large quotations from the Duke of Argyll's book, "The Unseen Foundations of Society," and he also endeavoured to throw some discredit on the works of Mr. Henry George. I should not have troubled the Council with my view on the general question had it not been opened up by the extracts given by the honourable gentleman from the Duke of Argyll's book. That being so, I think it only right that something should be said on the opposite side. The Hon. Mr. Pharazyn declared that this Bill was of a selfish character, because it would relieve those who had improved their property at the expense of those who had not. As for the selfishness, I fail to see where it comes in. A man wants a piece of land, and he rears a building upon it such as he requires for carrying on his business; and a man buys a piece of land alongside of him, but does not want to use it. He has no use for it at the present time, and he waits until his neighbour has built perhaps a warehouse, or offices, or insurance buildings, or anything else

Hon. Mr. Kelly

—he waits, I say, till people of that class build around his section and give a value to it, a value towards which he does not contribute anything himself. Who is the selfish man? I say the selfish man is the one who is endeavouring to get wealth towards which he has not contributed. That is particularly unfair to the man who is forwarding the prosperity of the place by putting up buildings or anything else upon his land. My honourable friend said that frequently the man that did not improve his property was the poorer man of the two. I quite admit that. But what has made him so? He ought to have taken to heart the aphorism of Poor Richard, "Buy what you don't want, and you shall soon sell your necessities." This man has bought land that he does not want, and in some cases he has to sell his necessities. But because he has done that, I do not think we are required to extend to him our sympathy. He had no right to buy land and hold it solely for speculative purposes—to wait until the growth and the industry of the community had made it valuable. We do not commiserate the glutton because he gets sick, and I say that a man has no right to be commiserated if he is under any hardship in consequence of holding such a necessary commodity as land for speculative purposes. My honourable friend said—and he quoted from some unnamed friend—that Mr. George's book was full of all the fallacies that might be imagined in political questions. Well, I do not know of any man of real eminence who has said that, so far as the main principle of his book is concerned, which is the exposition of the law of rent, his position can be shaken. I know there have been many carping critics of Mr. George's opinions, and I am not going to uphold Mr. George in all his statements. I will merely say that many of those who have attempted to demolish Mr. George hold, I think, a very second-rate position in the field of economics of the present day. I allude especially to the Duke of Argyll, from whose book my honourable friend quoted very largely, and to Mr. Mallock. Mr. Mallock wrote a book called "Progress and Property," which was aimed at Mr. George. Had he ceased writing then, he might have had some reputation. Unfortunately, he is also the author of a book which he calls "Is Life worth living?" This question he answers in the negative. I may point out that every person who does not commit suicide gives a practical refutation of his assertion. The next man who undertook to demolish Mr. George was the Duke of Argyll himself. Now, I do not think the Duke of Argyll is a great authority in economics. Some time ago he acquired a great reputation through writing a book called "The Reign of Law," in which he endeavoured to show that everything in nature is beautifully adapted to what it was intended for; that, for instance, the length of the wing of the albatross is just sufficient to poise it in the air. Evidently the Duke thought that the wing was made for the work which it had to perform: instead of that, science teaches us it was the work that made the wing. If he is as well up in political subjects as he is in scientific subjects, I am not sure that any great reliance can be placed upon him. I said at the commencement that there were only a few remarks I wished to make, as a set-off against what the honourable gentleman had read from the Duke's book. I have a few extracts, not so voluminous as those the honourable gentleman brought before us yesterday, but a few which I think it wise to bring before the Council, and I shall give extracts from men who I am sure—at any rate, some of them—will be recognised as authorities by the honourable gentleman himself, and who will be recognised as authorities by this Council. I shall first give an extract from Professor Marshall: and, by the way, the honourable gentleman himself quoted from Professor Marshall. Here is what Professor Marshall says on the increase of rents:—

"It seems that the agricultural (money) rent of England doubled between 1795 and 1815, and then fell by a third till 1822. After that time it has been alternately rising and falling, and it is now about forty-five or fifty millions, as against fifty or fifty-five millions in 1873, when it was at its highest. It was about thirty millions in 1810, sixteen millions in 1870, and six millions in 1800. But the rental of urban land in England is now rather greater than the rent of agricultural land, and, in order to estimate the full gain of the landlords from the expansion of population and progress, we must reckon in the value of the land on which there are railways, mines, docks, &c. Taken altogether, the money rental of England's soil is probably twice as high, and its real rental three or four times as high, as when the corn-laws were repealed."

That is from Marshall's "Economics of Industry: 1892." It has been pointed out that in London, by recent estimates of the value of property, the agricultural value of the land on which London is built will be about £250,000, while the capital value is £300,000,000. That capital value is increasing at present at the rate of £4,500,000 a year, giving an increase annually to the landlords of £330,000. I will next ask honourable members to listen to this quotation as to how this increase of rental affects industry and trade. And the quotation I take is from the report of a Royal Commission prepared by Mr. O'Connor, which was presented in the House of Commons, I think, in 1885, "On the Depression in Trade and Industry." Here is what Mr. O'Connor says in his report:—

"Not only in London does the amount paid for the occupation of ground bear a higher proportion to the profits of trade than it formerly did, but in Birmingham too, where trade prices have been lowered, profits reduced, and wages are less, and where there are large numbers of persons vainly seeking employment, the price which has to be paid for the use of the land has increased. . . . It thus appears that over the entire country there is a cause at work, general, permanent, and far-reaching, affecting every branch of industry in mine, and farm, and factory, the effects of which are traceable in the languishing condition of the agricultural and the mining and manufacturing interests. The cause is the fact that, under the existing land-system, the owners of the soil are able to obtain, and do exact, so large a proportion of the proceeds of the industry of the United Kingdom that the remainder is insufficient to secure adequate remuneration to the industrial classes, either in the shape of wages to operatives or reasonable profit to the organizers of labour—the employers or capitalists.”

As an illustration of how these values arise, I think this is a great lesson for us, living in a new country, and a practical exposition of the extension of wealth and comfort to be expected, if not in our time, I hope, at any rate, for our children if private ownership of land were abolished. Here is an instance of the rise in land-values:—

“In the Parish of Plumstead land used to be let for agricultural purposes for £3 an acre. The income of an estate of 250 acres in 1845 was £750 per annum, and the capital value at twenty years’ purchase was £15,000. The Arsenal came to Woolwich, with the Arsenal the necessity for five thousand houses, and then came the harvest for the landlord. The land the capital value of which had been £15,000 now brought in an income of £14,250 per annum. The ground landlord has received £1,000,000 in ground-rents already, and after twenty years hence the Woolwich estates, with all the houses upon them, will revert to the landowner’s family and bring in another million, meaning altogether a swap of £15,000 for a sum of £2,000,000.”

What, I ask, have the landlords done in this case? Nothing. I will point out that this is not an exceptional case; and here I shall quote the words of a man who stands in the same political school as the Duke of Argyll, and whose name is associated with the old English Whig party. John Bright says, speaking on the Irish Land Bill of 1881,—

“If you complain that the Bill gives too much to the tenant and takes all that it does give from the landlords, I should make this answer: If at this moment all that the tenants have done were gone and all that the landlords have done were left, the land would be as bare of house and barn, fences, and cultivation as it was in prehistoric times. It would be as bare as an American prairie, where the Indian now roams and where the white man has never trod. I believe, and I think I am within the mark, that nine-tenths, excluding the towns of course, of all that is to be seen on the farmland of Ireland—the houses, barns, fences, and whatever you call cultivation, or freeing land from the wilderness—have been placed there by the tenantry of Ireland, and not at the expense of the landlord.”

Professor Thorold Rogers gives the following also with reference to landlords:—

“Every permanent improvement of the soil, every railway and road, every bettering of the condition of society, every facility given for production, every stimulus applied to consumption, raises rent. The landowner sleeps, but thrives. He alone among all the recipients in the distribution of products owes everything to the labours of others; contributes nothing of his own.”

Sir, I have just one small quotation more, and it is from Mr. John Morley. Mr. Morley says,—

“The question of unearned increment will have to be faced before many years are over. It is unendurable that great increments, which have not been earned by those to whom they accrue, but have been formed by the industry of the community, should be absorbed by those who have contributed nothing to that increase.”

Sir, there is no use continuing to quote from Mr. Morley or any one else. Common-sense teaches us that the community gives this wealth to land, and that it is not the owner who does so. If every man gets what he earns, the owner has no right to it. It belongs, of right, to the community only. We all know the position of the Duke of Argyll, who belongs to the smug, obsolete, respectable old Whiggish school. He is practically now a belated remnant of a decaying class so far as that school of thought is concerned, and he would not be quoted as an authority in economic questions anywhere; and the truth is, the further we consider these matters—the further we see into our social arrangements—the more unjust our social arrangements appear. There is no question about it that the private ownership of land means a stupendous robbery of the people. It is a question which we ought seriously to consider, whether, in dealing with our lands, we are doing the proper thing for the future. What are we doing? We are practically handing them over, as the British lands are now handed over, to a select few of the people, giving that few the power to exploit all the others for all time to come. I do trust that at some future day we shall deal with this question from a colonial and national standpoint. At any rate, I support the Bill cheerfully. I think it goes in the proper direction. It is endeavouring to apply an important principle to local taxation.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—I do not intend to follow the remarks or the quotations made by the honourable gentleman who has just sat down. They do not in the smallest degree touch the Bill that is now before us. To begin with, several of the arguments the honourable gentleman used were of a character that would be just as effective upon any subject foreign to the Bill: in fact, they were entirely aside from the question. Mr. George is a crank, who is entirely repudiated in his own country, and is accepted in no country as an authority; and he is absolutely preached down by an authority that I do not suppose the honourable gentleman will argue against—I think, by Mr. Gladstone himself. Mr. George is out of the case altogether. Let us come back to the Bill, and a little consideration of the

Hon. Mr. Bolt

Bill,—which, I may say, I intend to support,—will show that it is eminently just in principle. Now, I say, to begin with, that I must support the Bill, because I entirely believe in the Land Act of 1878, and the principle there laid down, which is to compel occupation. I may remark, however, that the operation of this Bill will be almost entirely confined to the towns of the colony, because outside those places, at all events, there are very few people buying land or holding it for speculation: in fact, I doubt if a single instance can be given in which land outside of towns and suburbs is utterly unused, and is kept purely for speculative purposes by the holders; at any rate, I know of no such land. There may be some parts of the colony where land has been given to military settlers and others, and who, probably in ignorance of the fact that they ever owned the land, have allowed it to remain unused. I say there may be persons with land in that position absolutely ignorant of it. But in the towns and the suburbs it undoubtedly does apply. Of course, it would be highly unfair to tax this highly-valuable land in the same way as very bad land. There must be a distinction between good and bad land. I presume the valuation will be put on the absolute selling-value of the land, and nothing else. When we come to the point, is it just and fair that a man should be allowed to hold land for speculation in the centres of the towns, and which, while he is doing nothing to it, acquires a value which sometimes runs to as high as a hundred or a thousand per cent. of what it originally cost him? We naturally ask, is it tolerable that he should have that advantage, and never pay anything at all towards the expenses which devolve upon the community? As for water-rates, and so on, these are imposed according to the amount of water used; and in the same way people pay for gas; but when it comes to ordinary taxation, and often special taxation, for the benefit of the towns, I do not think it right that people who do nothing with their land, and who are in good situations, should be allowed to get the value per foot that these lands have acquired through the industry and labour of other persons. There is no question of the ground-rent in this matter. Nobody wants to know whether something was advanced on the security of the ground-rent of a factory or anything of the kind. That is not the question. The question is this: Whether the improvements made on the land should or should not be exempted, inasmuch as those improvements give great value to vacant land adjoining. I think improvements should be exempted, and all land should pay on the value it has acquired by the industry and the outlay and the enterprise of the persons alongside. The question of the ground-rents is quite another question, and has nothing to do with it, especially in a young country where we are trying to push on settlement. I do not think there should be any sort of speculation, which means the buying of land and leaving it unused and unimproved. Therefore I am entirely in favour of this Bill. Another thing which makes me more disposed to support the Bill is that it contains a provision by which every town will be able to decide according to the vote of the ratepayers who are interested, and they will do so in proportion to what they possess. You could have no better protection for themselves and their property, for the Bill provides—just as in the case of a joint-stock company—that a certain number of votes—which are awarded according to value, and not by universal suffrage—shall or shall not carry the measure. I am in favour of this Bill, as I was in favour of the exemption of improvements in the case of country lands, for general purposes, in 1878. One thing may be said about that, and that is this: that it is exceedingly il-Liberal. The argument was, that it ought not to be taken into account, because a man considered, in buying, the probable rise through the success of the town. But the man bought the land for his own profit only. While he ought to take his fair share of the burdens, I do not think it is fair to say that he was more enterprising, and that he ought to get the whole. There were several remarks I am disposed to object to in the speeches of the Hon. Mr. Stevens and others. They all seemed to turn on the old question of the property-tax, and the country rejected that. It was a monstrous proposal, and the country absolutely threw it out. It was a proposal under which people had to pay for what they did not get. I believe in the principle of the income-tax, but I cannot see where the justice of the property-tax came in. The only objections I have heard levelled against the Bill are the same objections that were levelled by some honourable gentlemen against the property-tax. I do not regard this Bill as any indorsement of the single-tax at all,—which, to my mind, is an infamous proposal, which I shall always oppose. While I do not think it is an indorsement of the principle of the nationalisation of the land, which has been condemned by all respectable members of the ultra-Liberal party at Home, I nevertheless think, in a colony like this, that, in towns in the course of construction and settlement, it is a monstrous proposal that anybody can buy sections and keep them until they have acquired a value through the industry of other people. I will give an instance of what has occurred in the Hon. Mr. Stevens's own part of the country—in Christchurch. What price was paid for the Triangle in Christchurch itself? It was bought for £70, and it is now worth more than £400,000. Any persons who own land ought to pay rates proportionately for every foot of the land. Other sections there were bought for £25 the quarter-acre, and many smaller ones for £5. One section, less than a quarter of an acre, was sold for £5,000, although the owner only gave £75 for it in 1878. I think that a man ought to pay taxation per foot of the value which the land has arrived at, without counting the expenditure the other man had been exposed to, which gave a value to it. The value of the land was absolutely nothing but for this. Because other people during a series of years had improved their property, and paid more rates than he did, the owner came, one fine day, and got an enormous increase of 1,000 per cent. on his capital. That appears to me to be so monstrous that I shall oppose the principle in any form. While I cannot bear the principle of land-nationalisation, nevertheless I think, when we see the things which are done by aggregations of people in building towns, we ought to consider those who give their help and those who do not. I think the Bill is for the protection of the rate-payers. It is a fair measure, and I shall support it.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—Sir, we are told by the Hon. Sir George Whitmore that unoccupied lands in towns do not pay rates.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—Certainly.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—I say they do, and also water- and gas-rates. When the Government sell allotments in the towns they ought to state beforehand that they must be occupied. When these sections in the towns were originally sold the Treasury was empty, and the Government was very glad to get the money for them; but now, when buildings have been put up about them, the rates are increased, and it is the selling-value per foot that is now rated. I know something about land in the country, and I can give an instance of what has occurred in the North. A good deal of land was given to the settlers; other people bought land and cleared the country, and now they are being denounced as money-lenders and absentees. If any improvements were effected by their neighbours, the rates went up in proportion. What are the rates collected for? They are for streets and sewers, lighting, and roads and bridges, et cetera. Those who have vacant allotments do not contribute so much to the wear-and-tear of the streets. None of the dwellers on those allotments go about wearing out the pavement, or cutting up the streets with their horses and carts. These people ought to pay a fair share of the rates, and I say they do now. And I say it was the necessities of the State that caused it to sell this land. If the State had wanted these sections to be occupied it should have said so when the land was sold. That was not done, and the Government were very anxious to get the purchasers' money. I know an instance in Auckland province where there was an acreage rate. We had got a lot of capital people with their wives and families from Home—pensioners. Each got an acre and a cottage. The acreage rate was put in force, and one man—Every Maclean—outside the village, in the road district, actually paid more in rates than the whole of the people in the village, and had not a voice in the matter. These village people, who paid a shilling each, voted for making roads and, owing to their numbers, as to what was to be done and who was to do it; and when the acreage rate was imposed these works had to be paid for, for the greater part, by the others. I do not speak from self-interest, but I think it is right to tell what I know of the matter.

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMS.—As Chairman of a County Council, I feel called upon to say a few words on this matter. In the part of the country I come from the provisions contained in the Bill will act disastrously on the county's finance, besides inflicting great hardship on the poorer owners of land owing to the increased taxation required to be put upon their lands in order to make up the deficiencies in the revenue, while those who are able to pay will get off with a nominal rate. In our county one-fourth of the area is owned by the Crown, one-third by the Maoris, and the remainder by the settlers. Since the repeal of the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act, the settlers are rated for roading the whole county; while the Natives, who are the principal offenders in destroying the roads, pay no rates. The Crown and the Natives are, in our county, the speculators who are lying by for the unearned increment, for they pay no rates. I will state a case as a practical illustration of my meaning. In a Maori district about twenty miles from the port there is a company of kauri-gum buyers, who send out, on an average, from fifteen to twenty tons of gum per week in Maori bullock-wagons, and import a like quantity of goods on the return trip. They have a plant in buildings and improvements worth £6,000 or £7,000. Under the provisions of this Bill they will get off with a nominal rate, and the loss to the revenue will have to be put on to the country settlers, who are already groaning under the incubus of the gum-traffic, from which the county derives no revenue. Yesterday I received a letter from one of our County Councillors, and, by leave of the Council, I will read an extract. He says,—

Hon. Sir G. S. Whitmore

"You will perhaps know that this winter we have had an extra trouble on the Kaikohe Falls Road in the hauling of 60,000ft. of timber, and all other material, to build the big hotel at Kaikohe. Many of our settlers have been pretty angry, and have been inclined to use rough language, saying that the County Council should make the drivers pay extra; and they cite English recent cases to back up their arguments. You can imagine that, as I have been travelling over that road lately, I have got vexed. The wear-and-tear is bad enough, but the Maori bullock-wagons are abominable. A lot of the contractor's work done recently is destroyed, water-tables filled up with the ploughing of the wheels, and the ends of the culverts cut off through careless driving. I have threatened to summon several, but the Maoris are impudent in their wickedness."

The timber referred to is for the purpose of erecting a large hotel, to cost £1,500. Under the provisions of this Bill the proprietor, who has been destroying the roads as fast as the repairs were made, will be let off with a nominal rate; and the rates will have to be put on the country settlers, who are for the most part poor, and find it difficult to make both ends meet. For my own part, this Bill will reduce my rates very materially; but, as Chairman of the County Council, I am bound to protest against it as being disastrous to the county finance, irritating and vexatious to the poorer owner of land, and likely to create bad blood between the two races.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—I have listened to the speeches delivered in advocacy of this Bill, but the argument seems to be against it. I will refer to those used by the Hon. Sir George Whitmore and the Hon. Mr. Bolt. The Hon. Sir George Whitmore announced that he was a strong opponent of the single-tax, that he was strongly opposed to the arguments used by Henry George; but he said he intended to support this Bill, which is in the direction of the single-tax. The Hon. Mr. Bolt used an elaborate argument in favour of the single-tax, and taxing the unearned increment, and against wealthy men escaping their fair share of taxation. But this Bill will enable wealthy men to escape. Last year I pointed out this fact, and my remarks were satirised by honourable gentlemen on that side. They derided the notion that we, who opposed a similar proposal, could be actuated by any desire for fair taxation—by any desire to exact from owners of property their fair share of taxation. It seems to me, as has been stated by the Hon. Mr. Williams and the Hon. Mr. Swanson, that in the discussion of this Bill it ought not to be thought that those who oppose it do so for selfish reasons. I, like them, shall escape taxation under this Bill. It is not from any selfish ground that I oppose the Bill, but because I believe it is founded on a false notion of the principle and scope of local taxation. As to the arguments of the Hon. Mr. Bolt about the agricultural value of London, that seems to me to be quite beside this matter; it has no bearing at all on this subject. Then, we had to listen to an interesting criticism of the work by the Duke of Argyll—"The Reign of Law." This was interesting, because the Duke of Argyll is a very interesting man; but I cannot see what bearing it has on the solution of this question. To listen to the arguments used, it might be supposed that those who own unoccupied sites in towns keep them unoccupied because of some far-reaching desire to profit by the work of their neighbours. Well, Sir, I believe that is entirely a delusion. I believe the building of houses in towns proceeds exactly pari passu with the demand. In Wellington there is a scarcity of houses at present, but only a few years ago there were upwards of four hundred houses unoccupied. Evidently the persons who had built those houses then unoccupied had built too quickly, and the houses now being built in this town are in response to a legitimate demand. In one case, as in the other, there is no proof furnished at all that the owners of unoccupied sites deserve to be punished because these sites are not built upon. They will be built on soon enough. As soon as demanded, houses will be built—everybody knows that. Has there been any reason at all given for bringing in this Bill? I do not remember having heard of a single speech in advocacy of it. Honourable gentlemen who justify it by the argument for taxing the unearned increment entirely mistake the two subjects of general and local taxation; they rest on entirely different grounds. The Hon. Mr. Kelly pointed out that the selfish proprietor of land who forebore from making improvements should be taxed as a sort of punishment for selfishly standing by while his neighbours give value to his land. As pointed out by the Hon. Mr. Stevens, the owner of improved lands is taxed more because he makes more use of the means which are provided by taxation than his neighbour who leaves his ground vacant. How can you force a man to build before a legitimate demand arises? A demand will arise as soon as you get an increased number of users to justify those who have unoccupied sites building upon them. As for the taxation proposed meeting the case put by the Hon. Mr. Bolt, it will do nothing of the kind. The person who in future refrains from building houses on his site will, if the community increases and prospers, inevitably get the unearned increment. This taxation will not deprive the owner of it. Not at all. Probably the alteration will be very small indeed. Although, as has been pointed out by the Hon. Mr. Stevens, this Bill has no connection with the theory of Henry George and the single-tax or the unearned increment, yet it is one of those steps taken in compliance with the ignorant demand now heard, under the delusion that it may become more easy to adopt the single-tax. I can see no other reason for the proposal. I have not heard a recommendation or seen a sound argument in favour of it, and I hope the Council will reject it.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I intend to vote against the Bill, and I do so, first of all, thinking it is not wanted, and that there is no demand for such a measure. It seems to be the endeavour of the Government to bring forward a measure dealing with every conceivable question, so as to interfere with the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the colony. It is said by the Hon. Mr. Kelly that this was not upon the principle of "one man one vote," but that the ratepayers would have a certain number of votes, up to five, which is the case at present. We find a Bill before the Legislature—which, fortunately, has been withdrawn—the Municipal Corporations Bill, which provided that every man in a borough should only have one vote—in fact, that every person on the electoral roll for members of the Legislature should be entitled to vote for the election of members of the Corporation. The Bill gave authority to raise loans and to levy heavy rates; and what for? So that the money might be expended among them, and might be the means of providing employment, not for bonâ fide workmen, but for a number of loafers.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—What are "loafers"?

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I refer the honourable gentleman to the dictionary. In addition to this, the Bill is badly drafted, and I think that is sufficient reason why it should be rejected. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Council any further. I simply wanted to give the reasons why I shall vote against the Bill. I hope the Council will reject it by a large majority: in fact, I should like to see it rejected unanimously.

The Hon. Mr. KERR.—Sir, it is my intention to support the Bill, and I should do so more warmly were it not optional, and were it to be carried out by every County Council, Road Board—by every local body. I was very much amused yesterday, when the Bill was introduced, by the manner in which the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn introduced Henry George as a man whose ideas and theories are exploded, and who was termed “a crank” by the Americans. To show he is not a crank, I may state that not three months ago the New York Legislature unanimously invited him to deliver an address to them on the solution of the question of providing for the unemployed. He did address that Legislature, and made a powerful speech, occupying two hours, and the House accorded him a vote of thanks. That does not look as if he was a crank, when a body of intelligent men such as I have mentioned asked him as a favour to address them on a very difficult question. That ought to place him in the front rank of those who are acquainted with the labour difficulties. I am not generally put down as a single-taxer, nor have I studied very much the principles of the single-tax; but from what I have heard and read in connection with Henry George no one would say he was a crank, but a very intelligent man, who had handled the questions he treated of very intelligently. I was also surprised, and, in fact, greatly surprised, to hear gentlemen like the Hon. Mr. Stevens, the Hon. Mr. Oliver, and the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn come forward and declaim against this measure as not being in the interests of the poor man. I have looked upon this Bill from the opposite direction altogether, as being one in the interests of the poor man; and, notwithstanding the speeches made, I am still of that opinion. It is not the people who put up large buildings who wish to throw the burden of taxation on to the unoccupied sections; it is quite the reverse.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—And the smaller houses.

The Hon. Mr. KERR.—Those who hold unoccupied sections wish improved property to pay the burden of taxation. It is unfair, in my opinion, to tax a man on account of improving his property. If the unimproved value were taxed, instead of the buildings, all would come in for a share of taxation. Now, I would ask, is it the poor man that holds the sections in towns like Wellington, Christchurch, and Dunedin? I say, No, they are held by capitalists and financial institutions, banks, and insurance companies; and they have built on the portions they require, and allow the vacant spaces to remain until their value is enhanced, and they find a good purchaser. I consider these sections, in the interests of the property-holders in the different cities, should be taxed, so as to cause these institutions to pay a reasonable and fair amount towards the support of the towns. It is very good to have these sections, I have no doubt; but immediately this Bill is passed a certain amount of taxation will be levied on these unimproved properties, and the result will be that they will come under the hammer of the auctioneer. The capitalists will soon get quit of them if they find they have large amounts to pay in taxation; and those who buy them will no doubt see their way to build on their sections and make a profit, and they will simply have the ground-value to pay on in the way of taxation, and nothing on their property. Every town in the colony has a large number of these sections, which will grow more valuable as population increases. Cities grow, gas companies are formed and gas is laid on, water-works are established, public works are carried on, streets and footways are formed, town halls are built, and all the rest; and therefore the value of these unimproved sections is increased. Now, I do not think it is right that those people who build should be punished, in the way of taxation being placed upon them, for being thrifty, zealous, and enterprising; while those who hold unoccupied sections are no good whatever to the community or to the revenue of the country. Therefore I think if the owners are compelled to build or to sell to others that would build, it would promote the general activity of trade in the towns, and cause a great amount of prosperity that we for some time have lacked. I look upon the condition of these unoccupied sections as nothing more nor less than shameful, and trust the Bill will go through, so as to cause them to be built upon, thereby wiping away those eyesores that we meet with as we pass along the streets of the larger towns. I allude to vacant sections with a few sheets of old iron fencing them in. This is one of the best Bills that could be introduced, because it will not affect the poor man, but will simply make those who can well afford it pay taxation for their unoccupied sections. If it were the poor man who would be affected I could understand the Bill being opposed; but I am confident in my own mind that it will affect those who have money and could build, if so inclined. We know there is a scarcity of houses for men with moderate incomes; they cannot get houses unless they go two or three miles out of a city. We know that the suburban lands of Wellington and Dunedin, and other places, are held in large areas, and, until a favourable opportunity occurs to sell, will still be so held, and tradesmen and poor people cannot get so much land as to build a home on, unless by mortgaging at ruinous prices. I need detain the Council no longer. I believe this is a good Bill, and I believe it is one of many good Bills that have been introduced in the interests of the great mass of the people; and, if it be for the good of the mass of the people, capital must hang its head for a little while, and give those who have been hanging their heads for many years a chance to hold them up.

Hon. Mr. Reynolds

Debate adjourned.

The Council adjourned at a quarter to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, 28th September, 1894.

Tariff Revision Committee—Scoria-ash Carriage on Railways—Wairarapa Unemployed—Dairies Bill—Minister of Railways—Government Printing Office—Horowhenua County Bridges—Public Works Statement—Domain and Cemetery Boards—Government House Fence—Waitahuna Gold-prospecting—Clareville Telephone—Members of the House of Representatives also Members of Education Boards—Delegate to England to float Companies—Female Factory-Inspectors—Kaitangata Riding—Declarations before Postmasters—Wanganui Art-unions—Bank of New Zealand—P. P. Whitiki—Ministerial Allowances—Producing Documents in the Supreme Court—Adjournment—New Zealand Consols Bill—Native Land Court Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

TARIFF REVISION COMMITTEE.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Government, Whether they have considered the reports and recommendations of the Tariff Revision Committee; and, if so, will the Government state to the House the decision arrived at in connection therewith?

Mr. SEDDON said the Government had not considered the recommendations made by the Tariff Committee.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked what the recommendations were.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable member was just as well aware of the position as he (Mr. Seddon) was. Under the circumstances, he hoped later on to be able to tell the House what the Government intended to do in the matter.

SCORIA-ASH CARRIAGE ON RAILWAYS.

Major HARRIS asked the Government, If they will approach the Railway Commissioners with a view of obtaining a reduction in the charges to Road Boards in the Auckland Province for conveyance of scoria ash? He wished to point out that there was a large quantity of scoria in many districts in the Auckland Province, and scoria was very much required for road-metalling purposes. All they wanted was that a reduction might be made in the charge for carriage.

Mr. SEDDON said the following was the reply of the Commissioners: "The Commissioners have now under consideration a readjustment of the various commodities at present under Class Q in the tariff, with a view to lightening the charges in some respects. Scoria ash is among these articles."

WAIRARAPA UNEMPLOYED.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Government, Whether they will take immediate steps to relieve the distress of the unemployed in the Wairarapa district? In putting the question standing in his name, he wished to say that for months past the district which he represented had a large number of men who were unable to get employment. He had mentioned this to the Government before, and in yesterday's Post there appeared the following telegram:—

"Ten hungry men took charge of the kitchen at Blairlogie Station on Tuesday, and helped themselves. They were arrested by Constable Collerton, and brought to Masterton. They appeared before Mr. Hutchison, S.M., to-day, and, after telling a woeful tale of the hardships of the swaggar's life, were convicted and discharged."

He had no explanation to make in putting this question, except to say that this unfortunate state of affairs had existed during the whole winter. To his own knowledge, twenty-two unemployed men were found in food and accommodation for a single night by one settler. The Government had taken steps in the case of other districts to find employment for men out of work, and he hoped the Government would not consider Wairarapa undeserving of similar consideration.

Mr. REEVES said that nobody ever thought that the population of Wairarapa was less deserving than that of other districts in the colony. The Government did their best to help on deserving persons everywhere throughout New Zealand. The honourable gentleman's statement went to show that there was distress in his district, but also that there was considerably less distress there than there was some months ago, because the figures cited by the honourable gentleman sank into insignificance compared with the figures he quoted three months ago. It was true that there were men in the Wairarapa district out of work, but the information of the department was that the number had considerably decreased during the past month.

DAIRIES BILL.

Mr. E. M. SMITH asked the Minister of Agriculture, Whether the Dairies Bill will be dealt with this session? The people in his district wanted to know if this Bill would be proceeded with, because the present state of affairs was retarding the opening of the freezing-works at Waitara.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE might say the Government considered the Dairy Industries Bill one of great importance. He hoped on Monday to get that Bill from the Committee, and to have it before the House on Wednesday or Thursday, and he trusted it would become law this session.

MINISTER OF RAILWAYS.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE asked the Premier,—(1.) If it is the intention of the Government to appoint a Minister of Railways during the present, or before the next, meeting of Parliament? (2.) If so, is such Minister to be one of the present Cabinet Ministers? (3.) If not, does Government propose to increase the number of Cabinet Ministers without the sanction of Parliament? (4.) What salary, if any, does Government propose to attach to the new portfolio of Minister of Railways?

Mr. SEDDON said he replied to this question on the previous day, and he could only repeat the reply he then gave—namely, that the matter was under the consideration of the Government. The Government would not take control of the railways until the 1st of January next, and between the 1st of January and the meeting of Parliament it was a question whether there should be additional expense incurred in the direction indicated in the honourable gentleman's question. However, the matter was under consideration, and he would take the House into the confidence of the Government probably later on. It was certainly a most important matter.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Government, Will they, before incurring any further expense in adding to the Government Printing Office, have the building examined by experts in the printing trade, so that additions may be made in a way to remedy, as far as possible, the defects of the present building so far as lighting is concerned?

Mr. CADMAN said that, in making arrangements for the extension of the Printing Office, provision would be made to give extra light.

HOROWHENUA COUNTY BRIDGES.

Mr. WILSON asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will assist the Horowhenua County Council (on the same principle as the Rangitikei County Council was assisted to build a bridge over the Rangitikei River at Vinegar Hill) by a subsidy of pound for pound to build the bridges on the Main West Coast Road of the North Island in their county? His reason for asking this question was that the Horowhenua County Council was not able, out of its own funds or by borrowing, to provide sufficient money to construct these bridges, and their absence was very dangerous to life. The land had been handed over to the Railway Company, and so there were no "thirds" coming from it, and the Council had had no assistance from Government to help them in settling the country. He hoped, therefore, the Government would come to the assistance of the County Council, so as to enable them to construct the necessary bridges on these lines of communication.

Mr. J. McKENZIE might say that he looked upon the Horowhenua County as being in a different position altogether from the Rangitikei County in connection with the lands held by each county. A large quantity of land in the Horowhenua County was purchased by the Manawatu Railway Company, and the company also purchased lands direct from the Natives. Consequently the Government could not see their way to comply with the honourable gentleman's request. The Government had received almost no land revenue from the Horowhenua County, and therefore he could hold out no hope of any large subsidy being granted. However, the Government was quite prepared to consider any special case on its merits.

PUBLIC WORKS STATEMENT.

Mr. MITCHELSON asked the Premier, When he proposes to lay the Public Works Statement before this House?

Mr. SEDDON said his reply to this question was one that must be as acceptable to the honourable gentleman as it would be to the House. The Statement would be brought down so soon as the Government knew what funds were available for works. He was not in a position to bring it down until the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill was passed through another branch of the Legislature. He was now speaking to one who knew the position. Until the Government knew what their ways and means were he could not possibly bring down the Public Works Statement. It was no fault of his or of the honourable member's. He would bring the Statement down at the earliest possible moment.

DOMAIN AND CEMETERY BOARDS.

Mr. BUDDO asked the Government, If they will, during the recess, move to have legislation prepared to deal with the question of making Domain and Cemetery Boards elective bodies? He made no charge against the administration of these Boards, but he trusted the system would be changed, and that therefore the Government would give this question favourable consideration.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said this was a matter that had been under the consideration of himself and other members of the Government whenever the question came up about the appointment of new members. He might say that no special demand had been made upon the Government to change the present system, and in this, as in other matters, it would be very difficult to please everybody. He thought it was a subject that might fairly be considered when the question of the extension of local government came to be dealt with by that House. He might inform the honourable gentleman that the Government did not appoint or nominate any class of men without consulting the people in the district. The people in the district were asked to nominate men for a Domain Board. The names were submitted to the chairman, and after his approval they were forwarded for the approval of the Governor. He was inclined to think that in every case where local bodies could appoint Domain Boards they should do so. In some cases the members of the Board had been appointed for some time, and the Government could not very well ask these gentlemen to retire all in a body for the purpose of handing the appointments over to a local body; but it was a question that must be considered when local government came to be dealt with.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE FENCE.

Mr. MILLS asked the Premier, If he will, during the recess, give instructions to have the present unsightly fence around the Government House removed, so as to dispense with its prison-like appearance in the centre of the town, then have the trees trimmed and a fence suitable to the buildings erected? The recent improvements made in the grounds surrounding the Parliament Buildings had induced him to put this question on the Order Paper, and he thought it was quite time that an alteration should be made in the fence surrounding Government House.

Mr. SEDDON said this was a matter which he would like to consult His Excellency the Governor upon. He did not think it would be right for the Government to do anything that might be against His Excellency's wishes in respect to the fence surrounding Government House. He would consult His Excellency in reference to the matter, and would inform the honourable gentleman of the result.

Mr. R. THOMPSON hoped the honourable gentleman would take into consideration the taxpayers of the colony.

Mr. SEDDON said that, of course, they were always to be considered.

WAITAHUNA GOLD-PROSPECTING.

Mr. ALLEN asked the Minister of Mines, if he will give some assistance to the prospecting for gold in the Waitahuna district?

Mr. CADMAN said, if the settlers in the Waitahuna district would adopt Part XV. of the regulations under the Mining Act, which related to prospecting, he would be glad to place them on the same footing as other mining districts.

CLAREVILLE TELEPHONE.

30. Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Postmaster-General, Whether he will take the necessary steps to establish a telephone station at Clareville? The population of this district was increasing very fast, and it would be a great public convenience if the Government could see their way to grant this convenience. The poles already existed all along the line, and therefore the expense would be very small.

Mr. REEVES said he was informed that the matter was under consideration, and it was quite possible that a favourable answer would be given to the honourable gentleman.

MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ALSO MEMBERS OF EDUCATION BOARDS.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Government, Is it true that certain members of the House of Representatives who are also members of Education Boards are in the habit of charging their railway-fare as an item in their expenses while travelling free under the parliamentary pass; and, if so, will they take steps to have the practice at once discontinued? He would like to observe that this was not an agreeable question to have to ask, and nothing but a very stern sense of duty could have impelled him to place it upon the Order Paper. If the suggestion in that statement were true, it was a most reprehensible practice, and most improper.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman must not make such reflections on other honourable members in asking a question, seeing that the introduction of debatable matter was entirely prohibited by Standing Orders.

Mr. COLLINS thought he was justified in saying that the practice was reprehensible if it was carried on.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Whom do you allude to?

Mr. COLLINS said he alluded to the members who were guilty of the practice.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Liberals?

Mr. COLLINS said, whether they were Liberals or not, the practice was one which should at once be put a stop to. He thought the country had a right to demand it.

Mr. REEVES said, could such things be? He hoped not. Was it true? The Government had no reason to suppose it was true. They had absolutely no information on the subject. If the honourable gentleman had such information he would, of course, be very glad to get it from him, and would undertake that the attention of the Boards in question should be called to it at once; but if there were simply rumours on the subject he would recommend the School Committees in the district in which the rumours were current to turn their attention to the members of the Board suspected, and whom they elected. The School Committees elected the members of the Boards, and the School Committees ought to look after them.

Mr. MEREDITH said this question had been on the Order Paper for several days, and the Minister, if he chose, could have communicated with the secretaries of the various Boards and ascertained the truthfulness or not of the allegations. So far as the North Canterbury Education Board was concerned, there was no truth in the statement of the honourable member who asked the question.

Mr. SPEAKER said he could not allow any discussion on the subject of a question and the answer that was given to it.

Mr. REEVES, with the permission of the House, might state that, having no reason whatever to suppose that the suggestion was well founded, it was not for him to assume that it was well founded, and telegraph to thirteen Education Boards on the subject.

DELEGATE TO ENGLAND TO FLOAT COMPANIES.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE asked the Government, Whether they propose giving effect to the recommendation of the Tariff and Industries Committee, that a delegate be despatched to England at the expense of the colony to promote and float companies; and, if so, whether they will undertake that no member of this House shall receive any part of the moneys to be expended? He did not wish it to be understood that he desired to touch the feelings of any honourable member. He had merely placed the question on the Order Paper in order that the Government might give the House an opportunity of hearing from them that they had no intention to subsidise any member of the House to go on such an expedition as was contemplated in the recommendation of the Committee. To his mind, it was not decent of a member to accept it, and he thought the House should now hear that the Government had no intention to do what had been recommended.

Mr. SEDDON had said, in answer to a question by the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. G. J. Smith), that the Government had not considered the recommendation of the Tariff Committee. He did not think, unless there was very good cause indeed shown for such a recommendation as this, that the Government could take upon themselves to do what had been recommended; but it would be unfair to the Committee for the Government to come to a hurried conclusion without having gone through the evidence, to see whether or not the Committee were warranted in making the recommendation.

FEMALE FACTORY-INSPECTORS.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked, Whether the female Inspectors in connection with the Factory Acts whose salaries have been provided for in the estimates have been appointed, and, if not, when will they be so appointed?

Mr. REEVES said a glance at page 8 of the Labour Report would give the honourable gentleman information with regard to the lady Inspector who was appointed in March last. The sum for the payment of the second lady Inspector was only voted a few weeks ago, and was not, in fact, yet appropriated. When the first lady Inspector, who was now going round the colony, and taking a preliminary survey of the female workers of the colony, had finished her report of all the districts, then the appointment of a second one would be taken into consideration, and, if she was appointed, of course a division of the work between both of them would be considered.

KAITANGATA RIDING.

Mr. ALLEN asked the Government, If they have received any communication asking them to introduce an amendment of the River Boards Act so as to provide for the representation of Kaitangata and the Kaitangata Riding on the Clutha River Board, and further to provide for certain other alterations in the River Boards Act? If so, will they state the nature of the amendments asked for, and what action they propose to take to give effect to the same?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said a proposal was received in June last from the Mayor of Kaitangata asking that a new River Board Act should be passed, with the view of allowing the Kaitangata Borough to have a representative upon the Clutha River Trust Board. Virtually it would be an amendment of the Clutha River Trust Board to bring in any legislation of this sort. After giving this matter careful consideration the Government did not think it advisable on their part to introduce legislation this session on the subject. At any rate, seeing that the question was only raised in June last, he thought it would be quite soon enough for the Government to introduce legislation when they knew the wishes of the people of the district. His own opinion was that the measure should be a local Bill. If the people of the district were united on this matter, and wished that there should be a new trust created, he thought they should take the initiative, and not the Government.

Mr. ALLEN understood that it would be necessary that the River Boards Act should be amended, which was a public measure; he did not know that a local Bill could amend such a public measure. He might say that the people were determined about this matter, and he thought the Government knew that.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said any legislation on this matter would practically mean the repeal of the Clutha River Trust, and he thought that before anything was done the people of the district should have full time to consider the matter.

DECLARATIONS BEFORE POSTMASTERS.

Mr. McNAB asked the Minister of Lands, Will he give greater facilities than at present exist for applications under Parts III., IV., V., or VI. of "The Land Act, 1892," by allowing the necessary declarations to be made before local Postmasters where no Justices are resident within a convenient distance?

Mr. J. McKENZIE did not think it was advisable to have all Postmasters of the colony signing declarations of this sort. It was very important that such declarations should be signed before a Justice of the Peace. There had already been several cases in which some people narrowly escaped being lodged in Her Majesty's gaols for making declarations in a slipshod manner. Even some Justices of the Peace did not know the gravity of the offence which was committed in signing declarations before the requirements of the law were complied with. In any district where there was a demand for land surely some one could become a Justice of the Peace, so that such declarations could be made before him.

WANGANUI ART-UNIONS.

Mr. WILLIS asked the Premier, Why is it that the police gave notice to the combined friendly societies in Wanganui that no articles other than bona fide works of art as specified by Act would be allowed to be drawn for by art-union under the Lotteries Act, when in other centres in New Zealand bicycles, furniture, cows, horses, pigs, and firewood are allowed to be publicly so disposed of? It was necessary to state that the friendly societies of Wanganui had nothing whatever to say against the law being strictly enforced, but their complaint was that they were being treated strictly while in other centres of the colony the law was being openly violated.

Mr. SEDDON said, on inquiry from the head of the police, he had received the following reply: "Nothing is known of this matter here. A report has been called for." He thought the honourable member should have given some information so as to throw some light upon the question. He would like to know in what parts of the colony pigs were considered and treated as works of art. It was quite true, if the facts were as stated, that there had been a violation of the law. He knew that applications had been made with respect to some beautiful china, but the Government had been very strict, and the Colonial Secretary had refused the application. He would be only too glad to see that the law was carried out impartially, and that all parts of the colony were treated alike.

Mr. T. Mackenzie

Mr. WILLIS said he had tickets referring to the different articles in his possession. Such lotteries had taken place at Palmerston, Christchurch, and other places.

Mr. BELL said the Colonial Secretary had given permission for an art-union in which one of the prizes was a sucking-pig.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

Captain RUSSELL said he would like to ask the Premier if, in connection with the election of directors of the Bank of New Zealand, the Government would inform the House when they proposed to appoint a President of the bank, and also an Auditor.

Mr. SEDDON said the Government were attending to this matter. He had hoped to be in a position that day to give some information to the House on the subject. The Government were awaiting information, and on receipt of that information he would give it to the honourable member.

Captain RUSSELL asked if the Premier would assure the House that the appointment would be made before the termination of the session.

Mr. SEDDON hoped to have both the appointments made within a week.

P. P. WHITIKI.

Mr. PERE asked the Native Minister, Whether the Government has caused inquiry to be made into the petition of Paora Patu Whiti, Nos. 122 and 126, 1886, in accordance with the report of the Native Affairs Committee of that year; and, if not, will the Native Minister instruct the Stipendiary Magistrate for the Bay of Plenty district, or some other officer, to inquire into the matter?

Mr. SEDDON said inquiry was made by Mr. Brabant, Stipendiary Magistrate, who reported as follows:—

"The land referred to is within the confiscated boundary line, and is part of the block known as Lot 63, Matata. It was awarded in 1867 by the Compensation Court to the Ngatipikiao, and subsequently sold by them to the Government. The petitioners, the Tawera Tribe, assert that the land was theirs before the confiscation, and not Ngatipikiao's as decided by the Court. Even if this were so, however, they could have no claim to it after confiscation, as they were in rebellion, and had to be satisfied with the award of the Crown Agent—viz., Lots 65 and 21, Matata, 1,695 acres, which land is in the same locality."

The petitioner was so informed in a letter of which the following was a translation:—

"Native Office, Wellington,
"28th October, 1886.

"FRIENDS,—Salutations. Your petition to the House applying for the rehearing of Whakarewa and Kawerau No. 2 Blocks has been forwarded to the Government, with a recommendation to have the facts inquired into. And this is to inform you that, after careful inquiry into your application, the Minister of Native Affairs is of opinion that it cannot be granted.—Yours, &c.,

"T. W. LEWIS.

"To Paora Pata Whiti, To Umutika, "Matata, Bay of Plenty."

MINISTERIAL ALLOWANCES.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Premier, When he expects to be able to render the return ordered on the 4th July last as to Ministerial allowances and expenses?

Mr. SEDDON said he would inquire as to the delay in reference to this return.

PRODUCING DOCUMENTS IN THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. SEDDON said there was a matter he wished to bring under the notice of the House. A summons had been granted by the Supreme Court asking that the Clerk of the House should attend and bring with him a petition that had been lodged with the House, and produce it and other documents in the Supreme Court. He thought the House had jealously guarded its position in respect of documents, papers, and petitions lodged with it in the past. The question now was, whether or not Mr. Speaker should be asked by the House to exercise his rights as Speaker and refuse to grant what was demanded. He thought on this occasion they should follow the course that had hitherto obtained, and that the Supreme Court should not have the power to do this. It was not an occasion, so far as he knew, in which it should be done. It would be a most inconvenient thing if the Clerk of Parliaments was to be taken away, especially during the session, and asked to produce these papers; and he therefore moved, That the request be refused.

Mr. SPEAKER said he would read the Standing Order which bore upon the subject. It was No. 253, and was as follows:—

"No Clerk or officer of this House, or shorthand writer employed to take minutes of evidence before this House or any Committee thereof, may give evidence elsewhere in respect of any proceedings or examination had at the Bar, or before any Committee of this House, without the special leave of the House."

It was now moved that the House declines to grant leave to the Clerk of the House to attend in obedience to the summons for the production of several parliamentary papers now in his custody as the records of the House.

Mr. BELL said there were two questions. The first the Premier had referred to, as to the inconvenience which might be caused by the Clerk's absence. The Parliamentary Privileges Act entitled Mr. Speaker to prevent the departure of any officer of Parliament during the session. The question of inconvenience to the House could easily be settled by the ordinary order postponing the trial while the Clerk's attendance was required in Parliament. On the second question, and the far more important one, he would venture to suggest that there were two sides to it. It would never do for the House to allow its papers, as a matter of course, to be overhauled in a Court of law. On the other hand, the House should not refuse the production of papers which were material to the determination of a matter between the parties, simply because those papers happened to have come into the custody of the House. No injury could be caused to any person by the production of the papers, because the Parliamentary Privileges Act hedged round with the completest privilege any person who made a statement to a Committee of the House. No person could be injured by the discovery of the fact that he had made any statement of any kind. It might well be that evidence given before the Committees might be material to the determination of questions in the Supreme Court. He knew something about this matter, though he might as well tell the House he had nothing whatever to do with it at present, although at one time he had care of a petition in connection with the Horowhenua Block—one of the petitions on behalf of Major Kemp—which it was now asked the House should give leave to produce. Many members were aware of the questions which had arisen about this block, but, with the permission of the House, he would state why it was that this evidence was material. The Horowhenua Block consisted of 50,000 acres, and originally stood in the name of Major Kemp alone, the other owners being registered in the books of the Native Land Court. Major Kemp held a certificate of title as the sole owner of this block, as trustee for a number of Natives who were registered as owners. Then, upon the partition of the block, sections were allotted to different Natives, members of the tribe, including the Hunia family, and including Major Kemp himself; and there was left a block unallotted of about 14,000 acres, standing in the name of Major Kemp, as trustee for the Muaupoko Tribe, whose settlement and cultivations were on this block. The Hunia family objected, and accordingly the Court then added the name of Warena Hunia to that of Major Kemp, these two men being left the certificated owners of the 14,000 acres upon which the Muaupoko Tribe were living and were settled.

Mr. SPEAKER desired to know if the honourable member's present remarks affected the matter of privilege as to whether these documents were to be produced or not. It appeared to him that the merits of the case were being opened up.

Mr. BELL said they did, and he was endeavouring to show why it was that the House should allow the documents to be produced. There were circumstances in which the House would—in order that justice might be done, and to prevent injustice being done—give permission, and he would proceed to show that this was such a case.

Mr. SPEAKER said this case was now about to come under the consideration of the Supreme Court. Was it fitting that the House should discuss its merits? There might be some question of the propriety of the House anticipating the action of the Court by expressing its views on a matter sub judice.

Mr. BELL would bow to Mr. Speaker's decision, but he was endeavouring to avoid discussing the merits of the case. He had stated nothing up to this point that was in dispute.

Mr. SPEAKER would draw the honourable gentleman's attention to the propriety of abstaining from discussing a matter that was about to come under the consideration of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BELL said he granted that was so; but he wished Mr. Speaker to see the difficulty he was in in arguing that this was a case where the House would give its permission for the production of evidence. For that purpose it was necessary for him to state the facts, without entering into controversial matters.

Mr. SPEAKER thought it was very desirable they should do nothing that might have the semblance of encroaching upon the proper functions of the Supreme Court in discussing a case of this kind which was pending in the highest Court of law, the Supreme Court.

Mr. BELL submitted that it was a case in which the House should grant the leave.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman must confine himself to showing why such leave should be granted. He only wanted to protect the privileges of the House, and, at the same time, not to show any tendency to encroach upon a matter belonging to the Supreme Court by debating it in the House before it was dealt with before the proper tribunal, the Supreme Court.

Mr. BELL said he would obey Mr. Speaker's request in spirit as well as in the letter. He was not speaking as an advocate, but only as one who happened to have a knowledge of this case, in order that the House might be informed of what the Natives required. There was no dispute as to the facts. The two Natives, Hunia and Kemp, had become the certificated owners of a block of 14,000 acres, upon which the Muaupoko were settled. Then Hunia claimed that the order of the Native Land Court had made him the actual owner. There was no trust mentioned in the order of the Land Court; but two Committees of that House had reported that beyond all question it was a trust. He was not expressing an opinion upon that point, but he would simply refer the House to the reports of the Native Affairs Committees of two separate sessions upon the question. There was documentary evidence in the possession of the House, and a petition signed by Hunia, stating facts on the one side; and on the other side there were papers and petitions signed by Kemp, also stating facts, and evidence given before those Committees was also in the possession of the House. He thought, if the House had done him the honour of following him, it would see that no possible injury could be done to any person by the House saying that the litigants' petition and evidence as given before the House should be available to the Supreme Court, in order that it might be able to see what had been the several statements made by those persons before the several Committees of the House. It appeared to him to be a case where leave should be given, and he begged to move, as an amendment, That leave be given.

Mr. Bell

Sir R. STOUT did not think that the House was competent to express an opinion either way on this matter. The proper thing to do would be to set up a small Committee of Privileges to see whether the documents ought to be given or not. He understood that there was a lawsuit between Kemp, on the one side, as representing the Muaupoko Tribe, and Hunia on the other side. He did not know who had asked for the documents, but he might say what would happen if the House refused the documents. The parties who lost the lawsuit through such refusal would petition the House for relief, and endless trouble hereafter would be entailed. He would suggest that a Committee should be appointed consisting of five or six members—Mr. Speaker, the Premier, Captain Russell, and one or two others—who should report whether the documents should be produced or not, the whole of the members of the Committee selected to be those who had nothing whatever to do with the case one way or another. Both motion and amendment should be withdrawn; and the Committee might bring up a report on Monday, which would settle the matter once for all.

Mr. GUINNESS disagreed with the suggestion made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), on the ground that he thought that every person who sent a petition to or who in any way approached Parliament knew that whatever he gave in evidence, or whatever took place before the Committee, was a privileged communication; and it would be unfair to one party to allow another to get hold of any information or communication that had been sent to the House, in order that it might be used in Court. Such information should only be used in those cases where both parties to a litigation agreed that the documents and papers that had been presented to Parliament should be produced before the Court.

Mr. HEKE thought, as far as the Standing Orders were concerned, it was within the power of the House to grant or to refuse the papers referred to. It was only fair that the House should grant the permission applied for, as it had had petitions on the subject for several years, and also two or three during the present session. When the last petition was before the Native Affairs Committee this session the whole matter was postponed on account of the action pending in the Supreme Court. In the meantime the Muaupoko Tribe had been deprived of their rights, and had been kept in suspense waiting for an inquiry to be made into their petition. He thought it would be only fair and reasonable for the House to take into its serious consideration the application for the papers, and grant the same. It was immaterial to him whether or not the matter was referred to a Committee, as suggested by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), but he would urge the House to grant the leave, and if any tribunal were able to settle the matter this session it would be far more beneficial both to the House and also to the tribe the petition referred to.

Mr. SEDDON said that on reference to Hansard he had found the following case, in which a similar application had been made. The reference was in Hansard, page 491, June-July, 1889:—

“Mr. MITCHELSON said the Government intended to oppose this motion. During the recess the honourable member applied to Mr. Speaker to be supplied with evidence taken before the Native Affairs Committee. Mr. Speaker communicated with the Clerk of the House, and application was made to the Government to ascertain whether they had any objection to a copy of the evidence being supplied. After consideration, the Government came to the conclusion that it would be entirely wrong to supply it. It appeared that the honourable member desired to obtain the evidence for the purpose of enabling a solicitor to use it in the Supreme Court, and the Government considered that documents in the possession of the House should not be used for that purpose. He would ask the House to negative the motion.”

Sir R. STOUT.—What was the case?

Mr. SEDDON said it was in reference to an application made by Taiwhanga. It was negatived by a large majority. He might say that there was great danger if they departed from well-recognised rules, and the present case was not one in which an extreme course should be taken. It was only in an extreme case where such an application as this should be granted. The honourable member for the Northern Maori District had told the House that this question had been before the Native Affairs Committee, and that that Committee had refused to go into the matter because it was then before the Supreme Court. To show the position, he might say that there were on that Committee certain members who had in the past been connected with the matter under consideration, and very properly they would not vote on the question. Therefore, on that ground the House should keep to those well-defined lines which were absolutely safe. The honourable member for the Northern Maori District knew that there were members who held opposite views, and here came the application: what was the position of those people in this matter? Where persons who came before Committees and tendered their evidence felt that they were protected, and had privileges, it would shake their confidence if the evidence was liable to be made public, and he thought that they ought not to allow that confidence that existed in those persons in relation to anything they said or did to be shaken by such things being brought against them elsewhere. He would therefore ask the House to negative the amendment moved by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). With regard to the suggestion to refer this particular matter to a Committee, he did not think that would answer, because it was a question as to whether any officer of the House was to be taken away by the wish of the majority. This objection was a fatal one, and, under the circumstances, he thought that the House would do well not to refer the matter to a Select Committee, as nothing would be gained. He would ask the House to disagree with the amendment, and to continue to act in accordance with the resolution it had passed. He had forgotten to say that the honourable member for Eden had asked the Government whether they would legislate in respect of this very question this session. A Bill had been presented to the Government, and was now under consideration. At all events, they should be quite content to pass an Act which would prevent any advantage being taken by one side over the other. If this course was not followed, and the matter was to be dealt with by the Supreme Court, the House would be placed at a disadvantage.

Mr. HOUSTON might state that petitions in regard to the Horowhenua Block had been before the Native Affairs Committee for the last three or four years, and the Committee recognised that there was a considerable amount of difficulty in connection with them. The Committee had come to a conclusion with regard to Block No. 11. This session a petition came before the Committee from Major Kemp upon the same subject, but the Committee became aware that a case was pending in the Supreme Court on this matter, and decided that it would be unwise for the Committee to enter into the matter under the circumstances. Consequently, he understood the petition was withdrawn. A short time ago he received a letter from a firm of solicitors asking that one of the petitions from Warena Hunia should be delivered up to them, to be made use of at a sitting of the Supreme Court at Wanganui. The letter was as follows:—

“Wellington, 7th September, 1894.

“DEAR SIR,—Horowhenua No. 11: There is an action set down for hearing at the Wanganui sittings of the Supreme Court on the 25th instant, at which it is necessary to have the petition presented to Parliament by Warena Hunia, dated the 27th July, 1891, produced. We understand that the petition is under your control, and we should be glad to know if you will authorise the handing of the same to the Registrar of the Supreme Court at Wellington, with instructions to him to cause same to be produced to the Court at its sitting at Wanganui, and to be returned to you, or to some officer you may name, as soon as the Court or the Judge has finished with it. We will, if you wish it, issue a subpoena to any person you may name.—Yours obediently, “BROWN AND DEAN.

“R. M. Houston, Esq., M.H.R., “Chairman, Native Affairs Committee,
“Parliament Buildings.”

He felt that he had no power to grant that request; and he caused a letter to be written to the firm of solicitors, as follows:—

“Native Affairs Committee,
“House of Representatives,
“Wellington, 10th September, 1894.

“DEAR SIRS,—I am directed by the Chairman of the Native Affairs Committee, House of Representatives, to acknowledge the receipt of your favour of the 7th instant, and, in reply, to inform you that it will be necessary to obtain an order of the Court for the production of Warena Hunia's petition of 1891. The Chairman is advised that this is the only course by which the petition you require can be removed from the custody of the House.—Yours, &c., “F. HARTMANN,

“Clerk, Native Affairs Committee,
“House of Representatives.

“Messrs. Brown and Dean,
“Barristers and solicitors, Wellington.”

He had consulted several honourable members on the subject, and he came to the conclusion that it was his duty to adopt this course; and, as the matter was now under discussion, he thought the question ought to be considered as to whether there should not be a distinct understanding that any Chairman of Committees situated in this way had no authority to give up any records or papers that came before him as Chairman of the Committee. He was glad the matter had come before the House, in order that he might state his views, and in order that other honourable gentlemen might also state their views on the subject.

Mr. PERE said this matter had been before the Native Affairs Committee, and he had asked that Committee to come to some settlement with regard to it, but the Committee replied that the matter was before the Supreme Court, and any decision they might give might prejudice the hearing in the Supreme Court. The Committee considered that it would be better to adjourn the hearing of the petition until the Supreme Court had dealt with the Horowhenua case, then pending in that Court. In his opinion it was not a very weighty question, and it could be easily solved. The land belonged to the whole tribe, and the two men were in the title as trustees for the tribe. The Natives had been petitioning for many years, and the Government, instead of settling the matter, were prolonging it. He thought, under the circumstances, that the House should let the Supreme Court have the documents asked for; and the House should take an impartial view of the matter. Several members had advised the litigants to withdraw the case from the Supreme Court, but they would not do so; therefore, if they suffered loss in the Supreme Court, it was their own fault. The Native Affairs Committee had also advised the litigants to withdraw the case from the Supreme Court and allow the House to settle it. However, he thought it better to allow the case to be fought out. It was the people who owned the land that he felt for; but he had not the same sympathy for the two litigants.

Mr. Seddon

The House divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

AYES, 44.

Buddo	Larnach	Pinkerton
Buick	Lawry	Russell, W. R.
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Saunders
Carnell	Mackintosh	Seddon
Carroll	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Stevens
Duncan	McNab	Steward
Flatman	Meredith	Tanner
Graham	Millar	Te Ao
Guinness	Mills	Thompson
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Willis.
Houston	Morrison	Tellers.
Hutchison, W.	O'Regan	Kelly, J. W.
Joyce	Pere	McGowan.

NOES, 12.

Buchanan	Lang	Stout.
Earnshaw	Massey	Tellers.
Green	McGuire	Bell
Hake	Newman	Wilson.
Kelly, W.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
McLachlan	Fraser
Pirani	Button
Reeves	Allan
Russell, G. W.	Hutchison, G.

Majority for, 32.

Amendment negatived.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. E. M. SMITH was sorry, at this late period of the session, to have to move the adjournment of the House, but he did so in consequence of the question which had been placed on the Order Paper by the honourable member for Clutha. When that honourable gentleman asked the question he distinctly stated that he did not refer to any individual member of the House, but there was no doubt at all that it was directed at himself (Mr. Smith). He therefore wanted to tell the House what the facts of the case were. This application was made through him at the request of a very large number of the people in the Taranaki District, representative of the business-men of the district, and men who were members of the Chamber of Commerce, and the leading men there, and they were prepared to subscribe the money stated in the application pound for pound. He was an old colonist of over thirty years' standing; and when he remembered the great things that had been achieved by sending men to the Old Country; when he remembered the success of Sir Julius

Vogel when he was sent Home to float the ten-million loan; when he remembered that the Midland Railway project was brought about by sending people to England; when he knew that their great coal deposits had been developed through practical business-men proceeding to England in order to lay the matter before the capitalists of the Old Country, it was only a reasonable thing for the people of Taranaki to ask the Government to subscribe pound for pound for the purpose to which he referred, if the Government thought it was in the interests of the country to do so, and not merely in the interests of any individuals or any particular district. Was there anything lowering to the dignity of the House in asking for such a thing as that? He had advocated this course upon many occasions, both in season and out of season. Why should the honourable member for Clutha get up in the House and denounce the proposal upon personal grounds? He (Mr. Smith) knew the immense amount of good that would be done to New Zealand if the proposal were given effect to. It would, in the first place, mean the keeping in the colony of half a million a year. It would enable them to make their own railway plant, which they were now importing from Germany, America, and Belgium. They wanted to get the capitalists of England to take this matter up, and that was why the project was set on foot. It would be no pleasure-trip to a man to drag ten tons of minerals about with him and exhibit it at the Colonial Institute, and before the scientific men and capitalists of Great Britain. The Committee which had inquired into the subject was nearly unanimous in its recommendation; there was only one dissentient voice. The promoters of the scheme did not want it to be said that the Government would be voting the funds of the colony to a supporter of theirs, unless they were convinced that good to the colony would result from it. They wanted that House to decide it, and he was prepared to let it go by the decision of the House. If the decision of the House was against it they would drop it at once and for ever. When they knew what Victoria and New South Wales were doing in the matter of developing their mineral wealth by the introduction of British capital, surely there was nothing unreasonable in this proposal that the Government should subscribe pound for pound of the expense that would have to be incurred in sending a representative to the Old Country. He had not supposed there would be any member of the House so narrow-minded as to raise his voice against it. But if a member of that House was proposed for this or that Board, or in connection with this or that scheme, somebody in the House rose and denounced it. Such a course of action was lowering the tone and dignity of the House, and holding the House up to ridicule in the eyes of the people of the country. He was persuaded to bring this matter before the House by the senior member for Wellington City, and it was certainly a great national question. When that honourable gentleman was Premier of the colony there was a great exhibition in Wellington, and he dragged the honourable gentleman down to that exhibition to let him see what the Taranaki District was capable of producing in the shape of mineral wealth alone. Over and over again the senior member for Wellington City had promised his assistance, and he would see now what the honourable gentleman would do. There was untold wealth lying in that district, and in other parts of the colony, and if the matter were properly brought under the attention of English capitalists plenty of capital would flow into the colony for the development of this untold wealth. It was only the other day that the Government were asked to send ten tons of minerals Home. The question of the profitable development of the ironsand had been already solved, and it only required to be brought prominently before the men of capital and the scientists of Great Britain to insure its speedy development. There were millions of money lying idle in the Old Country awaiting investment, and if these capitalists only knew what a field there was in New Zealand they would soon utilise their money in the development of this industry. He need only refer to the great success he had in Auckland when the men and machinery were placed at his disposal. He showed several hundred people what could be done with the ironsand; and what was wanted was capital to produce great and most splendid results. The development of this industry would, of course, as a natural consequence, lead to the greater development of their coal-mines. Large quantities of coal would be used up; and members knew that a great proportion of the wealth of England was due to the utilisation of her coal. It was with that object that the people of Taranaki approached the Committee. The Committee was set up for the purpose of seeing which was the best way to promote the resources of the colony. That Committee was comprised of men representing the intelligence of the country; and why therefore did the honourable member for Clutha put the question he did? That honourable gentleman would say he did so in the interests of the country; but such was not the case. It was because he (Mr. Smith) was on one side of the House and the honourable gentleman on the other. Ever since he entered Parliament in 1890, up to the present time, that honourable gentleman had always been having a fling at him; and he could tell that honourable gentleman that whenever he did not approach him in an open, aboveboard manner he would move the adjournment of the House in order to put the matter properly before the country. Some honourable gentlemen might say that when it was for them it was a grand thing, but when it was for somebody else it was a very wrong thing. The honourable gentleman told him a little time ago that when he was on one of his explorations to find out some new track he actually applied to the Government for a co-operative man to carry his swag. Not that he objected to that, because he thought if one was going into the country for such an object he should have some assistance, and probably if he had applied to him he would have given him assistance. They had in the colony plant which had cost £100,000; they had, as Mr. Speaker knew, in his electorate nearly a hundred skilled workmen, men who had been trained in the best shops in England and America; they had the men, the plant, and the material here, and all they wanted was the capital; and they proposed to reach the capital. They knew very well that without a direct vote of the House the Government could not grant money to any member for any such purpose without bringing him under the Disqualification Act. He did not want a penny of such money—his supporters would subscribe his expenses; but they wanted to send the material Home, and he believed the shipping companies would make a great reduction in the freight. If the Government placed an amount on the supplementary estimates, and if that amount were carried by the House, he thought they should bow to that decision, as it would be in the best interests of the country.

Mr. EARNSHAW said, as a member of the Tariff and Industries Committee, he felt it his duty to steadily oppose this recommendation of the Committee, and he regretted to say he was the only one of the Committee who opposed it. He had not opposed it on any grounds personal to the honourable gentleman; he thought they must all recognise the earnestness of the honourable member for New Plymouth with reference to the development of this industry. He did not think there was a member of that House more desirous of seeing the iron industry developed than he was; so that his remarks, he felt sure, would be accepted on this subject in the spirit in which he gave them. The Industries Committee was appointed to find out the best mode of developing the industries of New Zealand. They at once came face to face with the issue, Was it the best mode to pay men in this colony to go Home to float private companies to develop the industries of New Zealand? That was the question, which every member must answer for himself. In his opinion it was the last way in which they should spend the colony's money. The honourable gentleman put his case before the Committee very fairly and temperately. He stated that his object was that one or two gentlemen should be sent from New Plymouth or New Zealand to meet the ironmasters in England, many of whom had had to let their blast-fires go out; and no doubt they would be desirous of starting a business in some other suitable place. It was clearly understood by the Committee that the honourable gentleman would be one of the two persons who were to go Home; and no doubt the people of New Plymouth and Auckland who subscribed the £250 for expenses would look to the central figure, who had continually placed this question before the country, to go Home on this expedition as their expert. The question then arose, Was it right or proper that the House should vote a sum of money to send a member of the House Home to float a company, or to negotiate with private companies, to come out to this country to start that industry? It was upon that ground, and upon that ground solely, that he gave his vote very distinctly against the proposal made to the Committee, and he had seen no reason since to alter his views in that respect. The honourable gentleman stated in his remarks in the House that a number of the leading men in his district, and other persons, were prepared to subscribe pound for pound up to £250, making with the subsidy £500, to send some person Home for the purpose he had indicated. He also stated that in Auckland, when making the test, there were some five hundred people interested in, or present at, the operations, and that they were very much pleased at the result. If this was so, he ventured to say to the Government and to the House that there should be no difficulty at all in raising the amount of £500 to defray the expenses of sending a person Home for this purpose—that was, if the people were satisfied, after seeing the tests, that the work which the honourable gentleman had conducted for years past had come to that stage that the problem of the reduction of ironsand had been practically solved. If the honourable gentleman's statements in that respect were correct, there could be no difficulty in arranging that matter. In his opinion, however, unless the Government were prepared to say to the delegates that they were determined that all the iron rails, bridges, and material used by the Government in New Zealand should be made of colonial iron—unless they made that a stipulation—they would not induce any Home firm to come out here to supply the other part of the local market. The output of such works would be much larger than the local consumption, and, that being so, they would have to look to outside markets. It must be recollected that you could not start a blast-furnace and keep it going for one month and then stop it the next: it must be kept going always. As a preliminary, therefore, the Government would have to say that they were determined to use New Zealand iron, and New Zealand iron only. He did not think the Government had come to that point, and he thought a decision in that respect should be arrived at first, before any money was voted. He quite realised that the honourable gentleman had spent years of his life, and had impoverished himself, in trying to promote this industry, and he would personally like to assist him or any delegates in going Home; but he did not think it was the duty of the Government to vote money to send any one Home to float a private company. If that were done in this case, it must be done in other cases. Take, for instance, the proposal in the Budget with regard to the beet-sugar industry: they might just as well vote a sum of money to send Home some person to float a private company to develop that industry. So they could go on from industry to industry. He ventured to state that that would end in the utter demoralisation of the House. It was not the amount, it was the principle which was involved. He trusted the House and the Government would be most careful in coming to a decision upon this question, because giving a grant of money would not end with the present case. It must not be forgotten that the question of the reduction of ironsand in New Zealand was no new question. There were other countries which had large quantities of ironsand. This was a very great question, and members should approach it from a practical point of view, and from the position of being guardians of the public purse. It was only upon those grounds that he was speaking. With regard to constructing large ironworks in New Zealand, they could not rely solely upon the products of ironsand; they must also develop our hæmatite lodes. They must have soft hæmatite pigs to mix up with the product of the ironsand. He was convinced that ironsand would make first-class bar-iron. He knew something of the materials, and could say that it was almost equal to Lowmore iron. He did not think it was equal to it, but it lay between B.B.S. and Lowmore. If they were going to use it for castings—and, of course, they must use it for all purposes—they must have other grades of iron to mix for the various purposes required. In his opinion, the plant should be placed in the Collingwood district, which was within easy shipping distance of the ironsand, close to the largest beds of hæmatite in the colony, and also close to coalfields. This was a large question, and one which fully deserved the attention of the Government. He altogether demurred to the money coming out of the public Exchequer.

Mr. E. M. Smith

Mr. MITCHELSON was dissatisfied with the answer made by the Minister for Public Works as to when the Government were going to lay the Public Works Statement on the table. He had gone to the trouble to take out the number of days after the commencement of the sitting of the House upon which the Public Works Statement was delivered during the last eleven years, and he found that the last three years compared most unfavourably with former years, and that the present Minister for Public Works—the Premier—was the greatest sinner of all Ministers for Public Works in this respect. In 1884 the Public Works Statement was delivered fifty-one days after the sitting of the House; in 1885, seventy-five days; in 1886, forty-two days; in 4.30. 1887, sixty-seven days; in 1888, ninety-nine days. That was the longest time for which the Public Works Statement had been delayed, and that was caused by the enormous amount of work thrown upon the then Government in connection with the revision of the Customs tariff. In 1889 forty-eight days elapsed before it was delivered; in 1890, thirty-six days. Then, coming to 1891, the first year of the Ballance Government, when the present Premier held the portfolio of Public Works, eighty-eight days elapsed; in the following year, ninety-five; and, in 1893, ninety days. That was last year. Those who were members of Parliament last year would remember that the debate upon the Public Works Statement, the public-works estimates, and the supplement-tary estimates were all forced through during one sitting, and during the early hours of the morning, by the Premier. The debate upon the Public Works Statement last year was taken only two days before the prorogation of Parliament. They had now been in session ninety-nine days, and they still had not got the Public Works Statement, nor did they know when they were going to get it; and they were led to believe, by the statement of the Premier made a few days ago, that he expected to prorogue the House not later than the end of the second week in October. The Premier had said there was good reason for the delay that had taken place; he said that the Government were still unaware of the amount of money they would have at their disposal for carrying on the public works of the colony. In the Financial Statement they were told that the amount available from the Public Works Fund on the 31st March last was £263,737. It was also stated there that it was proposed during the present year to set apart out of revenue £250,000 for the purposes of public works throughout the colony; and, in a table laid before the House on the previous day by the Treasurer, they found, from the correspondence that had taken place between himself and the Agent-General, that it was also proposed to collar another £50,000 from the sinking fund for the purpose of aiding the Public Works Fund. Taking these three amounts, they found the Minister would have £563,737 for expenditure during the present financial year, £283,000 more than was actually expended last year, without taking into consideration the amounts proposed to be taken out of the loans to be raised under the Bill that passed this House two or three days ago. One might imagine, from the statement of the Premier, that he did not himself know what amount he would have available for carrying on the public works of the colony until he knew whether the Bill was going to pass in another place or not. Now, honourable members who supported that Bill, as he himself had done, did not contemplate that any portion of the moneys named in the Bill was to be used for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary public works of the colony. As he understood the provisions of that Bill, the moneys proposed to be raised under it were for the purpose of improving lands for settlement, and for making roads and constructing bridges for opening up and giving access to Crown lands, and for similar purposes in connection with the land to be acquired under the Bill from the Natives. Seeing that this was the case, he did not think it necessary for the Government to make this long delay before making public their proposals for carrying on public works during the present financial year. The Minister of Lands, in introducing the Bill, said it was their intention to prepare three schedules of works that were to be carried on under its provisions. Seeing that was the case, he thought the Premier would be doing justice to the members of the House and to the country if he stated he would deliver the Public Works Statement, say, on Tuesday next; and if the Bill which appeared to give the honourable gentleman so much concern was not passed in another place, more especially as so little of the money authorised by it would actually be required for expenditure during the present year, no harm would be done; and, if it was passed, the schedules could be attached to the supplementary estimates, and the votes could be passed by the House for the purposes the Minister of Lands considered necessary in the interests of the country. He was inclined to think, from the delay that had taken place, and from the statement of the Minister for Public Works, that his intention was, as soon as the Bill in question became law, to set apart a considerable portion of the moneys provided under it for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary public works of the colony. If that was his intention, it was not right to members of the House, who had assisted in passing the Bill upon the understanding that the money raised under it was to be used for other purposes. He considered the Premier ought not longer to delay the delivery of the Public Works Statement, and ought not to do as he had done during the previous session,—namely, ask the House to discuss the proposals contained in the Public Works Statement, and to pass the public-works estimates and the supplementary estimates through, the same night, or at one sitting, as was done last year by sheer force. Such a thing had never before been attempted in New Zealand, and ought not to have been done. He felt sure that, if honourable members allowed the Premier to use the same influence to force his public-works estimates through as he had done during last session, they would not only be doing themselves an injury but an injury to the country.

Mr. Mitchelson

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable gentleman had been very moderate in his remarks in reference to the delay in bringing down the Public Works Statement. But he would put it to him, as a practical man, how was it possible for him to bring down that Statement unless ways and means were first provided? The honourable gentleman knew very well there were only ways and means for slightly over half a million, and, of course, in that he included what he had no doubt would be termed the "windfall" of the £50,000 he had alluded to. Never had the Public Works Fund been so low in the history of the country. He supposed the loan-balance did not amount to more than £60,000 or £70,000. The Public Works Fund had never before been in the position it was in at the present time. The honourable member knew that very well; and he knew, as a practical man, that you must have money that would cover, at all events, the expenditure for two years. No Public Works Minister would be worthy of the name unless he saw his ways and means for at least two years. He was alluding now to the £500,000. The other moneys, as the honourable gentleman knew full well, were for entirely different purposes, but they must come down under the Public Works Statement. As to the roads that were to be made to open up Crown lands and land bought from the Natives out of the £250,000, the Minister of Lands was bound by law—the law they were passing—to place item by item for each of these roads upon the public-works estimates.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—They were brought down one year in the Appropriation Act.

Mr. SEDDON said they could not be appropriated without first being passed by the House under the public-works estimates. As he had told the House previously regarding this quarter of a million, there would have to be a schedule showing the roads that would have to be constructed. The allocation of the money would have to be determined by the Government, and the works specified. It was impossible, therefore, for him to bring down the Public Works Statement until he knew whether or not that money was to be granted. If it were not granted, where should he be with his Public Works Statement? Perhaps the honourable gentleman would like him to bring down his Public Works Statement, then for him to have his ways and means cut down, and to be left a laughing-stock to honourable members and to the country. It might please the honourable member to put him in that position, but he was not going to be put in it if he could avoid it. He had no wish to keep the Statement back, but he was quite sure the honourable member would sympathize with the Government when he saw the time it took to get through the business. He was not complaining, because he knew the magnitude of the proposals, and the desire there was for placing their views with regard to those proposals fully before the country. They could not, under the circumstances, complain. The honourable member told them that this was the ninety-ninth day. Well, that was not the fault of the Government. The honourable member knew that this session many important matters had come up. There had been the Standing Orders, and no ordinary Bill that had ever come before the House, or that was likely to come before it, was of the same importance as were the Standing Orders. It had necessarily taken a considerable amount of time to deal with them. That was work that should be taken into consideration. Then, there had been legislation affecting other matters of great importance which had to be dealt with, which no Government could have foreseen. These had come as surprises, suddenly, and the Government and Parliament had had to deal with them. If the honourable member was reasonable, these were matters that he ought to take into consideration. This had delayed their financial proposals. He was not complaining of the time that had been taken up in the debate on the Address in Reply or on the Financial Statement. Considering the magnitude of the proposals, he did not think any unreasonable delay had occurred, but still these proceedings had taken time: and then there was the refusal of honourable members to sit late. If honourable members had sat, perhaps, another dozen evenings till six o'clock in the morning, probably they would have had the Public Works Statement before now. Their own supporters had on more than one occasion absolutely refused to do any more work, and the Government had had to submit to the inevitable. He regretted this very much, but hoped that, in the course of a very short time, they would be in a position to know what funds would be available. He wished to remove one misapprehension the honourable member had. The honourable member had said they were going to use money out of the quarter of a million provided for opening up Crown and Native lands in connection with the ordinary public works. It would be necessary to provide for railways. There were the Eketahuna-Woodville connection, the Otago Central, the completion of the Rotorua line; but they were not going to use the money raised under the Native Land Acquisition Bill for ordinary public-works purposes. They would adhere as closely as possible to what they had told the House; but they could not bring the Public Works Statement down till they knew what the ways and means would be. Then, they had to provide for public buildings, and for roads and their maintenance. These would be on the ordinary public-works estimates, apart from the others. If the honourable member were in his position he would see it was a position of difficulty. He had no desire to keep back information or statements. He must say members had been most reasonable in their requests; there had not been half a dozen who had asked him this session for works. Their means, however, were limited, but it was not on that account that the Statement had been kept back. They had to take into account the Coolgardie attraction, and the fact of so many men being out of employment; together with the demands for the increase of settlement. The Government had to take all these into account, and, so far as they could, they would endeavour to retain the population by making reproductive works, and the estimates would be drawn with that object. Honourable members would give the Government credit when he told them the expenditure last year under Part I. was the lowest expenditure on public-works in the history of the colony.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—No.

Mr. SEDDON said it was absolutely lower than the expenditure during the last year of the honourable gentleman's term of office; and he thought that there could be no complaint. It was the desire of the Government, with reference to the public-works expenditure, to husband their resources: and, if they were true to the colony, themselves, and the people, they must assist settlement and thereby assist the people. As regarded the question of the adjournment, and the question of sending some one Home, he did not agree that that was the proper course to adopt, because it might be said that the Government did so to please a supporter, and to promote his welfare. The honourable member for New Plymouth deserved well at the hands of the colony, but they could send some specimens of the raw material to the Agent-General, to bring the resources of the colony fully before the British public. That was a work which, he thought, was justified; but to send Home a representative to float companies and to provide capital was a thing he did not think the State would be justified in doing. Before coming to a final conclusion it would be necessary to go through the evidence produced before the Committee, and then they could decide accordingly.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE was sorry the honourable member for New Plymouth had taken the question he (Mr. Mackenzie) had placed on the Order Paper in the spirit he had taken it in, but, unfortunately, that was a matter he could not help, and he did not offer to apologize for it. He held that Parliament should be as free as possible from motions of this kind. It was undoubtedly true that the honourable gentleman, since he had held a seat in that Parliament, had actually asked the Government to send him Home at the expense of the colony, and that was an improper position for any honourable member to take up.

Mr. E. M. SMITH said he had never asked the Government; he asked the House.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said the Government was the voice of the House. He thought if the House were represented in London by the honourable member for New Plymouth and by the Minister of Labour they might expect the colony to be "boomed."

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Did you say "doomed"?

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said that the honourable member for New Plymouth had stated that this matter had been brought before the House on a previous occasion, and undoubtedly it had, and the reports had been opposed to giving him aid, and had been sent back to the Select Committee in order to give the honourable gentleman an opportunity of bringing the matter again before the Committee to secure a favourable report; but the reports again were unfavourable. It was a question which the honourable gentleman had repeatedly advocated—namely, the subsidising of a member of that House. No doubt the honourable gentleman fancied there was a great deal of mineral wealth in his district, but he was so exuberant in his admiration of Taranaki that he exaggerated the amount enormously. What had he told the House? That there were some 447,000 square miles of coalfields in Taranaki alone.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—I did not say that. We have a great deal of coal in our district, and I said 400 square miles.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said it was in Hansard, and, no doubt, the honourable gentleman corrected his Hansard proofs. He would read what the honourable gentleman had said—it was in Volume 80, page 67: "447,000 square miles." The honourable gentleman went on to say that each acre had 30,000 tons of coal, and therefore the sum-total would be no less than 8,580,000,000,000 tons of coal.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—The honourable gentleman is giving a quotation to lead the House to believe that he is reading from Hansard, when he is not. His statements are not in the pages of Hansard, and it is not fair.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said he had given the honourable gentleman's own words in Hansard, but he would read the whole extract. Speaking of their natural products, the honourable gentleman was reported in Hansard to have said, "And now those vast coalfields, covering an area of 447,000 square miles, averaging about 30,000 tons to the acre, lay there slumbering." On that computation there were 286,000,000 acres of coal; but a trouble here arose, as there were only 67,000,000 acres of land in the whole of New Zealand, and on the basis of 447,000 square miles there would be no less than 8,580,000,000,000 tons of coal in that district. He thought that would be sufficient, and that the House would support him in his conclusion that the honourable gentleman had really slightly exaggerated the matter.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—No.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said it was all in Hansard except the quantity of coals, and the column was hardly wide enough to afford space to embrace the figures. The honourable gentleman's demands upon the Government for this expedition Home were diminishing. He formerly claimed £200,000, when he first approached the Vogel Government, but he would do him the credit of saying that he had not asked for that sum all out of one loan. He had asked for £150,000 from one loan and £50,000 from another, so as to make it a bit easier for the Government. This was not the first occasion that the indecency of the honourable gentleman's action had been apparent.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman must withdraw that expression, as it was one that should not be applied to any member of the House.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said he would withdraw it, but he was merely quoting what Sir John Hall had said on a previous occasion when this very subject was before the House. What he desired to say was that it was not, to his mind, right that any member of the House should use his influence on the Committees when he was interested in a matter under consideration, as it prevented the members of a Committee from going into a matter as freely as they should.

Mr. E. M. SMITH said that he went out of the Committee.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said that when the report of the Committee came before the House it was referred back to the Committee once more, in order that the honourable member might be present and state his application more fully; and he did attend the Committee personally; but after consideration the Committee reported that it had no recommendation to make. The honourable gentleman had been also a little incorrect with reference to an application which he alleged that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had made for assistance on an expedition from the Government. Possibly the honourable gentleman referred to a private conversation, but he had no recollection of it. It was perfectly correct that mention had been made to the Government for assistance, but no assistance was ever given. He thought any one who knew him (Mr. Mackenzie) would know that he took his fair share of what was going on. Had Government given a man he would have been employed to carry a food-supply to a central dépôt, from which they might work, and employ the time more profitably. He offered to supply the men with food and all they required, and only asked the Government to pay the wages. That was a very small contribution, and would only have come to £5 or £6. The expedition had cost those in charge £100, and the work they were on was more likely to be beneficial to the colony than to himself. Under the circumstances, he did not think it was fair for the honourable gentleman to make the statement he did. He objected to the principle of honourable members influencing the House for the purpose of having public moneys spent upon them in order that they might go to the Old Country to develop industries that ought to be developed on their own merits. If the trade of this colony was to be developed it must largely depend upon its own merits, and, as the honourable gentleman had said that he could prove on oath that he could supply material from 25 to 30 per cent. less than the price at which the articles could be landed in the colony at, if that could be done, surely it was evident that the industries of this colony in a very short time could be developed both with profit to the promoters and with advantage to the colony. He thought the course suggested was an improper one for the honourable gentleman to suggest.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the honourable member for New Plymouth was the Buzfuz of the

50. House. He did not think the honourable gentleman was responsible for his actions or words when he got on to the subject of Taranaki and its industries. Past experiences proved that this was so; and he thought the honourable gentleman should therefore have the indulgence of the House, and should not be taken seriously when he went off at full speed as he usually did on the subject of native industries in his own particular part of the country. The Hon. the Premier had replied to the question as to when the Public Works Statement would be brought down that he had not got his policy Bills through, and that until the House granted supplies it was impossible to bring the Public Works Statement down. This was the ninety-ninth day of the session, and they were only now dealing with the policy Bills which were announced and, practically, carried in the debate on the Financial Statement. How, then, could the Premier justify himself for the unreasonable delay which had taken place in bringing down his policy Bills? He had two or three words to say to the Minister of Labour, who had made a pretence of answering the important question he had put to him on the subject of the unemployed in Wairarapa, and told the House that he was anxious to deal even-handed justice to the labouring population in all parts of the colony; but he took good care to conceal the fact that he had been carting the unemployed from his own district and spreading them broadcast over the whole colony, the Wairarapa included.

Mr. REEVES.—Where are they in your district?

Mr. BUCHANAN said they were to be found travelling up and down the Wairarapa district looking for work but unable to get it, and possibly some of those unfortunates were among those who owing to hunger and want had helped themselves, as had been shown by the extract he had quoted shortly before from the Evening Post. With regard to the unemployed in his district, the Minister had stated that, according to the best information at his disposal, the number had very greatly decreased since he (Mr. Buchanan) had made his somewhat alarming statement to the House some little time ago. He had stated to the House nothing but what he knew from his own personal knowledge to be true. And, to show how little attention was paid to the unfortunate labouring-men in the Wairarapa district, he would quote the authority of the honourable gentleman's own department as given in the Labour Journal. In the Journal of January the agent for Masterton reported, "Business good; no idle men in the district; plenty of employment for those who are willing to work." Martinborough: "No idle men in the district;" and so on. In the following month, February, the Masterton agent reported, "Harvesting operations are being carried on, which gives employment to a number of men in the district." Martinborough: "Very few idle men in the district." In March the Masterton agent reported, "Since last report a large number of men have found their way into this district, and this, combined with the finishing of the harvest operations, has thrown a number of men on the market, and they are at present unemployed." To his own knowledge some of these men came from the district represented by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. REEVES.—Does the report say they come from my district?

Mr. BUCHANAN was speaking from his own knowledge. They were sent to the Forty-mile Bush, and were shortly afterwards discharged. The Journal for April reported, as to Masterton, "Trade fairly good. There are a good many men out of work at present, as there always are at this time of the year. Bush-felling will again absorb almost all those at present out of work." Martinborough: "A few general labourers and bushmen reported as being out of employment." In May the report from Masterton was, "Unskilled labour: A number of men are reported out of employment in the district." Martinborough: "No appreciable change since last report." That meant that there were no men out of employment. He knew that to be quite contrary to fact; and the agent there did not report to the honourable gentleman's office the true state of affairs in the district. The Masterton report for June was, "Work is very slack. Agent attributes cause to low prices now ruling for produce, which debars farmers, squatters, and others from employing the amount of labour they are usually in the habit of doing." Martinborough: "Agent in his report states that in his opinion the 'unemployed cry' has been greatly exaggerated in his district. There is now a class of men on the road different from the bona fide man in search of work; they state that they want work, and yet will not leave the main beaten track to look for it." Now, with regard to that statement, he had to say that on the stations away from the main beaten track some of them had to put up something like twenty men for the night. The report of the Labour Agent was as wrong and misleading as anything could well be, and the Labour Bureau must have known that this was so. The Masterton report for July was, "Unskilled labour very plentiful; many men waiting for bush-felling contracts, which are expected to come out shortly. There are a large number of idle men in the district." Martinborough: "No residents reported out of employment, and appreciable difference in number of men on the road." For August the reports from Masterton were: "There is a visible decrease in the number of men out of employment in this district as compared with last month, but the supply is still in excess of the demand; many of those seeking employment seem to be totally unfitted for axe or pick-and-shovel work." Martinborough—now, he wanted to particularly call the honourable gentleman's attention to this: "In his report for the last month our agent states that there is a great decrease in the number of men on the road, and, as far as he is aware, there are no residents in the district out of employment." There never was a more glaring misstatement than that delivered to a Minister by any responsible officer; and yet the honourable gentleman commented on his agents' reports as if they were something to be relied upon. The agent's last report, for September, was, "There are a number of men on the roads, but with the advent of fine weather it is likely that a lot of work will be put in hand, such as scrub-cutting, &c." Here they had the agent making the astounding statement that scrub-cutting would be available to take up the unemployed at this late period of the season, almost on the threshold of summer. It was a piece of wicked misrepresentation, which ought to be exposed. He thought, if the honourable gentleman wanted to get honest work through his Labour Bureau, as he felt sure he did, such conduct on the part of his agent for so many months past deserved the severest reprehension. It was simply untrue that the number of unemployed had largely decreased, as stated by the Labour Journal, and they had a right to as much attention at the hands of the honourable gentleman as his own constituents. The colony had been put to a large amount of expenditure in sending the unemployed from the honourable gentleman's constituency to other districts, and here were those unfortunate men in the Wairarapa travelling over muddy roads and rough country, all through the winter, exposed to all sorts of weather and hardship, in the endeavour to obtain employment. He had received very scant courtesy and attention from the honourable gentleman, and had received nothing but a misleading answer—namely, that the Wairarapa "unemployed" difficulty was not such as called for attention, because of the great decrease in the number of men seeking employment. The facts of the case were easily obtainable, and were absolute proof to the contrary.

Mr. Buchanan

Captain RUSSELL wished to emphasize the remarks of his honourable friend the member for Eden as to the extremely improper position in which the House had been placed owing to the Public Works Statement not being brought down before so late a period of the session. The Hon. the Premier very suavely and with his usual astuteness endeavoured to divert their attention from the real fact at issue by saying that it was impossible to bring down the Public Works Statement until this extremely late period because the financial policy of the Government had not yet received the assent of Parliament. At the commencement of the session they had been told over and over again that there were no borrowing proposals in the Government policy, and they were now told that it would be impossible to push on the public works, which were to be carried on out of borrowed money, because the financial policy of the Government had not been assented to. But, if all the reasons the Premier had to put forward for the Public Works Statement being so late in coming down were that he had been unable to get a set of financial policy Bills passed, it was entirely the fault of the Government that the financial Bills had not been passed long ago. It could not be said that they had had opposed to them an obstructive band of men upon the Opposition benches, and it could not be denied also that there had been a majority of the most submissive nature following the Premier. They had seen one or two young members plunge a little bit in harness, but in less than no time they were brought back into subjection, and there never was so submissive a majority as that which had followed the honourable gentleman during the present session. Why, then, was not this financial policy brought down earlier in the session? They had it alluded to in the Governor's Speech, and subsequently in the Financial Statement: were they right then in assuming that the Government had not even shaped their financial policy when the House met? He was afraid that was the only conclusion they could come to. They could arrive at no other conclusion than that during the recess Ministers were skylarking all over the colony, without devoting any time or attention to formulating the policy they intended to introduce when Parliament assembled. There could be no doubt that the Premier, even from his own showing, had been most neglectful. When he said "the Premier" he spoke of him as the moving spirit in Cabinet. He told them just now there was the fact of the Coolgardie diggings enticing away so many of our people; that never had work been so scarce; that never was the price of gum so low, and therefore so many persons thrown out of employment. But notwithstanding—notwithstanding that Coolgardie was attracting the surplus labour, notwithstanding the low price of meat, of wool, of grain, and the abnormally low price of gum, notwithstanding that he was going to spend more money on public works this year than had been spent for years past—by his own showing, the Premier was allowing great numbers of people to go away from this colony because he was too supine—he could not speak of him as lazy, for there was no laziness about the honourable gentleman—but because he was too careless to get the money to employ them. He admitted that he was asking Parliament for a larger expenditure than had been going on for years, but in spite of all this, he had neglected his opportunity, and had allowed people to drift away because he was not prepared to take the necessary steps to keep them in the colony.

Mr. SEDDON.—The expenditure during the last three months has been double what it was formerly.

Captain RUSSELL said, if that was so, then it was unauthorised expenditure, and this, too, without having brought down the Public Works Statement, by which that expenditure could be justified.

Mr. SEDDON.—The money has been spent out of appropriations.

Captain RUSSELL said that, seeing the appropriations must have lapsed on the 31st of March last, all the expenditure since that time had been going on without appropriation of any kind whatsoever. He was sometimes amused by the Premier; and they heard so many similes about him. They were told that sometimes he trampled on his followers with hobnailed boots, and then they heard about the "sweet will" of the honourable gentleman—a delicious combination of hobnailed boots and sweet will. He was pleased to hear the Premier tell them that he was not going to allow any person, at the country's expense, to go to England and float companies of any nature whatever. It would have been a great mistake, because, as had been pointed out by the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw), the promoters of beet-root-sugar factories or of any other kind of industry whatever would have just as much right to be sent Home at the country's expense as the promoters of the ironsand industry; and, so far as one could judge, the promoters of such other companies would probably be much more successful than the promoters of any ironsand company. He was able to recall the year 1856; and in that year, before he came to New Zealand, he had the pleasure of seeing tools that had been manufactured from Taranaki ironsand, and he was then assured there would be a complete revolution in the iron industry consequent upon the Taranaki ironsand being manufactured in large quantities. That was nearly forty years ago; and still the Taranaki ironsand was in the same position: the industry had not been developed. In truth, whether the sending Home of Mr. Smith would enormously develop the industry was an open question; they could not assume it as absolutely certain; he did not think it was. But, as a great matter of principle, the Premier was right in refusing to admit that it was the duty of the Government to give premiums from the funds of this colony to enable private persons to proceed to England to assist the floating of companies. Surely everybody must admit that a subject which had been so long before the public of New Zealand, and upon which so much money had been expended on experiments, was not likely to prove a success in the commercial world, or private enterprise would have proved this long ago. Whatever industry was likely to prove successful never lacked capital. They had had experiments in gold, silver, copper, even tin, and now, with regard to ironsand, they were told that unless Mr. Smith went Home it was impossible to get the iron industry started. Unfortunately, experience went to show that on the coast of Sweden there were any quantities of ironsand similar in character and quality to that of Taranaki.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—Chemically it is quite different.

Captain RUSSELL said that, although the ironsand of Sweden was in close proximity to the large markets of the world, yet they were unable to successfully utilise it. If that were the case, and considering all the difficulties about coal, although the honourable member for New Plymouth said there were 447 square miles of coal in the neighbourhood of New Plymouth, unfortunately it was not in juxtaposition with the ironsand.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—Close to it.

Captain RUSSELL was quite right in saying it was not in juxtaposition. It was recognised, in the smelting of iron, that unless they had coal, lime, and iron in juxtaposition it was impossible to carry on the smelting industry successfully. He understood the Minister of Labour wanted to say a few words before the dinner adjournment, and he would therefore sit down in order to allow the honourable gentleman that opportunity.

Mr. REEVES said he wanted to address a few words to the House in general, and to the honourable member for Wairarapa in particular. The honourable gentleman had again favoured the House with the bitter cry of the poor Wairarapa landowners. As far as one could judge, the larger landowners in that unfortunate district must be the worst-treated, the most heavily burdened men in all New Zealand. That was what one would gather from the honourable gentleman's wailings and complainings on their behalf, and from the manner in which he periodically came to that House to cry and wring his hands on their behalf because they actually had to find a meal for a certain number of unfortunate men who had to walk about the country to look for work. These poor men, with their thirty, forty, fifty, and sixty thousand acres of land, actually had to find a meal and a shakedown for the unfortunate swagger who walked about from one station to another to look for work in winter-time. This was another of the tales of woe and hardship which the honourable gentleman periodically brought before the House. It was not for him to say the honourable gentleman should be ashamed of himself, because that would be unparliamentary; but if he were the honourable gentleman, and represented the land-monopolists of the Wairarapa, he thought he should be ashamed of himself to come there and tell such pitiful and periodical tales of woe, and to appeal for mercy on behalf of these great landowners, as he did once or twice every session. If those gentlemen objected to the "swagger" nuisance there was open to them a very easy way of dealing with it, and that was to break up those big estates of theirs and allow the people to settle on the land. They did not hear of this "swagger" nuisance, and complaints about them, in districts which were closely settled, but they did hear of it from those districts where the land was monopolized, where it was mopped up by huge estates, where humanity was divorced from the soil, and where they got their labour by means of keeping the "swagger" system on foot year after year. What was the "swagger" system but the offspring of the land-monopoly? If the honourable gentleman wanted to cure the one he had better cure the other. After his pitiful appeal the honourable gentleman then launched into an attack upon himself (Mr. Reeves), charging him with carting his constituents wholesale up to the honourable gentleman's district at the public expense, and turning them loose to wander about on the roads. Now, none of his constituents had ever been carted up to that district at all. None of them had ever been put on public works there; none of them, he had every reason to believe, were to be found wandering about on the roads. A few, and a very few, of his constituents during this year had been sent to public works, but not in the honourable gentleman's district, but in the district of the honourable member for Masterton. If his honourable friend, who took up an enormous and improper share of the time of that House, would only be quiet when in his seat he (Mr. Reeves) would be able to get on faster. A few of his constituents were sent up to, and put upon works in, the honourable member for Masterton's district; and why his honourable friend the member for Wairarapa should come to the House and relate the woes of the honourable member for Masterton passed comprehension. The honourable member for Masterton was very well able to take care of his own district, and did not require the advocacy of the honourable member for Wairarapa. Now, how many of his (Mr. Reeves's) constituents had been carted up to the district represented by the honourable member for Masterton? During this last quarter actually twenty men were sent up there to be put on railway- and road-work. That was the cry of the honourable member for Wairarapa. But he would tell the honourable gentleman that they were not carted up there at the public expense. Taking them up there did not cost the public sixpence. They paid for it themselves.

Mr. Reeves

Mr. BUCHANAN.—No.

Mr. REEVES said the honourable gentleman had no business to contradict him, and to make statements that were perfectly contrary to fact on subjects about which he (Mr. Reeves) must know a great deal more than the honourable gentleman. He would not give way to the honourable gentleman, who must take his gruel quietly. He was a Scotchman, and most Scotchmen knew how to suffer in silence. The honourable gentleman did not seem able to take his gruel in silence. He was very noisy when getting the whip, but he would not get less of it on that account. The honourable gentleman had likened the honourable member for New Plymouth to Serjeant Buzfuz. Had the honourable gentleman any idea of who Serjeant Buzfuz was? He had better look up "Pickwick," and he would see the absurdity of drawing any parallel between that great legal luminary and the honourable member for New Plymouth. The honourable member for New Plymouth was not an Old Bailey lawyer by profession, and was not like Serjeant Buzfuz in personal resemblance. He was about as much like Serjeant Buzfuz as he was like Mrs. Bardell. Again, the member for Wairarapa complained that he (Mr. Reeves) did nothing to help the working-men. The honourable gentleman was so carried away by the exuberance of his own verbosity that he ten minutes afterwards contradicted himself by saying that he (Mr. Reeves) had every desire of doing everything for the working-man, which was quite the reverse of what he said previously. Then, as to the charge that he (Mr. Reeves) had answered the honourable gentlemen discourteously. He gave a very plain and courteous answer. Had the honourable gentleman any idea of what courtesy was? Why did he not show some courtesy when talking about him (Mr. Reeves)? The honourable gentleman should try to practise courtesy instead of preaching it. It would be a complete change in his whole demeanour. As to the attack on the Labour Agent, well, who was likely to know more about the state of labour in Wairarapa,—the Labour Agent, who had been living there for three months, or the honourable gentleman, who had been in Wellington consuming more than an ordinary share of public time during the last three months, and delaying the progress of business by his eternal, wearisome, and inconsequent harangues about all things? If the honourable gentleman would devote himself to business,—if he would try to master facts, instead of speaking so often, and delaying the business of the country,—he would know more than he did about the state of labour in Wairarapa, and would do less to stop the Government from carrying out remedial measures which were calculated to benefit the working-men and stop that evil of want of employment which he talked about, and which he and his friends had caused for years past by monopolizing the soil of the country. If the honourable gentleman did this he would do a great deal more good than by trying to make capital against the Government.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

7.30. On the question, That this Bill be read a third time,

Sir R. STOUT said,—I do not intend to take up the time of the House more than two or three minutes in speaking on this Bill. I speak at this stage of the Bill because there are certain things, which have come out in the discussion in Committee, which really did not come out on the second reading; and I wish to give my reasons why I opposed this Bill, and shall do so in two or three minutes, as I do not wish to have a long debate. This is the beginning of what may be termed a new system in New Zealand. It is, that we may raise money locally instead of doing as we have hitherto done—namely, going on the London market for loans. The interest fixed in the Bill is not to exceed 4 per cent., and the term may be up to forty years. I do not think we need this Bill at all. So far as small investors are concerned, they have ample facilities in our savings-banks; for our larger investors we have our ordinary bank-deposit system; and the system proposed in this Bill must conflict with one or other of our existing systems: that is, you may help to deplete the savings-banks of some of the deposits, though I do not think you will do so; or, under the system on which people deposit money at from 4 to 5 per cent. in the ordinary banks, you may encourage them to invest in New Zealand Consols. I do not think that if that takes place it will be beneficial to the colony. On the contrary, I think that we have not sufficient funds available for ordinary commercial enterprises, and that if the Government should take these moneys instead of getting our loan-money from London it will tend to cripple, to some extent, our commercial enterprises. That is one of the reasons why I am opposed to this Bill. Some have said that it is not a loan. It is a loan from ourselves, and is carrying out, no doubt, the policy shadowed forth in the Financial Statement of 1891. I am not going to read that, but if honourable members choose to refer to it they will see that the then Treasurer hinted that, instead of our going to the London market to obtain money for our public works, we might obtain all that we required locally; and this is the means by which that is to be done. It is true, so far as the money is concerned, that it can only be applied to Government securities approved of by the Governor in Council. Of course, the moneys received as Consols may be applied in the purchase of our debentures—that is, debentures under our Native Land Acquisition Act, our Land for Settlements Act, our Loans to Local Bodies' Act, and our Advances to Settlers Act—if that Bill should pass. Therefore all the money we get will practically be invested in Government debentures. It will be the means of furnishing the Government with loan-money for the prosecution of public works and for the purchase of European and Native lands. Therefore, whatever it may be called, it is practically a Bill to obtain loan-money. One of the things I strongly object to, even from a colonial or State point of view, is the long term that may be given to those Consols. I do not think it is commercially sound. I referred to this point in Committee, and I now wish to put it on record that the best financiers recommend now that loans should be for short terms. I know that there are some who have advocated that loans raised by the State should not be redeemable—that they should be irredeemable bonds; but the vast majority of financial experts recognise that, with the continual fall in interest which has gone on during this century, it is entirely inadvisable to make loans for long periods. If you make them for long periods, and interest falls, you come to pay higher rates than you otherwise would pay. Honourable members have nothing more to do than to look at the rise and fall in English Consols—to see what took place a hundred years ago. In the case of our Consols we were paying up to 6 per cent., and sometimes 7 per cent., for our money; 5 and 6 per cent. was the ordinary rate. Now our Consols are issued at 2½ per cent., and in 1903 they will only be 2½ per cent. And we must expect, considering the enormous sums of money for investment in the Home-country, that interest will not tend to rise; it will, if anything, tend to fall. It is entirely inadvisable to have our loans for long periods; I think we should have limited the term to, say, fifteen or twenty years; but, unfortunately, the Committee last evening were not able to agree to any amendment being made in the Bill unless the Government consented, and therefore it allowed the term of forty years to remain in the Bill. It is quite true the Treasurer has said that he does not intend to issue bonds for that long term, and may issue for a much shorter term; but we ought not to give such a power to any Colonial Treasurer. It may be that a Treasurer may be in financial straits, and may give a loan for a long period; and, if he does so, he can say that he has got the sanction of Parliament, and that a Committee of this House declined to shorten the period mentioned in the Bill. I think this is a mistake, and I am exceedingly sorry it has been agreed to. As to the other points in the Bill, as the Treasurer is not very well, I do not intend to discuss them to-night. I only again express my regret that this Bill should have been introduced. I do not think it is necessary. It will not help our financial position one bit. It will only tend, I believe, to injure our banks; and, by injuring our banks, it will not enable them to give the commercial people, or the manufacturing people, the accommodation they should get. It is bad finance for any State to attempt to get hold of all the capital of the State to use for State purposes. Wherever that is done the whole State suffers. I might have cited financial authorities upon this subject, but I referred to them in Committee last night, and I shall now simply, on the third reading, enter my protest against the passing of this Bill.

Dr. NEWMAN.—Sir, I do not intend to make a long speech, but I wish to refer to some things which I consider very noticeable in this Bill. One is that the ostensible purpose of this borrowing was to offer an investment for savings in New Zealand, whereas it came out in Committee that there was nothing at all to prevent English investors from taking up the full amount. I think the Treasurer, before the Bill finally becomes law, should draw up and insert some clause to prevent that. The actual position is that our 4-per-cents are at present at 109½, and are largely taken up by insurance companies and other large money-investing companies. If any of these institutions choose through their agents to buy our bonds they will get our 4-per-cents at 100, instead of paying 109½. These bonds are for forty years, whereas our inscribed stock is for a shorter period; therefore it is a better investment for any company to invest here than to take up any of our bonds in England. This will to a great extent defeat the object of this Bill, and it might have the effect that instead of borrowing money at 8½ per cent. we shall be borrowing it at 4 per cent. I think the Treasurer should devise some means to prevent speculations of this kind being carried on, because it would be an exceedingly unwise way of borrowing money for any purpose. I am glad to see that one exceedingly vicious aspect of the Bill has been altered, inasmuch as it said, if any money was invested in this manner, that it should be paid into the Consolidated Fund of the colony. I am happy to see that taken out. I want to say, further, that if any loan is raised in the colony there should be a clause in the Bill appropriating it to some specific purpose. There is in this Bill no direction how it is to be used, or what for, and, though the Treasurer, in the Financial Statement, states that it is for one purpose, he said in Committee that it might be used for another purpose. Every other loan that has been raised in the colony for many years has been for some specific purpose. I would also point out that we have already borrowed this session a large amount, and it is a great pity that the Treasurer should insist on borrowing further in this direction. He seems to think the colony is to be made prosperous in this way, but I for one cannot see it. Then, I think the House should take notice of one remarkable fact, which shows how rapidly the evil of borrowing goes on. We originally began by guaranteeing one or two small things, such as the Westport Harbour and Greymouth Harbour loans, but we have gone on from bad to worse, until last year we guaranteed all the notes of all the banks in New Zealand, practically guaranteeing a million for outsiders; and this year we have guaranteed two millions for a bank, and it is on the cards that we are going to borrow still further for that institution. The colony has pledged its credit for three millions for the banks. I do not object to some of the guarantees, but I do think the House should be very careful before it goes very much further in guaranteeing. The time will come when the colony will be called upon to meet the interest on some of these guarantees. I should like to ask the Treasurer another question, and that is this: If we borrow all this money, and it is not specifically allotted to works, and is frittered away in unproductive works, how is he going to manage without further taxation? This loan means additional taxation, and, unless it is put into reproductive works, such as railways carried to a paying-point, it cannot be made to pay. If the Treasurer had come down with any definite scheme this Bill would not be nearly so bad as it is; but I should be glad if the Treasurer would, in his reply, tell us what the money is to be used for. I am aware that any hostile criticism is practically useless. I should further like to say that the clause which the Treasurer says is tying up the power of the Treasurer, in my opinion, does not do that at all. In conclusion, I would say that I can see no great advantage from the Bill, but on the contrary disaster. If the honourable gentleman is going to get all the money he can out of the colony, and not spend it in profitable works, it simply means fresh taxation, and a large amount of public money withdrawn from circulation and put into the coffers of the State.

Mr. BUDDO.—I shall only detain the House a few minutes while I record my objections to the Bill. I do not think it is wise for us to withdraw at present money from the channels of our trades, and I think this Bill is not so much devised with a view to encourage thrift in the colony as to follow the example of the Old Country of investing the funds of those wealthy institutions which are receiving large profits from foreign countries and the colonies. The circumstances of the Mother-country and of this country are entirely dissimilar. They have a very large income from outside sources, and there is a mutual advantage in their Consol system. It is a very good investment for the public, and it is also a good policy for the Treasury to keep their national debt going from this source; while in New Zealand every penny of revenue is required for running the State and finding the cash to pay the interest on the capital we have borrowed from the Mother-country. The first proposal that strikes me is that in clause 3, to borrow £1,000,000. I consider at present the raising of Consols in this colony to the amount of one million would be a mistake. The state of trade in the colony cannot afford it, and if you give a limit of one million it will be entirely disastrous to trade, which is now suffering from a lack of capital. The traders and farmers of this country find very great difficulty in getting overdrafts at the banks and equal difficulty in meeting their mortgages, while every facility is already given for the encouragement of thrift in the colony by investing in the Post-Office Savings-Bank, as well as by private financial institutions. I have no objection to the State having every opportunity to acquire funds in temporary difficulties, but surely it might do so on different lines. Weak finance on the part of any Government is a mistake. At the same time, we must take care that we do not weaken the finance of the traders and others in the colony who are driving a legitimate trade for the good of the country. We must not forget that a comparatively large amount of revenue is derived from small traders and farmers throughout the colony, and the working-people depending upon them; and I consider a system of Consols will cripple them in every way. I see no reason why nearly the whole of this money that has been voted this session for various purposes could not be raised in the London market. That is the place to go to for loans, especially when our trading finance is not strong. There is not the slightest doubt we should serve the interests of the country by doing so, and at the same time allow our local finance to adjust itself. It is a well-known fact that during the past year the bank overdrafts to small trading firms have been decreased by one-half. It will be seen that in many cases we have very largely reduced trade by this. So long as money is plentiful the trader is encouraged to go on, but the moment the bank tells him he must draw in he is liable to restrict his business. We must allow that money is not plentiful at present, and we shall find this system of investing the private funds of the colonists in Consols necessarily restricts our trade. I believe the duty of the Government of the day, if they see that our trade suffers from this system, will be to at once raise money in some other way if it is required, and, if not, at any rate to allow the Consols scheme to have a rest. The State has a duty to perform, and the first duty is to the taxpayer in matters of finance and to protect the traders, and through them the colony as a whole.

Sir R. Stout

Mr. BUTTON.—I merely wish to put on record that in all its stages I have opposed this Bill, which is one of the financial policy Bills of the Government. I hold the opinion that it is calculated to produce very mischievous consequences; and, without any further remark, or any other wish than to record my protest against the Bill, I content myself with voting against the third reading.

Captain RUSSELL.—Sir, members of the Government have never been in the unfortunate position in which we are placed now, neither can they realise the difficulty under which we all labour in getting up to make a protest against that in the wisdom of which we certainly disbelieve. We are under this disadvantage: that we know if we are capable of advancing any argument worth listening to it will not be attended to; that members' minds are made up for them, and it is useless to put forward any argument, however convincing it may be. This, however, will not deter me from entering once again what I recognise to be a futile protest against what is virtually admitted by the House to be a very improper and injudicious measure. Three special reasons may be brought against the Bill: first, that it is a borrowing Bill introduced by a Government which professes to be a self-reliant, non-borrowing Government; the second reason is that this borrowing Bill is a Bill borrowing at the most expensive rate it is possible to raise money at; and third, this expensive borrowing Bill is in itself a sham. What has come of all the promises that we were to be self-reliant? They have gone. Why are we compelled now under this Bill to borrow at a higher rate than the colony can obtain money for in the Old Country? And in the third place, why is the country—and, I am afraid, the House—led to suppose that the money will be raised in New Zealand itself? Everybody must know, if he takes the trouble to think, that a Bill cannot by any human ingenuity be devised under which it is possible to provide against the money-lender in England taking advantage of the high rate of interest offering under the so-called New Zealand Consols Bill. I have heard of a case in point. Some time ago Queensland and Victoria set themselves to have local loans at a considerably higher rate of interest than ordinary loans raised in the Mother-country. What was the result? There is an instance of a Scotch financial company doing a large business in Australia which took advantage of the high rate of interest offered by the Queensland and Victorian Governments, and that institution, instead of subscribing as it would have done for a share of a loan to be raised by those colonies in the Mother-country, at a comparatively low rate of interest, tendered for and got a considerable sum of money at a higher rate in the colony on the so-called local loan.

8.0. The manager of the institution himself admitted that it was practically a free gift of nearly 1 per cent. to that institution, as they had funds that they were bound to invest in colonial securities, and would have so invested them at a lower rate of interest had not the higher rate of interest been practically forced upon them by these local loans in Victoria and Queensland. So there can be no doubt it will be in this instance also. Persons in England with money to invest cannot be prevented from investing in securities belonging to New Zealand unless they are, as I believe they soon will be, afraid of our being unable to pay our interest.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh!

Captain RUSSELL.—Why does the honourable gentleman say "Oh"? Nero fiddled while Rome was burning, and I believe there are several honourable members in this House who would fiddle whatever happened to New Zealand; but that is not going to deter me from saying that I believe the time is not far distant when New Zealand securities will be depressed by the conduct of the Government now on those benches. That will be the inevitable result of the plunging the Government is forcing on the colony. It cannot but have a depressing effect on our securities. This Consols Bill has another disadvantage, [that of allowing the Minister of the day—endeavour to controvert my argument who may—of allowing the Government of the day to practically invest a million of money in any way they choose whatsoever; and this House, in a manner I believe unprecedented in any Parliament of any English-speaking people, has allowed a Government which has proved itself false to all the promises it made on the hustings—false to everything the people were led to believe of it—to borrow money in a reckless manner, without the slightest control over its expenditure on the part of the representatives. Sir, I feel it my duty to put this opinion on record.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—There is one thing that strikes me as very singular, and that is, that not one of the Government party has seen fit to get up and put on record his opinion whether this Bill should pass. An honourable member says they do not wish to waste time, and “Hear, hear,” says the Premier. I noticed this morning the Premier took up a great deal of time, for he wasted two or three hours when honourable members might as well have been in their beds. Sir, I think, notwithstanding what the leader of the Opposition has said—that it is hard to speak in a House that has, by overwhelming numbers, determined upon giving support thick and thin to the Government in this measure—it is still the duty of every honourable member who opposes the measure not only to give his vote against it, but also to state the reasons why he gives that vote. Though this House has only just come from the people, the fact remains that the people have not in any way indorsed this policy; and, Sir, at every possible point in Committee the Colonial Treasurer determined that he would have no amendment, no matter how reasonable it might be, though he said from time to time that he had no wish at all to do that which the Bill will permit him to do. Yet even on this point he determined he would have no amendment whatever, either of a legal character or to restrain any Colonial Treasurer from doing that which he himself said he did not want to do. He called upon his majority to ram the Bill through the House without any amendment whatever. Now, Sir, the main point in which the Committee tried to amend the Bill was that one million was more than was required. According to the Treasurer's own statement he only meant to raise half a million, either within the current financial year or within a year. Now, if it was so, there was no necessity to pass a million, because this House will be in session in plenty of time next year to pass half a million, or whatever amount the House in its wisdom may see fit to pass. But, apparently careless of that which has always been one of the highest privileges of Parliament, one which Parliaments have most jealously guarded,—that from year to year they shall pass the estimates and find the ways and means,—this House has taken a new departure, and an unprecedented course—that is, it has committed itself to giving moneys for several years in advance, even though it did not know, in some cases, what the money was going to be used for. Then, there was the question with regard to interest. Though the Treasurer, and every Minister, and a great number of their supporters have said from time to time there is an enormous amount of money lying in this colony that is not earning interest, that money is plentiful, and that there will be a large demand for these Consols, yet, in the face of reiterated statements that they could raise money easily in the London market at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., they have determined they will have nothing less than 4 per cent. in this Bill. And, Sir, what is more than that is, they are demanding to have it for a time that, I think, is altogether extreme. If we take the fall in the rates of interest for the last ten or fifteen years we shall see that forty years is too long a time to issue 4-per-cent. Consols for. But the Colonial Treasurer, with all his assertions that there is plenty of money in this colony, is not at all sure that he will be able to get money in the colony, and therefore he is determined, if he cannot get it in the colony, he shall have power in this Bill to go on the money-market in the Home-country and raise the money there. He was not sure in the first place, for it was partly a legal point, as to whether the Act of 1884 was sufficient, or whether the Act of 1887 was not the primary Act, and it would be impossible under that Act, unless in certain succeeding measures it is specifically stated in certain terms: under that Act he would be able to go to the Old Country and raise this money either by converting it into inscribed stock or by raising it on the ordinary money-market. Now, the amendment I moved in Committee I think was a most reasonable one. It was that if we are going to have Consols in New Zealand we should, at any rate in the first place, determine that we would have them at the lowest possible price within the purchasing-power of the Treasury in New Zealand, and that they should not be sold at less than par. That, I think, was a fair amendment; but the Treasurer opposed it with the whole force of his battalions. That is clear evidence that he does not believe he can get the money at that price, and that he is determined he will have money, even if he has to get it at 95, 97, or 99. I think the House should not have given the Treasurer this latitude. He may say he does not mean to sell at less than 4 per cent.; but this House has no right whatever to allow it to be at the mere ipse dixit of the Colonial Treasurer as to the price at which he will purchase money. We ought to determine in most unmistakable language what the conditions are on which we shall get money. The Colonial Treasurer said, in the course of his remarks in Committee—and owing to his not accepting amendments the debate was more of a second-reading character than a debate on Committee points—that moneys invested in banks are not loans. Well, I contend that, whether you put money into the Post-Office Savings-Bank or whether you put it on deposit in any of the private banks, that is, so far as the depositors are concerned, a loan. There is no doubt that these Consols are a specific loan, only that it is raised in the colony; and the late Colonial Treasurer had no qualms upon this question, because in his 1892 Budget he distinctly stated that it would be a loan raising money on New Zealand Consols. Now, there is one clause that seems to aim at an old-age-pension scheme; it is the one that will allow minors over ten years of age to be the holders of Consols. As they are to have a currency of forty years, I do not know whether he is driving at an old-age-pension scheme or not, but it may be intended to be something in the nature of an annuity—something that when the holders are fifty they can fall back upon. I do not know that that is so, but it clearly shows that he means to dive into every hole and corner in New Zealand to get money to spend. Now, there is another point with regard to this Consols measure on which, I think, the House has not taken a proper stand, and it is this: that for the first time in New Zealand we are voting money before we know what it is to be used for. That would be new not only in New Zealand, but in every Anglo-Saxon country. Ways and means should always come after the policy is unfolded as to the works the Government mean to undertake; but this year we have determined to give the money first, and to find out afterwards what it is going to be used for. I am of opinion that this money will simply be absorbed by the measures which the Minister of Lands has introduced, and that the Government, instead of raising a distinct sum of money for the prosecution of public works, are raising by a side-wind three-quarters of million as a country vote. There can be no question at all about this: that the Government feel they are certain of the city vote—whether their present supporters are or are not returned for the centres, they feel sure they can poll the city votes; and they have so formulated their borrowing proposals as though the money was all to be raised for the country, in the hope that thereby they will secure the country party in New Zealand. I tell them they will never secure the middle yeoman farmers in New Zealand—they will never have them. They have never belonged to the Liberal party, and never will belong to it. The Government can fly as large a kite as they like for that vote: they will never get it, and they will find that out as time goes on. Though they may think that by this dexterous process of splitting up the vote they will control the country vote, I feel sure that when the members return to their constituencies the country people will see the hollowness of these proposals. And it is to be regretted that a Ministry that for three years went round the country stumping the country and asserting that they were a self-reliant, non-borrowing party—

Captain Russell

An Hon. MEMBER.—We have heard that before.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—Yes, and you will hear it again and again in this House, just as long as I choose to state it. I know what I am saying, and I know what I am doing, and if the honourable gentleman only knew it as well he would get on his feet and debate these measures more than he does, instead of simply blindly supporting them. The people of Oamaru did not send their member to the House to support these proposals. They sent him to support the Government who were promulgating from every platform in New Zealand a self-reliant non-borrowing policy, and the honourable member was returned on those lines, for doing that. The members who were supporting them in the last Parliament, and who were returned to the House for this Parliament, did not realise that the Government were not living on the net revenue of the colony, though they had led the people of New Zealand to believe that they really had been living within their resources. And yet, without any great change having taken place in the country, the Government have met this House and asked under half a dozen different systems for loan-money. So far as the electors are concerned, the country has not pronounced in favour of these financial proposals, and I believe that when the country realises the magnitude of these proposals it will say, "We will have none of them." However, I am not going to speak any longer on the question. I gave my views very fully when we were debating this Bill in Committee, and I trust the time will soon come round when I shall be able to debate the question in public, and realise whether the people of the district I come from really sent me to the House to support these proposals or not.

Mr. CROWTHER.—The honourable member for Hawke's Bay told us a few minutes ago that one of the Roman Emperors was fiddling while the city was burning. Well, I do not think any of us here to-night are in that mood. So far as I am concerned, I feel the question is too important to be so lightly treated. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay related the story, of course, only to illustrate the position. So far as I am concerned, upon this third reading of the Bill I feel more afraid of it than I did on the first consideration. If I could make up my mind under any circumstances that we could form any groundwork for making ourselves believe that we could make it a success I should be willing to support it. I have a strong desire to do whatever I can. If I could only make myself believe it is for the good of this country and the people who are in it I certainly would do so. I have no desire to find fault with any member in this House. I have no desire to preach either Liberalism or any other ism. My doctrine is the good of the country. I would support this measure if I could believe that we could see sufficiently far ahead to offer some sort of guarantee to the people who sent us here that it was a measure that we had the best reason to believe would promote the interests of the country. At present I have not been able to train my mind into any such belief: I must therefore vote against it.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Before the honourable gentleman replies I have just a few words to say. The honourable gentleman has been compelled by certain circumstances beyond his control to accept various amendments to this Bill since he first introduced it; it has therefore been considerably modified; but the measure, in my opinion, is still one that ought not to be passed. However, the honourable gentleman has got a majority at his back which enables him to carry anything through this House, no matter how inimical it may be to the best interests of the colony. When the honourable gentleman was before the country at the late elections he made no proposal whatever such as is embodied in this Bill—namely, to go upon the London market to borrow a million of money, and with power to expend that million without any control whatever by this House,—because the honourable gentleman has no schedule whatever attached to the Bill. All he tells us is that the Bill is no worse than receiving deposits of money through the Post-Office Savings-Bank; but he has endeavoured to hide the fact from this House that this money is to be borrowed for forty years, without any power on the part of the lenders to demand its repayment, whereas in the case of the Post-Office Savings-Bank the money deposited there by the colonists is on demand, liable to be paid out at any time. Then, when the honourable gentleman replies on the third reading, I hope he will give the House an explanation of the reason—he has not done so yet—why we should be called upon to pay 4 per cent. interest out of the consolidated revenue on the million to be borrowed, when the Government on more than one occasion has told this House and the country that our credit was so good that there was no difficulty whatever in borrowing money at par in the London money-market at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest. What justification has the honourable gentleman for tying down this colony to the payment of 4 per cent. interest for forty years, when as a matter of certainty we shall be able long before that to borrow money possibly at half that rate of interest? The honourable member for Hawke's Bay told the honourable gentleman what he had been told more than once already—that he would not be able to keep out the foreign money-lender from gaining the advantage of the high rate of interest under this Bill. The honourable gentleman told us that he was going to make provision for this by regulation. I feel the honourable gentleman will not be able to do that, and more especially after the instances which have already been related regarding similar borrowings by Queensland and Victoria, for these transactions have also come under my own personal notice. The manager of the financial company which conducted these operations told me the whole particulars himself, so that there can be no doubt whatever about them; and we shall have an exact repetition of them under this Bill—namely, foreign capital coming in and taking all the debentures at 4 per cent. interest, when the colony could have borrowed at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The Government have over and over again been convicted of aly borrowing. To that they are now adding equally aly spending, because we can get no particulars whatever from the Government benches as to the purposes to which this million of money is to be put. For my part I have done my duty to my constituency and to the colony in making my protest against this Bill, and I can go no further than to vote, as I shall do presently, against the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. Buchanan

Mr. WARD.—I have to thank the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) for his expression of consideration this evening. I regret that I cannot agree with the observations which the honourable gentleman has put upon record in speaking upon the third reading of the Bill. In Committee, as he said, various points were debated very fully, and, of course, the opinions of the Government, as expressed in Committee, were not recorded. Now, the honourable member takes exception to this proposal upon the ground that it is raising money locally, and, like the honourable member for Wairarapa, he indicated that it was the intention of the Government to raise this money at 4 per cent. I have stated already, and I now repeat it, that both honourable members very conveniently forgot to state that the rate of interest is not to exceed 4 per cent. I stated in Committee during the consideration of the Bill that it was intended to first issue these Consols at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If after trial the rate is found to be too low to do any good, then only would the higher rate be adopted. Whether or not this system of issuing Consols at that rate of interest will be acceptable to the public, if it cannot be to those honourable gentlemen, it will be to the people in the colony who wish for a safe means of investment which they are unable to obtain for themselves. Now, Sir, the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) stated, on this point, that the savings-banks were the proper places for the smaller class of investors to put their small deposits. That, no doubt, is so. He went on to argue that the banks were the right places for the large deposits to be placed in. I do not deny that the honourable gentleman is to a certain extent right on that point also. I say, however,—and I think very few members will contradict it,—that during the last year or two some of the institutions in this colony which have received large sums of money on deposit have not used those moneys in the colony, but that those moneys have gone elsewhere, and that there was a desire expressed during the elections that this exodus of money from the colony should to a certain extent be stopped. The primary object of this Bill is to give those persons who are desirous of sending their money to the monetary institutions of the colony for investment an alternative method of placing their money out at interest, feeling that the colony should have the benefit of its investment here. That is one of the reasons why this proposal has been put before the House; and I repeat that the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest at which it is intended to issue the Consols in the first instance will not, in my opinion, have the effect feared by the honourable member for Kaiapoi.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Is that at par?

Mr. WARD.—Of course it is at par, as the honourable member will see if he looks at the Bill. Honourable members continue to harp upon this par business. I wish to direct the attention of the House to the real position in connection with this par matter. We heard the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) make statements on this point to-night, and last night also, which showed that he could never have read the Bill, for if he had read the Bill and understood it he would never have made the statements he did in Committee or in the House. If he will look at clause 6 he will see that it is absolutely provided that "Every person making any such deposit shall at the same time lodge an application in the prescribed form for his name to be entered in the register as the holder of inscribed Consols for the amount which he so deposits." Consequently Consols would be absolutely inscribed for the amount he has deposited. Therefore the honourable gentleman's argument about issuing below par will not stand looking into. If a person wishes to take out Consols for £100, he puts down £100, and he gets an inscription for the amount which he deposits. The honourable member could not have understood the matter when he made his statement. If a person is desirous of investing, say, a sum of £15 under this proposal, he will receive Consols for that amount, and if he has £250 to deposit he gets an inscription of Consols for £250. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) asserted that through these Consols we wish to borrow to the full extent allowed by the Bill. I do not think that any honourable gentleman can be serious in making a statement of that kind. This is not an issue of debentures, it is not an issue of Treasury bills, nor is it an issue of stock with the object of obtaining money for this colony for loan purposes; but it means placing these Consols on sale to the people in the various money-order branches of the Post Office, and at the Treasury. If they do not choose to invest in this way the colony does not get sixpence from them. There is a very great difference between the position of these Consols, Treasury bills, and debenture stock, and a trial of the system will prove beyond question the correctness of my assertion. There is no such possibility as inscribing at below par. The honourable gentleman asked in Committee why I would not accept an amendment from him to the effect that Consols should not be issued at below par. The honourable gentleman must know it is an absurdity to say that. If it were necessary or useful, of course I should have accepted it, but, as it is, it is not possible to issue below par. Then, again, I am told that no amendments in the Bill would have been accepted by me in Committee; but I think honourable members will agree that every amendment I proposed in Committee was agreed to. They were important amendments, and in the direction of doing what some honourable members, in my opinion, rightly desired; and the principal one was to have this money safeguarded and not allowed to go into the Consolidated Fund. I moved amendments absolutely putting it beyond the power of any Government to use this money for the ordinary purposes of loan-money; and honourable members, in saying that no amendments were accepted in Committee of this House, are saying what is not correct. The senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) said that this system of lending for long periods is not economically sound, and he argued that some years ago money was worth 5, 6, and 7 per cent. Well, there can be no doubt that at the time the honourable member referred to money was dearer than it is now. And the honourable gentleman cited financial authorities for saying it is undesirable to issue these loans for long periods; but let us come down to the practical level, and I say that the position of affairs in the financial world at the present time is opposed to that view. We have this on the best authority, and lately had an instance where a short-dated loan did not realise nearly as much as it would have realised had it been a long-dated loan. During the last month or two we have received information from the Agent-General that the highest-known financial authorities have stated that the very fact of limiting the period of years would probably act detrimentally to the object for which a recent loan was issued. I refer to the guaranteed two millions for the bank. That being so, it appears to me that, while honourable members are taking exception to the proposal in this Bill that the time should not exceed forty years, they completely overlook the fact that circumstances might arise which would make it desirable to make the issue for forty years. I repeat that circumstances may arise in which it would be desirable to make the issue for forty years. Then, the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) said that when in Committee I stated that the Treasurer did not intend to issue the Consols for so long a term as forty years. I wish to say that I made no such statement in Committee; and, as the honourable gentleman said, when the House assembled for the third reading of the Bill, that I had stated so, I wish to put on record the fact that I had not stated in Committee that I was not going to issue them up to forty years. I said the maximum period was forty years, and if a lesser period was not sufficient that would be done. Now, Sir, I pass on to the remarks of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. I was a little surprised at the honourable gentleman's remarks. He said that no Opposition had ever been in such a position as the present Opposition, as their arguments were not listened to. Surely the honourable member must imagine we have all got very deficient memories, and that we do not remember what took place in 1887, 1888, and 1891, during a portion of which time the honourable gentleman was in the Government. It goes without saying that there never was a time in the history of the colony when the arguments of the Opposition were not listened to; and, if the arguments were listened to, then the honourable gentleman was deluding this colony as to what took place during the time of the Administration of which he was a member; and I think that by comparison with what then took place the party at present in power have nothing whatever to be ashamed of. The honourable member forgets that even last night a number of the supporters of the Government, as a result of legitimate debate in Committee, did not do what the honourable member stated. They did not support the Government; they listened to argument, and voted accordingly; and it shows clearly that what took place is in very material particulars very different from what took place when the honourable member was in an Administration. The honourable gentleman is a terrible alarmist; he is a pessimist of the first order; and I regret it for his own sake, because he is a very estimable gentleman, and one we all respect; and I should like him to take a very much higher and more hopeful view of the position of affairs in the colony. He said there were three reasons why this proposal should not be assented to. First, because it was borrowing; secondly, because the expenses in connection with borrowing would be heavy, and we should have to pay 4 per cent.—he forgot to say the interest would not exceed 4 per cent.; and, thirdly, it was a sham. We will deal with the borrowing aspect. Well, my honourable friend said this is a borrowing proposal. Surely he does not ask the House seriously to put it in the same category as ordinary loan proposals.

Captain RUSSELL.—No. I wish I could.

Mr. WARD.—My honourable friend says he wishes he could. But I repeat, unless the people of this colony choose to invest in these Consols, the Treasury will get no money for them; but, if investments are made under the proposals in this Bill, the money is beyond the control of the Administration of the day for the purposes of the public works of the colony. It is a precisely similar position to that of the ordinary deposits of the people in the Post-Office Savings-Bank; and I think it is straining a point to say that it is borrowing, for all that it amounts to is that it places the department at the disposal of the people under a better system than that of the Post-Office Savings-Bank. Now we come to the second reason, that of its being an expensive system of obtaining money. The honourable member, with all the pessimism with which he asked the question, entirely overlooked this important fact: Supposing we give 4 per cent. on these Consols, does not the honourable gentleman know that the holders of the Consols would be receiving the income from them in this colony, and in the ordinary course the holders would pay income-tax? Most undoubtedly they would; and that is a material point. Assuming you had in this colony at the present moment raised money under this system at $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which is the amount these Consols would be issued at, and if we were able to get the money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in London, we have to remember that the local investors would have to contribute to the taxation of the colony, and to pay income-tax upon the money invested, which goes to show clearly that, while the honourable member may regard this as a most expensive system of borrowing, it points in the opposite direction. Now, where does the "sham" come in? It is quite true that my honourable friend, although he is of an alarmist character, and believes that the proposals the Government are making will inevitably result in reckless plunging—it is quite true, whether the honourable member entertains this opinion or not, that he did not so very long ago advocate the raising and loaning of twenty millions in this colony, at 6 per cent. I think. The honourable gentleman quietly proposed to raise twenty millions sterling for investment on private mortgage in this colony, and at a time when the amount of mortgages was only about six millions sterling; and when the honourable gentleman comes along here and tells us we are indulging in a system of reckless finance I want to know what terms can be applied to a gentleman who advocated such a wild-cat scheme as he advocated in his "green and salad days." Words fail me to put the honourable member in the position which he ought to be in; and I do hope he will be very careful, and not follow in the footsteps of one or two others who have preceded us in the politics of this country, by absolutely leading themselves to believe that the whole world is going to the dogs, and that New Zealand is going there first. I can quite conceive that by giving continued expression to such views honourable gentlemen make themselves believe them; and even the more sanguine wonder whether or not, instead of doing good, we are going where the honourable member suggests. I hope his temperament will alter for the better. Then, again, I do not think the honourable gentleman can expect that the system of finance the Government has advocated is going to be used for such purposes as he advocated in Committee. The honourable gentleman said the classes of investments were very bad; but I do not think that he was serious when he suggested that we ought to include racehorses.

Mr. Ward

Captain RUSSELL.—No; I said advances to settlers.

Mr. WARD.—Of course; the honourable member is quite right; he evidently intends that: but, if he thinks racehorses would be a first-rate class of security, of course he is quite welcome to that opinion.

Captain RUSSELL.—Would the honourable gentleman kindly explain how income-tax would be collected on the savings of people whose income would be in most cases under £300?

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member asks me to kindly explain how income-tax would be collected on the savings of people whose income would be mostly under £300. Surely he does not mean to say that every one who invested in the Consols would be in receipt of an income under £300. If he does think so, then I am very sorry for him. For instance, there is included in this Bill provision for investment by minors, and, as a matter of fact, it is quite conceivable that there are minors who are seeking for assistance, or whose trustees are seeking for a class of investment they cannot get.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The trustees pay for many of them.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member will probably give one credit for knowing a little about some of these things, and although those sharp queries of his have to be dealt with upon the spur of the moment, it is significant that he seldom gets one off the track; but I say the bulk of the people in this colony who avail themselves of this system will undeniably pay income-tax. It is perfectly true, however, that there are many who will not do so. I say it is a much better system to have that money raised in the colony, and the earnings upon it retained by the people in the colony, who pay income-tax, Customs duties, and in other ways contribute to the revenue of the country. I want to say a word or two about the honourable members for Auckland City, Messrs. Button and Crowther. It is to my mind a very significant fact that, while the member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) says that he is going to oppose the whole of the financial proposals of the Government, in to-night's Evening Post you will find resolutions passed by the Auckland Chamber of Commerce, either to-day or yesterday, urging that a large expenditure of money should be made for carrying on railways at one place, and for opening up roads in the Auckland District. Those honourable members are perfectly prepared to advocate that money should be obtained for these purposes; and I want to know, when proposals to that effect are brought forward, if they are going to oppose them. I am sure they will be the first there, and no one will deny that you will find them all there when the division of the moneys takes place, and, no doubt, there will be other honourable gentlemen there who also on this occasion assume the rôle of pessimists. When it comes to the time of the division of the necessary moneys for various districts in this colony you will find that there are no other two members in this House who will be so soon after the spoils as the two honourable members I have referred to, who profess to be so anxious about the financial position of the country; and the third will be my honourable friend the member for Marsden, who backs them up for his district requirements very well. Then, Sir, with regard to the honourable member for Wairarapa, it seems to me that he also is becoming somewhat singular in his views; and I may say, without offence to the honourable gentleman, that his attitude is really becoming somewhat extraordinary, because we find him continually airing his eloquence upon every conceivable subject. In Committee he acted quite fairly in regard to this Bill, having vigorously opposed it right through. But when he says there were no amendments made in the Bill he must know that that is not correct.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman has misunderstood me. I said there were no amendments made of the honourable gentleman's own motion.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, there have been no amendments made in the Bill except those I moved myself. I think the honourable gentleman supported some of them; but he should not allow his opposition to everything emanating from the Government to place him in a false position. I can assure the honourable gentleman that he will lose caste if he does not draw the line somewhere. Now, one word for the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw). That honourable gentleman's attempt to raise the question of city and country support to the Government in connection with this Bill was, I think, ill-advised. The honourable gentleman said that the reason the Government were catering to the country members was that they knew they would have the support of the cities. Well, if that is so, then all I can say is that when the elections come round it will be very bad for the honourable gentleman. But I think, if my honourable friend will look at the city support in this House, he will see that we have not got that support as a whole in any part of the colony, so that his argument in that respect was unfair to both the country members and the town members who support the Government. The three members for the City of Wellington have opposed this measure right through, and, as a matter of fact, they are generally opposed to the Government; and two of the Auckland members are generally opposed to the Government; also one of the Christchurch members is not, in the ordinary sense, a Government supporter. Then, we have the honourable member himself, a representative of the City of Dunedin, who has proclaimed himself in this House a deserter from the Government. That being so, the honourable member will see that his argument, so far as this view of the question is concerned, is scarcely borne out by the actual condition of affairs. Now, I have said that the honourable gentleman accused the Government supporters of not debating this Bill; and I think he was again unjust to the Government supporters and to members of the Government upon this question. And why? Because did they not occupy the whole night in talking on the second reading of the Bill? It has been thoroughly debated in Committee. They know that the custom is, when the third reading comes on, to let it go with one or two speeches. There is seldom a lengthy debate on the third reading, especially at this period of the session, when, I think, there is a general desire not to take up the time of the House at any great length. And I have reason to thank many honourable members for their generosity in waiving their right to indulge in long speeches when no object can be attained. I have to say, in conclusion, that this system of introducing Consols into New Zealand is, in my opinion, a good one. Time alone will enable the colony to judge whether my opinion is justified. I say that in the colony at the present time there are moneys available for investment which it is well known are not invested at all. I believe there are moneys in the colony which are not deposited in the banks of the colony at the present time, and, that being so, I say the Government are quite right in giving to the people of the colony another method of placing their moneys on deposit. And I repeat that, so far as this system of Consols is concerned, it is impossible to issue them below par, and the proposal to issue them in the first instance at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is, in my opinion, a safe policy, and one which can only be left to time to judge. I hope it will succeed. It is an experiment, and the money may not be freely subscribed, and, indeed, I may say I do not think it will be. I decline absolutely, myself, as one who desires to see the country prosperous, to believe in the pessimistic views of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay and those who support him in such views. I am hopeful of the future prospects of the country.

The House divided on the question, "That the Bill be now read a third time."

AYES, 81.

Carncross	Kelly, W.	Parata
Carnell	Larnach	Pinkerton
Carroll	Lawry	Reeves
Collins	Mackintosh	Seddon
Duncan	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Flatman	McGowan	Stevens
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Ward.
Guinness	McKenzie, R.
Hall	Millar	Tellers.
Houston	Mills	Hogg
Hutchison, W.	Morrison	Montgomery.

NOES, 22.

Allen	Massey	Stout
Bell	McGuire	Tanner
Buick	McNab	Te Ao
Crowther	Meredith	Thompson.
Earnshaw	Mitchelson
Hall-Jones	Russell, W. R.	Tellers.
Heke	Saunders	Buchanan
Hutchison, G.	Smith, G. J.	Newman.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
Harris	Lang
Joyce	Button
McLachlan	Green
Pirani	Wilson
Russell, G. W.	Mackenzie, T.
Steward	Fraser
Willis.	Kelly, J. W.

Majority for, 9.

Bill read a third time.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

9.0. Mr. SEDDON.—Mr. Speaker, it was with some diffidence that I accepted the position of Native Minister. I knew that this question was one of great importance to New Zealand, and more particularly to the North Island. It was the desire of the Government, so far as possible, to bring about friendly relations with the Native race, and we had every desire to do justice to our Native brethren. First it was necessary that there should be confidence established. It was the want of confidence and the distrust that have existed in the past that have been the cause of the troubles between the two races. I am pleased now to say this: that the relations between the two races are of the most friendly and cordial character. I have every confidence in saying that the Native race now look upon the pakehas as their friends. It requires much more to be done. The Legislature, I say, has its duty to perform, and does perform it, and, if it performs it well and wisely, then I say we have for the last time heard of discord as between the two races. It was necessary that the Native mind should be ascertained. I say it was impossible to ascertain it by remaining in Wellington. I considered, Sir, that it was necessary that the Natives should be visited in the different parts of the colony; yes, even in the hilly fastnesses of the Urewera country. There were some parts of the colony where the Natives were what is known in the Maori language as pouri. The Natives there had taken up, as it were, the position that they could not, in many instances, come to see the Government. In some instances they would not come; they remained isolated; and something was required to be done, and I believed that it was in the interests of the colony that the Native Minister should go; and there was no lowering whatever of the dignity of the position by the Native Minister going into the Native districts and meeting the Natives face to face. I say the fact of having done so has already borne good fruit, and it has had the effect of improving the relations between the two races. Now, Sir, I have said that it was necessary to get a grasp of the Native mind; and I have no hesitation whatever in saying now that that which probably many members of this House had been led to believe, particularly in the past, would be dispelled if they had taken the round I took. They would have found that in the different Native districts and parts of the colony, and amongst the different tribes, there is a difference of opinion as to how Native questions should be dealt with. What has proved satisfactory to the Ngatimaniapotos would not be accepted for a moment by the Natives on the East Coast. They have a different idea altogether as to how matters affecting them should be dealt with. Neither would the Natives north of Auckland approve of being dealt with as the Ngatimaniapotos would desire to be dealt with. The Ureweras are a different people entirely from those I have mentioned, and want separate and distinct treatment. That treatment which would apply to the Natives in the districts I have mentioned would not for a moment be approved by the Ureweras. The result of my visit into the Native districts may be summed up under two heads. One grievance, and the principal one that I found, was in respect of the lands of the Natives, and the management of their lands. True, Sir, where they were empowered to dispose of their lands and to obtain a title to their lands through the Courts, there was a defect in the law—procrastination, delay, and expense—and it was from these two points in particular that I found there was the necessity for a change. I will now tell the House what the different modes of treatment are that are required by the different Natives. At Taumarunui, and right through the Waikato, the Natives favour individual dealing with land also. The Natives prefer individual dealing with land, dealing direct with the Government; and they were satisfied—in fact, well pleased—with the Native Land Acquisition Act of last session. There, if you were to say that they were to deal through their chiefs with the Government, they would not for a moment hear of it. Whether their chiefs have been dishonest with them I cannot say, or whatever the reason may be, but the result was that each owner desired to have a title to the land ascertained, and to dispose of the land to the Government individually. But what they complained of was the prices that had hitherto been paid. They complained of the Government having forced down the price of their lands, and then their necessities compelled them to take what was offered: hence they had sold only the worst of their land to the Government, reserving the best. Even for the worst they had sold they complained that they did not receive a proper value, and they hailed with satisfaction and delight the Act which we passed last session. In Waikato I tried to ascertain the Native mind as regards the King movement, and I found this: that they did not desire to have a separate power of their own; they were not at all disloyal to Her Majesty. I found that underlying this whole King movement there was this one fact: that it was only by that movement that they were able to have any land at all to live upon. There are a large number of King Natives there whose lands have been confiscated; they have no lands, they are absolutely landless: and there are a large number of them without land. By keeping up the King movement they have been, of course, squatting upon lands of their friends. Now, as the Government have commenced to purchase the land from the Natives and to deal with the Natives, as these Natives get their lands through the Court, so the position of these landless Natives becomes almost intolerable, and they have shifted occasionally from place to place. As regards the Opithea Block, where we had the trouble with Kerei Kaihau, I found underlying this the fact that a very large number of these landless Natives were squatted on that block. If the Government negotiated and took that block and made a road through it they would have to go and live with some of their friends. I found this, and look upon this as one of the questions we shall have to deal with: that if we can, as has been done in the South Island and elsewhere, make some arrangement and provide by some means or other for these landless King Natives now in the King-country, and who are most discontented, then I believe myself that will effectually and for ever settle the King movement. Now, Sir, in the North of Auckland the Natives are entirely opposed to dealing with the Government—in fact, to having any dealing whatever as regards their lands. The Bill that was introduced by the Maori member for the district might be said to fairly represent the minds of the Natives north of Auckland, and the Native districts there. They want to establish Native rights, to have their own legislation, a Parliament of their own, to govern themselves, and, as it were, to draw a cord round, and allow no one inside except by permission of the Natives.

Mr. Ward

Mr. THOMPSON. — They are all Home Rulers up there.

Mr. SEDDON.—They are, as my honourable friend says, almost all Home Rulers up there. I inquired what was the cause of this, and I found it was the low prices for land and unsatisfactory dealings, and the improvements made as regards the settlement that had taken place, and in some instances the advantages they had found by leasing the land. In fact, I may tell the honourable member for Inangahua that there the Natives have grasped the situation, and they believe that the unearned increment should go to them. Therefore, as far as their land is concerned, they are desirous of leasing and dealing individually, and not, of course, coming to the Government. But among them I found one or two agitators who had been there from the East Coast, and I found that amongst the Natives they had their professional agitator, as we have amongst the Europeans. Therefore in that respect they have copied the pakeha. Now, on the East Coast the Natives are very favourable to the Government.

Captain RUSSELL.—What part of the East Coast?

Mr. SEDDON.—I mean in the Gisborne district, and all up the East Coast. They are very favourably disposed towards the Government there, and do not desire to go further than this: that they wish, in dealing with their lands, to have committees of management. On the East Coast they favour the committee system. They favour trusts being established, and dealing by committees with the Government as corporate bodies. I have no hesitation in saying, as far as that part of the colony is concerned, that with plenty of money available for land-purchase, with these corporations or committees appointed, we shall have no difficulty in obtaining as much land as we require. They have also a desire—which, I think, should be fostered—to leave their old system of settlement and congregating together, and to go in for individual settlement and farms. I found a great desire on their part to do that, and they put some very pointed questions to me. They said the Government were finding money for placing Europeans on the land, but they were doing nothing whatever to assist the Natives, —to place them on the land in the same way. They said that in this respect past Governments had failed to do their duty to them. Now I come to the Urewera country, and I may say, as regards that country, and regarding what has generally been the idea in the mind of the public as to the value of that land for settlement purposes, the sooner that is dispelled the better for all concerned. It has been something like a coveted garden, coveted by those who are afar off, by those who know nothing whatever about it. If those people went and saw that country they would sympathize with the Ureweras who want to keep the country to themselves. There is very little flat fertile land. It is the most broken part of the colony that I have visited. It is nothing but a series of mountains, gorges, and creeks from one end of the boundary-line to the other. The land in time, many years hence—it is very heavily timbered—may become fit for grazing purposes, but that is all it is fit for. From Whakatane up to Ruatoke you have good land, but most of that has already been acquired. There is just one block going through the Court, and when that block is through I do not think we should exercise our minds in the slightest as regards the remaining lands in the Urewera territory. The Ureweras and other Natives say that Sir Donald McLean, when Native Minister, promised that a boundary-line should be made, and that within that line the land should be theirs. After visiting the district, I advised that in this respect we should let them alone. It has been said that there are gold and other minerals in that part of the colony. I saw some likely-looking auriferous country, and in some places I saw some alluvial wash, and if I had had a tin dish and been on a prospecting expedition I should certainly have tried it. It certainly looked very likely-looking wash. I also came across two or three quartz reefs, and some quartz was given to me which was said to have come from a creek called Ruatahuna, near Te Whaiti. There is no doubt it was gold-bearing, but whether it came from that creek or not I could not say. At all events, I saw nothing to warrant the Government going to the extreme of interfering with the Natives within that boundary. What I think should be done, and which could be easily done, would be this: I think, if there were a road made from Galatea to Te Whaiti, and from Te Whaiti to Te Mimi, and then across to Lake Waikaremoana, the Natives would be only too glad to assist in making it. If you sent a surveyor there and attempted to survey it you would have trouble at once; but if you sent an overseer who understood the Native character, and asked him to make a road right through, and start to-morrow, the Natives would assist him to make it. That is the way you have to go about this business. I also found there—and it was very pleasing to me—a desire that we should establish Native schools, for, though these Natives have by their own action separated from us, they now begin to see that they have done a wrong to their children, and the Natives at Ruatoke, Te Whaiti, and Ruatahuna all want schools. I say it would be a very good thing indeed if we established schools for them. At Galatea, Mr. Wylie, the schoolmaster, has great power over the Natives. He is their medicine-man, their doctor, and nearly everything to them—he has their entire confidence; and if we had such a schoolmaster at Ruatoke, and another at Te Whaiti, and another at Ruatahuna there would be an end for all time, in my opinion, to any trouble with the Ureweras. I may say that I met with the most friendly reception from one end of the Urewera country to the other. Their demands were not at all unreasonable; but the threats which have been held out, and the fears which have been established in their minds, were such as to keep them aloof from Europeans. I hope the same friendly feeling will be established, and that we shall treat them as was recommended very many years ago. I told them very firmly that we must know where their land lay, but, as regarded subdivision or making detail surveys of their land, that was not intended at all. They were quite prepared to agree to that. My opinion is that for some years to come there will be no necessity for our trying to purchase any of their land. There is no necessity for doing more than surveying the outside boundaries. I do not think we shall ever again have trouble with the Ureweras. I have said, as regards the Waikato Natives and those on the East Coast, that no law you can pass would please them. Our laws must be applicable to the Native mind in different parts. There is the same difference of opinion as exists amongst Europeans. What has kept the Natives living together in hapus has been the fact that in the past our laws have been defective. A tribe has land in the Waikato, say, and in Taupo, and one section of the tribe lives on the land in the Waikato and the other section at Taupo. The land is cut up almost like a chess-board, and those little bits of land have been given to Natives residing in the two places. No attempt has been made to allow the Natives to exchange their land, or to give the Court the power of saying to the Natives where they are separated in this way that they may exchange their land. That seems to me to have been a serious defect, and the Natives themselves have said so. Some of these pieces of land were hardly sufficient for a Native to live upon. The land was scarcely worth selling, because there were so many persons interested in it. The Government were not purchasing it, private persons could not do so, and there the land has remained year after year. We must have legislation, I think, which will permit exchanges to be made between the Natives. If we do this we shall be doing good, and we shall promote their going upon the land and settling upon it the same as European settlers. Now I come to the difficulties in connection with the ascertainment of titles. I have often heard on the floor of this House, and in the country, the Natives condemned because their land has remained under their customary title; and it was said they were blocking settlement. But when you begin to go into the question, as I had to do, you come to understand how our laws stood. First of all, there are the delays after the applications.

Mr. Seddon

have come in. There is the cost of survey; then there is the Court to hear the case, which would probably go into it for a month or two; and then there would be an adjournment, and the Court would probably go back to further investigate the case after a delay of eight or twelve months. In the meantime the Natives would be kept in suspense. The Court was sometimes held in a township, and the Natives were kept waiting there day after day, week after week, and month after month. Under these circumstances, the Natives were sometimes almost penniless when they came to the towns: in fact, they have no right to be dragged to the towns at all. One serious blot has been that after the title had been ascertained there was an application for rehearing; the application came before the Judge; the Judge had to decide whether a rehearing should be granted; then a rehearing was granted; and then three months had to elapse. There was all this delay and expense. Many of the Natives saw that they would become landless and penniless through going to the Courts as the law stood. Now, I will state what is proposed to be done under this Bill. The Bill is divided into two parts. The First Division deals with the Native Land Court, the Second Division being the policy or administration as regards Native land after it has passed through the Court. I think it would be a great advantage, as is proposed in this Bill, that land once having gone through the Court should be under the Land Transfer Act direct. What has been the ruin of many of our settlers and those who have trafficked in Native land has been that there has been no finality. For a private person to go in for the purchase of Native land is almost like going on to a sandy desert without a compass—you scarcely know where you will land; the result will probably be that you will perish. That has been the experience of many persons in this colony. In the Bill before us an honest

9.30. attempt has been made to remove the difficulties in this respect. Applications for hearing and rehearing have been abolished altogether, and the privilege, if you may call it so, of going to the Supreme Court has also been taken away. Under this Bill there is simply a Native Land Court, and a Court of Appeal established in connection with it, and a decision of that Court of Appeal is final. It is much better that it should be so than to have the law as it stood in the past. There is also a better provision made for assisting the beneficiary owners in trust. During my visit to the Natives I found their laws very defective, their land being given to a certain number whose names were inserted in a certificate of title as owners. They were, no doubt, intended to be owners in trust—practically trustees; but as time has gone on, and developments have taken place, in many instances there has been a great injustice done to the tribes by those who have had their names placed in the certificates. I think myself that the possibility of such things occurring ought to be taken away, and provision is made for this in the Bill. The sooner that is done the sooner justice will be done to a large number of Natives. Then I come to the question of surveys. As the law stood in the past no doubt many surveys took place when the real owners of the land had never made any application at all. A man desiring to purchase would go to the surveyor, and the surveyor worked with the intending purchaser and obtained the signatures of some who had no right to the land; but with these names, and a claim to be interested in the land, the surveys have taken place; and many Natives have complained of this. Eventually the survey has been made, and the surveyor has had a lien on the land, which has remained standing there. Sometimes he has had the power of forcing a sale, and by this machinery the land has been put into the market and sold. I say the time has arrived when these surveys ought to be done under direct Government control, and private surveys should be entirely abolished. This has been forced on my mind from what I saw and heard on making inquiries. I suppose the total amount involved in liens on past surveys would be about £20,000, and it is necessary that something should be done in dealing with this phase of the question. The honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) moved in the direction of meeting those cases. It is a large sum to ask us, no doubt, to find, knowing our straitened finances, but I believe, myself, the Government should give authority to the Surveyor-General to ascertain the fair value; the Government might then have the power to satisfy the liens, and the Surveyor-General ought to take the land at a fair value for the amount advanced. It would be much better for the Government to stand in this position; it would be better for the Natives, and tend to solve some of the difficulties which surround this very difficult question. I may say that before concluding I shall briefly go through the Bill, so that members may follow me as I explain some of its details. But I come now to the question of the policy of the resumption of the pre-emptive right, and in this respect, although there may be many who will differ from the Government on this point, I say it is the only safe policy to adopt. We may, and I think should, give reasonable facility to those who have been in the past engaged in purchasing Native land, so as to allow them to obtain a title; but as from and after the 1st of January last I think the Legislature would act wisely in saying that there should be only one means by which the Natives can dispose of their land—namely, through the Government. As regards promises or agreements to purchase entered into before that date, some compromise may be arrived at. We have no wish to do what is unjust. There may have been some technical difficulties. In fact, it is impossible to understand the Native laws, or the laws relating to the Native Land Court. A Judge of the Supreme Court has himself said that it is almost impossible to understand the existing law. I say there is good cause made out for allowing such agreements to be completed, and in this case the Government are prepared to carefully consider giving a fair compromise, not desiring to do what is unjust. At the same time we must protect the Natives against fraud where they have not received fair value, or where improper influence has been brought to bear; but where it has been a square bargain between the Natives and the purchaser I think we ought, in passing the Act, to meet the cases, and settle once and for all, and stop once and for all, the purchase by private individuals from the Native race. I think this is a sound policy, and in my opinion it should never have been departed from; and one of the greatest difficulties ever brought about in the North Island arose from the Act of 1873. In Division I. of the Bill you will find a provision enabling the exchange of lands from the Natives. Then, there is the policy question of vesting the settlement of blocks of land owned by large numbers of Natives, and the nomination and appointment of committees of management. I have good reasons for considering it desirable that this should be done. This is more applicable to the East Coast Natives, whilst in other portions of the Bill we have dealt with the question of the individual Native by giving facilities for the ascertainment of title. The Waikato Natives will then be able to deal individually with their land. As regards Natives in the North of Auckland, they could adopt either one of the two methods I have mentioned, but with them it is more a question of price than of anything else, and with the Native Lands Acquisition Act of last session, and with a fair price offered to them, I think the land will be offered to the Government, and difficulties in this direction which have stopped settlement will be removed. Then, as regards private dealing with land under sections 68 to 73: If we drew the line at that all at once there would be some difficulty in getting the Bill through this session, but we know there must be some compromise, especially where extreme views are held on this question. And I say myself that we shall not be doing what is just to the Native race or right to the colony if we do not resume the pre-emptive right. I have said, as regards the part of the Bill dealing with the Native Land Court, we give under section 53 to the Native Land Court exclusive jurisdiction in regard to the probate of wills and the administration of estates. We find a number of wills made by Natives, influenced while unwell, probably on their death-bed, where undue influence has been brought to bear; and the making of wills amongst the Natives is quite a trade: in fact, it has become quite a fine art. That wants to be met, and is met under this Bill. Then, there is the question of transmutation to freehold tenure. This is a step in the right direction in the interests of the Natives and in the interests of the Government, or, if we maintain the right of private individuals to purchase, it is a necessary thing to do. Sections 101 to 113 are entirely dealing with applications for rehearing, et cetera. I say that, in my opinion, nothing has tended so much to injure and demoralise our Native brethren, or been so expensive to them and to the country, and has kept back settlement so much, as the difficulties in ascertaining titles and the constant applications to the Court and the contingent expenses. That is met in this Bill. The proceedings are simplified, and the costs reduced; and at the same time the machinery is such that the method of ascertainment of title is more complete. There is also provision made for the execution of deeds by Natives. The functions of the Trust Commissioners are abolished, and the duties that devolved upon the trust are now to devolve on the Native Land Court. There was no necessity for the double expense, and the proposed machinery of the Native Land Court is, in my opinion, preferable. The expense will be less, whilst the work will be better done. As regards the law relating to surveys, we have also met that matter as well as we are able under existing circumstances. In conclusion, I desire to impress upon the members of the House that the laws relating to Native Land Courts and dealing with Native lands are very defective. Go through the statute-book, and take this Bill, and see the number of Acts that have to be repealed. Any man who turns up and goes through the schedule will see the number of Acts repealed. This Bill only contains a few clauses, and any person who takes it up and reads it can very well understand it. There has been amendment, yet it is a consolidation. I say it simplifies matters, and, if carried into law, I, with confidence, say it will be about one of the best things that have happened to New Zealand for many years. I may be told that it is rather late now to bring in a measure dealing with this large question; but this Bill has run the gauntlet of the Native Affairs Committee. I have to thank the members of that Committee—members who hold different opinions from my own on general politics—for having assisted me in improving the Bill in Committee. Some of the amendments that were proposed I did not see my way to accept, but, taking the Bill as it comes from that Committee now, as regards Division I., I think the House will be practically unanimous in passing it. Then, with regard to Division II.: I would ask the House to go through Division I., and to postpone Division II.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. MITCHELSON.—For a month?

Mr. SEDDON.—No, I cannot do that. I wish to tell my honourable friend the member for Eden that we should attempt to deal with Division II., and settle this policy question, because the uncertainty is injurious alike to the Europeans and to the Maoris. It is simply procrastinating: and, while we are advancing in the construction of roads, I know others are on the track; while the North Island Trunk Railway is being constructed, the land-grabber, the land-shark, the pakeha-Maori is at work, and we must not allow that to go on. We have a right to put our foot down and stop it, especially when there is a fair compromise to meet those who have perhaps in some instances, owing to mistakes as to the law, committed themselves, and whose purchases are just, though not legal. I am quite prepared to meet such cases, sooner than block the passing of a Bill by which we are to do, I believe, the proper thing with regard to the Native-land question.

Captain RUSSELL.—Do you mean to debate Division II. to-night?

Mr. SEDDON.—I do not want to take advantage of my honourable friend. We could not divide the debate unless the proposals contained in the two Parts were in separate Bills; but, as I have said, I am not proceeding with Part II. to-night. The policy clauses I intend to postpone, and simply to carry Part I. of the Bill as it emerged from the Native Affairs Committee. I think that is all that is necessary. Sir, in conclusion, I may say that some rather cruel criticisms were made at the time I undertook the position of Native Minister. I admit that, with the exception of the time I was on the Native Committee some years ago, and occasionally on specially-appointed Committees to deal with Native questions, my knowledge of Native-land laws and Native Land Acts was somewhat meagre. But, I desire to do justice to the Natives, and at the same time to promote the welfare of the Europeans in the North Island. I saw that it was a very large question, and that unless it was dealt with promptly, and in such a way as would prevent trouble in the future, it would be a very bad thing for the colony. I therefore accepted the position, and have laboured hard to master, as far as I could, the details of this large and very important question. And here, Sir, I must say I have been ably assisted in my labours by my colleague the representative of the Native race in the Cabinet. He has been of great assistance to me, and in rendering that assistance I would say he has at all times adhered to what he propounded in this House years ago. If that had then been carried out; if we had then endeavoured honestly to place Natives and Europeans on one plane, and had amended the laws, then, I say, the North Island would be in a more prosperous condition to-day. His advice was then unheeded; but he has remained true to his convictions; and as I went through the country I found the Native race are coming to view matters from that standpoint. That being the case, it is our bounden duty to assist them, and the Bill now before us is an honest attempt to deal with a most important question. And if that question is dealt with on the lines laid down in this measure I say it will be a good thing for the North Island, a good thing for New Zealand, and a good thing alike both for Natives and Europeans. I ask the assistance of members on both sides of the House to deal with this question, and to deal with it in such a way that it shall reflect credit upon our efforts.

Mr. PERE.—Sir, I wish to make some remarks regarding this Bill. My first word is that I agree to the Parts of this Bill which have been passed by the Committee being dealt with by this House. I think that Part dealing with Native lands should be postponed, and also those parts in the Bill which honourable members might wish to amend. I say this because the Government and the Native members have not yet consulted together in regard to this question of dealing with Native lands. That is one of the main principles on which I was returned to this House. The House has had put before it a Bill compiled by the Native people. I think the Bill compiled by the Native people is far superior to any Bill previously introduced into this House, because all the Bills which have been hitherto introduced into this House by Europeans have parts in them which the Europeans themselves are unable to explain the meaning of. And even some honourable members in this House are unable to explain some of the clauses in those Bills. Well, I will explain that I have often found that whenever any difficulty besets any honourable member in this House the invariable practice is to go and consult a lawyer about it, and even those lawyers who are consulted are sometimes unable to explain these laws. It has often been said in these cases that Mr. Button, solicitor, of Auckland, can perhaps explain the meaning. Then, honourable members are sometimes referred to Sir Robert Stout or Mr. Bell. With regard to the Maori Bill, the difference is this: When a Native reads his Bill, he thoroughly understands what is contained in it. I therefore think that the reading of the Part of this Bill which has reference to Native lands should be postponed until the Government and the Maoris have talked the matter over. I have now been in this House a long time, and have not yet seen the Government taking any steps in this direction. I have been hoping that the Government would give me an opportunity of having my Bill before this House considered. But my Bill has been blocked by Government Bills. This is the first Government that has had about a hundred Bills in one session brought before this House, while mine is only one. I consider that all the Bills introduced into this House by private members are Government Bills, because they all have one object—that of administering the affairs of the colony. The Bills introduced in this House by the Maori people are only two in number—one by the honourable member for the Northern Maori District and the other by myself. I refer to the Bill to which Mr. Hone Heke's name is attached. That Bill is the outcome of the pain which the Natives have been experiencing in consequence of the hardships which they have undergone at the hands of the Europeans. As a result of that, the Natives ask to be emancipated from their present state, so that they may in future look to the Queen only. I do not think that this House has any cause to ridicule the idea of Mr. Hone Heke in introducing that Bill. It has been the outcome of bad legislation by this House in the past.

10.0. The other Bill referred to is the one to which my own name is attached. The sole object of the Bill which I now hold in my hand is that no trouble shall fall either upon the Maori people or upon the Europeans. Under this Bill it is proposed that sales should only be effected when a perfect understanding has been arrived at between the parties and they have consented to the transaction. Such is the case also with regard to leases. Another principle introduced into this Bill is to enable the Maori people to go in for farming, because the Native people are at present unable to do this, owing to the restrictions placed upon them by legislation made by this House. Having tied up all the lands, the Europeans now say that the Maoris are too lazy to work their lands. Well, in reply to such a taunt, I now say, Let the Maoris administer their own affairs, so that you may see whether what you say is true or not. I do not mean to say that the Maoris are to be allowed to legislate for themselves, but what I mean is that the Maoris ought to be allowed to introduce into this House certain measures for its consideration, and to be passed into law by the House, so that both races may well understand the provisions. Of course, when the Maori people introduce a Bill into this House the Europeans ought not to amend it in such a way as to make it unworkable. Honourable members ought to be satisfied with what they have done in the past in introducing bad legislation in regard to the Maoris. I am surprised at the Europeans persisting in talking about the Natives in this manner year after year. It is the desire of the Maori people to put a stop to dealings with Native lands. I am quite in accord with the Premier when he says it is now the wish of the Maori people to turn their hands to farming. I also agree with his remark that it is the wish of the Maori people to appoint committees to administer their lands, and that all dealings with Native lands in the way of sale should be made through these committees, and that leases also should be made through the committees. It is the wish of the Native people that the Government should assist and be their friend in dealing with this question. All this is provided in my Bill. It is proposed also to appoint a committee to assist the Maori people, some of the members of this committee to be appointed by the Natives. I dare say honourable members have read the clauses in my Bill, and understand the position. Of course, I admit there are some clauses in my Bill which are objectionable to Europeans, because it deprives them of certain advantages. I will point them out. It is the wish of the Government to resume the pre-emptive right over Native lands, so that when the Government wish to purchase a block of land they may do as they like with regard to it. And with regard to Native lands now vested in the Public Trustee,—I mean the lands on the West Coast,—the Government do not like these lands to come under this Bill; and also the power to enable the Natives to legislate for themselves. Perhaps the reason why they do not like the Natives to hold these powers is that they do not wish the Natives to prosper. It is a great wish of the Native people now that this Government should help them in formulating some laws for the government of themselves. It is also their wish that the Government should borrow money to enable them to work their lands. That is my own wish too, because the Native people are being victimised by banks and private companies. I have already explained my views on this matter, in my last speech—that is, with regard to the position of both Natives and Europeans. I am not alluding to rich and wealthy Europeans. If such legislation were introduced, then the hope which the Europeans express—that at some future time prosperity might light upon the Maori people—will be realised. I will tell the House the way to place the Natives on a more prosperous footing. Do not allow foreigners or people from the islands and other countries to come to New Zealand. Reserve New Zealand for ourselves. We have the poor with us now, let us provide for them, because, if we do not provide for those Europeans and the poor, the probability is they will be setting up unions, and they will be shooting us. I think, therefore, the best way out of this difficulty is what I have suggested. I am inclined to think, Sir, that the poor people in England are being driven out here by the Government in England; and I am also afraid it is the wish of honourable members now to make New Zealand as prosperous and as populous as England is too soon. That is exactly why the poor people are now flocking into New Zealand. I suppose it is the wish of New Zealanders to fill this land with people, so that they will soon be able to set up a kingdom of their own. I think we have a king, and that ought to be our king. I allude to Tawhiao's son. That ought to be quite enough for us. Sir, if the Government will consent to help the Maoris in obtaining money, and the means generally for enabling the Natives to settle their lands and improve them, we shall see that in a very short time the colony will be in a more prosperous state; and we shall see, too, that a larger revenue will be received, after the adoption of such a system. It will take time for the Natives to pay the rates; but, on the other hand, if the Government do not afford these facilities to the people, I shall feel inclined to go and tell the Native people not to pay this rate that is imposed on them, because they are unable to do so, as all their lands are covered with bush. Under the present circumstances, the Natives are unable to distribute themselves in different parts of the country owing to the want of facilities, and owing to the want of good land for them to go upon. In some districts there are about five hundred Natives generally living together, and this is due to the want of land for them to go on. If, therefore, the committees are appointed to deal with this question, then the land will be thrown open to these people. But, on the other hand, it is useless to appoint these committees if they have not money at hand. The appointment of committees should be made simultaneously with the borrowing of money to enable them to carry on the work they have to do. If this Bill will help the Premier to enable the appointment of such committees to be made I shall withdraw all the bad words and bad terms I have used in this House. I wish also to say that the members of this House are far superior to those who introduced bad legislation in the past. I therefore now say to honourable members, Let the bad legislation be confined to the past. I am now appealing to the honourable gentlemen of the Opposition, and to other members; also to the honourable the senior member for Wellington City, who helped in this matter on a former occasion. That honourable gentleman took the first and initiatory step towards the appointment of Native committees when he introduced an Act some time ago, but the Act then introduced by him eventually became a dead-letter.

Mr. Pere

Captain RUSSELL.—Sir, I should like to begin my remarks by offering my congratulations to the Hon. the Premier upon the speech which he has delivered in reference to this Bill. It was logical and clear, and showed that the honourable gentleman had acquired a wonderful grasp of the subject during the time he has been in office. I, of course, differ from some parts of this policy, but I can honestly congratulate him upon the speech he made. With respect to the First Division of the Bill—the administration part—the honourable gentleman was quite right when he said that, practically, this portion of the Bill would go through without opposition; but there are sundry amendments which I should like to see made in the First Division of the Bill. The Bill itself is a vast improvement upon any other Bills that we have had dealing with the subject, and the speech of the honourable member who last addressed us—the honourable member for the Eastern Maori District—showed very plainly indeed what is the opinion of the Natives upon the subject and the policy of the Bill. Honourable gentlemen to-night who will follow me will, no doubt, deal fully with the details of the Bill, and I intend not to refer to the details, but simply to deal with this question of the resumption of the pre-emptive right. I shall endeavour to show, as I go along, that the resumption of the pre-emptive right would be wrong, and, in order to do so, I shall quote the Native Minister himself as having furnished many arguments against it. He told us the experience he had gained from the various sections of the Natives in travelling through New Zealand, and he went on to say that the law must be made so as to suit the different sentiments of the different tribes. The honourable gentleman told us that the sentiment prevailing among the people one and all was that they wished to be allowed to do what they chose with their own lands: in other words, they objected to the resumption of the pre-emptive right by the Crown. The honourable member for the Eastern Maori District told us that it was the desire of the Native people not to have the resumption of the pre-emptive right by the Crown, but that they should be allowed in their own way to deal with their own lands; and that seems to me the only sound policy that we can follow. It is a misfortune, as I find is the case on looking round the Chamber now, that so little interest is taken in this vital subject.

Mr. CARNELL.—They do not know anything about it.

Captain RUSSELL.—The honourable member for Napier says, "They do not know anything about it." If that is the case, surely a sense of duty would lead them to endeavour to understand the pros and cons of a subject which must be of vital importance, not only to the Native people, but also to the whole of New Zealand. As the Premier narrated his travels he told us that from Taumaranui to Waikato the Natives preferred individual dealings with their lands, and they stated that they did not receive proper value from the Government—that they were a loyal people, but would be averse to the resumption of the pre-emptive right by the Crown. Then, the honourable gentleman reached the Waikato, and he told us that the people of the Waikato were all landless, but they were perfectly content—although they were landless, they were loyal. I think the honourable member's own words were that "all they required was some land granted to themselves"; they were quite satisfied with the Maori king, who, in their opinion, ought to govern all New Zealand, but they wanted lands for themselves in separate holdings. Then the honourable gentleman travelled to the East Coast, where, for the first time,—at least he specially mentioned the fact,—he met Natives who were favourable to the Government, or I presume so. He travelled a great many miles before he met them, but they were favourable to the Government: and how could they otherwise express themselves, when they found the Native Minister travelling amongst them? All will agree, even the Premier himself, that they wished to control the dealings with their own lands, and were opposed to the resumption of the pre-emptive right by the Crown; and they wanted, further, what I have advocated for fifteen years—namely, the individualisation of titles—so that they might have separate holdings, which, I maintain, can be the only solution of this question. Then the honourable gentleman travelled into the Uriwera country, and the Premier, in spite of their being "pouri," sympathized with them, although he was scarcely happy in the illustration he gave. He said they wanted to keep their own land, and we must sympathize with him, because according to the honourable member, the people were so poor that they could not even find a dish for him with which he could wash for gold. Still, the day will come when there may be goldfields discovered there, when the land will come into occupation. There can be no doubt that, as regards the resumption of the pre-emption, the Uriweras want to stick to their land to the absolute exclusion of everybody else. But the honourable gentleman went on to say that, although the probability of hostility had passed, we had better not send a surveyor up there. Does not that go to show that we have still to be careful in our dealings with the Natives, and that we have to consult them? And we ought to consider their feelings their sentiments, and their prejudices when we come to altering the law in connection with their lands. All the Native members, representing the feelings of the whole Maori people, are opposed to the resumption of the pre-emptive right. The members of the Native Affairs Committee, appointed by Ministers on account of their greater intimacy with Native matters, agreed almost unanimously to strike out the clauses of the Bill authorising the resumption of the pre-emptive right; and all honourable members who have addressed the House in this debate have agreed on this one point, whatever difference of opinion they may have upon the details: that the Natives should be allowed to deal with their own lands. It is a matter of supreme importance to them, it is also of supreme importance to the colony, and we ought to sanction nothing that is in direct violation of the sentiments of the Maori people. I sympathize with the desire of the Premier to simplify the administration of the Native Land Courts, and to prevent the miserable scenes of drunkenness and debauchery which are said to be attendant on the sittings of the Court; and I hope such may be prevented; but they have nothing to do with the question of the resumption of the pre-emptive right by the Crown, as inquiry into titles must take place under any circumstance. But I contend that the resumption of the pre-emptive right is perfectly at variance with the spirit of the Treaty of Waitangi. The Treaty of Waitangi conferred upon the Natives all the rights and privileges of British subjects, and the Natives did concede to the Crown the right of pre-emption. But I say that pre-emption did not mean, and was not meant to include, the sole right of purchase by the Crown. I should just like to read to the House a few of the words of the Treaty of Waitangi, as they put the case more clearly than my own arguments would be able to put it. In the second article of the Treaty of Waitangi, of the year 1840, it says,—

“Her Majesty the Queen of England confirms and guarantees to the chiefs and tribes of New Zealand, and to the respective families and individuals thereof, the full, exclusive, and undisturbed possession of their lands, estates, fisheries, and other properties which they may collectively or individually possess, so long as it is their wish or desire to retain the same in their possession.”

That, Sir, goes certainly to prove that the Natives were to be allowed to have the sole use and disposition of their lands so long as they choose to retain them. And in the third clause it goes on to say, “In consideration thereof Her Majesty the Queen of England extends to the Natives of New Zealand her Royal protection, and imparts to them all the rights and privileges of British subjects.” Now, reading these two articles together, it does appear to me that the Natives share all the rights and privileges of British subjects; and no right or privilege of a British subject is held more dearly than the right of doing exactly what he chooses with his own property. The resumption of the pre-emptive right is in violation of the dearly-loved right and privilege every one is entitled to. It is in contravention of the Treaty of Waitangi, more particularly because the Natives were by that Treaty assured that they would, individually and collectively, possess the lands and other properties which it was their wish to retain. The spirit now of our legislation is undoubtedly to prevent their retaining in their own hands the dealings with their lands, if they wished to do so.

Mr. SEDDON.—To whom were the Natives to dispose of their lands under the Treaty?

Captain RUSSELL.—The Crown had the first right of purchase. The word “pre-emption” bears its own meaning. Pre-emption is “the first right.” There can be no doubt about it, if you take any encyclopedia or dictionary, pre-emption will be found to mean the first right of purchase, but not the sole right, which, I contend, was never conceded by the Natives. However, I am fortified in the position I take up by a statute dealing with the subject called “The Native Land Purchase Ordinance, 1846.” That ordinance was passed, so far as I am able to judge by reading, consequent upon the sale of land by the Natives to individuals subsequently to the passing of the Treaty of Waitangi. The words are these: “Whereas it is essential to both the peaceable and prosperous colonisation of New Zealand that the disposal of land therein should be subject to the control of the Government of the colony”—now, Sir, the word “control” does not there imply, so far as I can understand, that the Government should have the sole right of buying it—and to that end the right of pre-emption in and over all lands within the colony hath been obtained by treaty, and is vested in Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, and all lands alienated without the sanction of the Crown”—mark the words “sanction of the Crown”—“by any person of the Native race to any person not of the same race do, by virtue of such alienation, vest in the Crown as part of the domain lands thereof.” If the sanction of the Crown had been given there was still power to sell land to a private individual, proving that the word “pre-emption” was not meant to have the effect which some honourable members wish to give it. “And whereas divers persons have, without the sanction of the Crown, entered into contracts for the purchase, use, or occupation of lands, while private contracts are not, and in most cases cannot be, made with due regard to the validity of title”—and so on. Mark the words “without the sanction of the Crown.” Surely this passage, which I have quoted from the Native Land Purchase Ordinance of 1846, goes distinctly in the direction of proving that there were negotiations, and that these negotiations had been carried on between the individual and the Natives subsequent to the Treaty of Waitangi; and it can, I think, fairly be said that the rights and privileges of British subjects, conferred in 1840 by the Treaty of Waitangi, did not exclude from the Natives power to deal with their own lands, subject to the control and sanction of the Crown. I therefore contend that fifty-four years after the passage of the Treaty of Waitangi it would be in direct violation of the principle agreed to half a century ago—of allowing the Natives to deal with their own lands, subject, of course, to the regulation and control of the Crown—to claim for the Crown the sole right of purchase. It may be said, and it has been said very frequently indeed, that it would be infinitely to the advantage of the Natives if the Crown alone had the right to purchase. With this I disagree most completely. In the Native Affairs Committee we got the evidence of a chief from the Taupo district, named Te Heuheu. In reply to a question of my own—I cannot guarantee the exact words—he stated that the selling value of land, if the Crown had the sole right of purchase, would diminish from 5s. to 1s. an acre. Whether he was right in that assumption it is not for me to say; but there is uncontested evidence which goes to show that if the Crown has the sole right of purchase it will reduce the selling value of Maori lands enormously. It seems to me unjust that there should be a limitation. I agree that the country may have the right to prevent the alienation of large areas of land to an individual; I could concede that; but as to the justice of it, that is another thing. But, if the Natives are not allowed to deal with their lands as they wish, it will be a mistake both in regard to the interests of the Natives and of the Europeans. I remember making a speech on the subject fifteen years ago, and I took the trouble this evening to look up that speech, and I should like to quote some illustrations I used at that time as to the effect the resumption of the pre-emptive right would have on the value of land,—because so long as the Crown and the Crown alone had the right of purchase, the price paid to the Natives was ridiculously small; and I shall proceed to show that the Native Land Act was not introduced at the solicitation of land-sharks, as is so frequently asserted. The first Native Land Act, of 1862, was not introduced at the solicitation of land-sharks, but on the direct advice of Sir George Grey, who was Governor of the colony, and on the advice of the Duke of Newcastle, who was Secretary for the Colonies then. And all the highest living authorities on Native questions of those days, not excepting Bishop Selwyn, agreed that the true solution of the Native question, and the only way to make the Native people satisfied with Native-land sales, was to pass a Native Land Bill empowering them to deal with what was their own. To illustrate the prices paid by the Crown, I referred on that occasion to the report of Mr. Rogan to the Chief Commissioner on land-transactions in the Kaipara district from 1857 to 1859. He reported 152,530 acres as bought for £5,520, or at a fraction over 8d. per acre. Then, in Auckland, so late as 1861, 244,000 acres of land were purchased by the Native Land Purchase Department at an average of 9d. per acre. There are other illustrations similar, if not worse. Then, we come to another case, which illustrates well what would inevitably happen if the Crown had still the right of purchase. Mr. Commissioner Searancke, writing in 1861, says,—

Captain Russell

“On 12th November, 1858, I had again the honour of reporting to you on the negotiation for the purchase of the block [Upper Manawatu] of land, when his obstinacy was further confirmed and shown. I then offered him [Te Hiriwanu] a sum of £5,000, and subsequently £6,000—both indignantly refused. Since that time I have twice seen him and his friends, but his demands were still so exorbitant that I was compelled to decline any further negotiation verbally till such time as he would listen to reason. The acreage of this block is 250,000 acres, of which quantity 136,000 are of good available quality.”

I wonder what “reason” was in those days, when a chief was so obstinate and unreasonable as to want £6,000 for a quarter of a million acres; but this is an illustration of what happens with Government officers writing about the unreasonable demands of the Natives! Fancy the absolute indignation expressed at the fact of Native chiefs wishing to get a few pence more for their land! And inevitably that will come about again if the Crown has the sole right of purchase. Here are a few words on the introduction of the first Native Land Bill. It was the Hon. Sir Francis Dillon Bell who was Native Minister at the time. He said,—

“I hope, however, honourable members who see me standing here as a Minister and bringing down such a measure will not mistake the position which His Excellency’s Advisers take in this matter. We do not pretend to come down to this House and ask its assent to a new policy of our own, or to accept from us a proposal which might or might not afterwards—as in the case of ‘The Territorial Rights Act, 1858’—receive the assent of the Governor. We propose it as one means of giving practical effect to the Native policy of His Excellency Sir George Grey, and it is with the highest gratification that I am enabled to announce to the House that the principle involved in this Bill—namely, that the Natives shall be allowed to have as good a title to their lands as the Europeans have to theirs, and that they should, in the event of their disposing of or renting their land, be allowed to obtain the value of their land—has received His Excellency’s assent.”

And this was upon a letter written by the Duke of Newcastle to Sir George Grey in 1861, when Governor of the Cape, and when he was about to return to reassume the Governorship of New Zealand. There is nothing like quoting authorities on the subject, and these were the words of Bishop Selwyn:—

“The remedy appears to be simple—namely, an unqualified recognition of the Native land title to the fullest extent, and with every legal security that would be given to any landed proprietor of our own race.”

I have taken the trouble to quote this, inasmuch as it goes to show what the opinions of eminent men were when the Native-land question was one of serious import in this colony. Men like Mantell, Richmond, FitzGerald, Carleton, Domett, and others held the same opinion—that the right of pre-emption was not beneficial to the colony, that it was retarding colonisation, and was not in the true interests of the colony and of the Native people, and that, therefore, it should be repealed. If it was desirable, so far back as 1862, to allow the Natives to deal with their own lands, it would be unjust that that privilege should be taken away now, unless very good cause is shown for doing so. The principle I have always advocated is the individualisation of the title. There is no use repeating arguments I have adduced to the House before in favour of such a scheme as that; but I would ask the Premier to remember this: that, however desirous he may be of obtaining land for the settlement of the colony,—which is a right and proper thing for him to desire,—first of all we must consider what is just to the Native people: and justice to them demands that we should endeavour to elevate them and place them on the same footing as the European race as speedily as it is possible to do it. That can best be done by granting to them exactly the same privileges and putting on them the same responsibilities as are imposed upon ourselves in the matter of the land. Again, on this question of the right of pre-emption, there are many difficulties in the way, and the Premier said he would endeavour, when we are in Committee on Division II. of the Bill, to see whether it will be possible to meet those defects, and to adjust them. I would point out this: that the Premier said that reasonable facilities would be given for completing transactions entered into before the 1st January last. If he had said reasonable facilities would be given to complete transactions entered into prior to the passing of this Act, I could understand what he was aiming at; but why he should limit it to the 1st January last, and not up to the present time, I cannot understand. I would ask him to consider that it is practically a repudiation of the just rights enjoyed by the people if transactions entered into under the Native-land laws of the country at the present time are not allowed to be completed, because it seems to me that to prohibit from completing their transactions with the owners any persons who have invested money believing they would in the course of time acquire a proper title to those lands, would be quite extraordinary; it is unjust to these people to say, arbitrarily, that all the money they have invested shall be lost money. Of course, such an act as this will affect every class of security. You must bear in mind that land-speculation has been going on in every district of the North Island. I believe that land-speculation has been perfectly right, legal, and beneficial, and that it would continue to be so if it were allowed to go on. It has been carried on under the land-laws of the country at the present time, and I would urge the Premier, if he succeeds in passing the clause of the Bill in relation to this matter, to have a fair and proper time for completion of transactions extended to all those persons who have entered legitimately into negotiations either for the lease or the purchase of lands. I would suggest that those persons should have a proper definite time extended to them to complete these transactions, otherwise there will be a very serious loss to these people; and it cannot be held to be just that persons who have only done what the law allowed should be punished by an Act which really would be retrospective in its effect. Whether the House will indorse the arguments I have endeavoured to place before it to show that the right of pre-emption is in violation of the rights of the Native people I do not know; they are worthy of consideration. The Native people are, like ourselves, now subjects of Her Majesty, and to impose upon them restrictions that are not imposed upon ourselves seems to me an improper thing to do. The day was when the Maoris were a powerful race; they were always a chivalrous and a brave people; and now that we are more powerful, though we are not more chivalrous and brave, we must remember in our very strength that the Maoris are still a brave people, they are equally colonists of New Zealand and subjects of the Queen, and that justice to them is due at our hands.

Mr. CARROLL.—I must compliment the honourable gentleman who last spoke upon the mildness of his words, and the temperate language he has used throughout his speech on this Bill. I see very clearly now that we have come within measurable distance of each other, which may have the effect of our arriving at a more satisfactory solution of this question. In considering this subject we must view the law which exists at the present time, and then judge by contrast whether this Bill is an improvement or otherwise. It must be known to honourable gentlemen that the existing laws are far from being satisfactory. There are restrictions and limitations at the present time affecting generally all dealings in Native lands, which I need not mention. There are also obstacles in the way of Native owners trading with their lands, either to the Government or to private individuals, and there are manifold difficulties in the way of Europeans who wish to enter into transactions with the Natives. The endeavour of the Government is honestly in the direction of trying to improve things as they stand. We have done the best we could. We have considered the question from all points, and with due consideration for the interests of both Natives and Europeans; we have studied closely the rival theories of individualism and collectivism, and we have earnestly endeavoured to do what is in the right direction. I candidly admit that no one can bring in a perfect Bill, to meet all details and all conditions satisfactorily. There is always some defect or other, some unworkable part here or there, and it is only after you bring a law into force that, by its operation, you find out what the weak points are. But we claim the credit of aiming at true principles, which will lead to the proper ending of all the difficulties that have clouded us in the past. Now, standing out clearly and boldly in the speech of the honourable gentleman are the two points which he emphasizes. First of all, he is in favour of free-trade in Native land—or, in other words, he is against the principle of pre-emption by the Crown. Secondly, he thinks individualism is the only system by which the present difficulties can be surmounted. Now, although I am inclined to agree with him to a certain extent—and I followed his arguments pretty closely—I must differ from him on more than one point in these two principles which he advocates. First of all, let us deal with the question of free-trade. Supposing to-morrow the Natives had free-trade—that free-trade in its entirety was in force in this colony—what would be the result? Every European who wished to acquire a piece of land would go to the Natives individually, and would make individual bargains and acquire individual interests in blocks of land which were not individually but collectively owned.

Captain Russell

Captain RUSSELL.—Individualise first.

Mr. CARROLL.—To individualise in all Native blocks of land would be an impossibility, and in most instances would prove ruinous to the owners. I will put a case. I with fifteen hundred others own a block of seventy thousand acres. It is not cleared land; it is bush-country, and very irregular. Now, there would be fifteen hundred of us to individualise. Would it pay us to do it? What could we do with our individual shares? They would be thrown away. The cost of survey alone would eat up each owner's share. Honourable gentlemen can understand that it is practically impossible to deal with land of that character on the individual system. You cannot individualise, and therefore I am in favour of that portion of this Bill which advocates a system of committees, or the setting-up of corporate bodies. In that I quite agree with the Native member for the East Coast, and with my honourable colleague the Premier. That is the only way by which you can deal with lands so circumstanced. I will put it this way, to make it clear: Supposing that land was owned by fifteen hundred Europeans, what would be the first thing that would suggest itself to the mind of these Europeans? They would face the fact that they could not individualise it to advantage,—that their individual ownership was of no use to them. Some of the fifteen hundred owners would call a meeting of their co-owners and would say, "Let us incorporate ourselves; let us form ourselves into a joint-stock company, all the owners becoming shareholders; let us set up a committee, who shall be our directors; let them deal with this land; let them cut it up in any shape or form they think best for selling or leasing purposes, and the proceeds from the leasing or selling shall be divided among the owners or shareholders pro rata." That would be the system, and I will show how, in a very few cases, it might work. Supposing that land already instanced was first-class land—beautiful fertile country, all plains, bountifully watered, and of the highest value, worth, say, £12 or £15 an acre. In a case of that kind—a very exceptional one—I should be in favour of individualisation. It would then pay each individual owner to go to the expense of survey, to incur the cost of going before the Court, getting his individual title, paying for it, and holding his land in fee-simple. These are the two extreme cases I wish to place before the House, in order that honourable members may fully comprehend the merits of both. But, then, what is the fact now? All the best lands of the Native people have gone from them.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. CARROLL.—Well, the quantity of land they hold now which you can describe as first-class land is nothing to speak of. Certainly in our part of the country it is only a little portion here, a parcel there, and so forth. Speaking generally, the cream of the country has already passed from the Natives into the hands of Europeans. Therefore we must come down to this: that the bulk of the land held by the Maoris at the present time is second-, third-, and fourth-class land. That being so, we must adopt a principle of dealing with such land that will bring about the best results. I am inclined to favour the system of incorporation of owners in preference to any other. I will just refer shortly to our trip through the North Island. The Premier has given an account of it which I can corroborate. In different parts of the colony the Natives live under different conditions. In the Waikato, as has been stated by my colleague, the Ngatimaniapotos, who are the largest landowners, are not so much in favour of collectivism as they are of having individual dealings with their lands. They used very forcible arguments in support of it. They were very reasonable, and they also said that, failing to get free-trade, or the right to individually deal with their land, they were quite prepared to be allowed to work under the Act passed last session entitled the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act. The principle therein involved is that any purchases conducted by the Government with the Natives shall carry with them the principle of valuation—that is to say, that there shall be a fair valuation of Native lands when purchased by the Government. I think the Premier is quite prepared to concede that point to any section of the Natives throughout the Island, making the exception in land already under negotiation to the Government. That, I consider, would be fair. Where the land has not been under negotiation, where the land has not been under contract to the Government, although it may be under Proclamation, then the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act passed last year should come into operation; and if the Natives want it so let them have it by all means; we cannot honestly withhold it from 11.30. most convenient and speedy method of bringing land under such conditions either into the market, or into cultivation or other use. Now, we will again take the individual them. I must correct the honourable member for Hawke's Bay in his reference to the account given by the Premier. In the Waikato the Premier did make a difference between what we call the Kingites and the Waikatos. The Kingite Natives are absolutely landless. They told us tales of woe about their landless condition. They asked for land to be given to them that they might settle upon it. They are so badly off for land that they even asked for school reserves to be returned to them, which they admitted they had given years ago for such purposes. There are in the Waikato some Natives who are not Kingites, who are very well advanced in education, who are in daily communication with Europeans, who own land individually, and in some cases collectively—fairish and good land. They separated themselves from the King movement because it was to their advantage to do so. They say, like reasonable persons, that they can make more out of their land by utilising it than by joining a movement such as the King movement. In the North of Auckland, it is quite true that, as the Premier said, they are inspired by a strong national sentiment. They have a reverence for the Treaty of Waitangi, but they cannot reduce anything evolved from it to a practical basis. They say, "Give us 'home rule'; we adore that Treaty; that Treaty was entered into on our soil; our old people made solemn pledges, and were the recipients of the bounty of Great Britain"; and so forth. They say, "We adhere to that Treaty, and we ask you to give us home rule. Let us make laws ourselves, and administer our own affairs." I have nothing much to say against that. We may admire their national spirit, but, at the same time, in this material age, we cannot give way to sentimentalism. We must consider the ultimate result: the good of the Maoris and Europeans, and the question of colonisation and settlement. Touching the question of the pre-emptive right: it is open to argument. I take a different view from that advanced by my honourable friend the member for Hawke's Bay. He says the pre-emptive right does not mean the sole right to buy. That may be so; but, after reading that Treaty, the only right to buy, I contend, rested in the Government. If a Native chose, in regard to his own property, he had the sole right to the use of it: but there was nothing in that treaty to indicate that he could sell to any one apart from the Crown. That was, however, altered or varied by some ordinance which the honourable gentleman quoted. What was the principle there? It admitted that there could be private dealings, but they were subject to the control of the Government and to the sanction of the Crown. If my honourable friend is in favour of that, let him see what our present Bill proposes. We propose the pre-emptive right: that the first right to purchase Native land should rest in the Crown; and, furthermore, we say that any dealing whatsoever between private individuals and the Natives shall be under the supervision of the Crown; the Crown shall be cognisant of every transaction affecting Native land. We have the experience of the past, and are guided by that experience. In every instance in which the Natives have been allowed to deal as they liked with Europeans their land has gone from them. Can any honourable gentleman point to any rich tract of country still remaining in the hands of the Natives? No. All the good portions of the country are settled upon by Europeans. Where are the Native owners who parted with those lands? Where are those who, according to the free-trade principle, received the value of the land in those days? What has become of that money? Sir, both Natives and money have disappeared. Those who are alive at the present time are absolute paupers. That has been brought about by free-trade. The Natives have never profited by free-trade in their land. Under the other system they have profited to this extent: In most of their purchases the Government made reserves, which the Natives continue to hold. Those reserves are not, as a rule, open to private dealing. There cannot be any serious injury done to the Natives by the Government having the pre-emptive right. I hold that that right, as against free-trade, will prove in the end more to the advantage of the Natives. Wherever the Maori and the Government act harmoniously together, one as the coloniser and the other as the colonist and settler, good must come from it. I need only instance the case of the West Coast Native reserves. Supposing the West Coast Native Reserves Act had not been passed by this Legislature, where would have been all that beautiful land stretching along the west coast of the North Island, which still belongs to the Natives? That land would have fallen into the hands of private individuals. What is the result now? Through the operations of that Act the land is reserved for the Natives. The Public Trustee was appointed to administer those reserves. They are cut up and leased to different Europeans; and very good settlers they are: in fact, the whole of that country is closely settled. The rents have gradually increased, during the last five years, from £7,000 to about £16,000. That is the result of administering Native lands for their benefit on broad lines, and under Government superintendence.

Mr. Carroll

Mr. BELL.—Why not try that system?

Mr. CARROLL.—That system should be in vogue.

Mr. BELL.—That is not in this Act.

Mr. CARROLL.—This is an important step towards it. Let us get the thin end of the wedge in. The objection made to the principle we embody in the Act is that the Crown is to have the right of purchase; but we have embodied this principle in all our legislation. We have passed the Land for Settlements Act, giving the Crown the right to purchase private lands held by Europeans; and would you forego this right in connection with Native lands? It stands to reason, as a matter of right, the Government of the country must stand above the individual, and must exercise its right—that right is greater, and the exercise of it must be on wider lines. After all, what is fair? Let us be fair to all; let us divide the present legislation into three parts; let us say that where the Native is fit to take up the position of a European, being free and independent, holding in fee-simple—not any undefined interest—he shall be the same as the European; where they occupy tribal estates, let them have the right to incorporate themselves for the purpose of dealing better with their lands. Let the Government, in the public interest, buy what it wants, before anybody else. And there is another class we must attempt to deal with. We should clear up the past—clean the slate; clear up all the imperfect transactions under which, although acting bonâ fide in an honest spirit, people have—by the peculiar legislation passed by the House, and by the various rulings given by the Courts on different points on which titles have hinged—been unfortunate enough to be placed in such positions as to entitle them to claim relief from us. We are not, however, in a position to make good what was really bad. But wherever there has been an honest effort in the direction of acquiring Native lands, where all parties have agreed, and only technicalities bar the way, it is only just that we should legislate to afford them the relief it is meet they should have. I have, in conclusion, to point out that I have divided the question into three parts. As far as the machinery part of the Bill is concerned, I do not think we shall disagree. Division I. was carefully discussed and threshed out before the Committee, and whatever amendments we were able to make in it we made. I do not apprehend any difficulty in passing that Division of the Bill through Committee, and I am sure we shall receive assistance from both sides of the House. There may be portions here and there which, in our endeavours to make a good Bill, we have not thoroughly grasped, or made as effective as they should be; but the intelligence of the Committee, no doubt, in going over the Bill will pick out such parts and set them completely right. With regard to the policy portion of the Bill—Division II.—I was glad to hear the Premier propose to deal with that on another occasion, although the debate will be taken on the whole Bill. I think that is a wise course. No matter how much we differ, no matter from what different standpoints we look at the question, the policy involved entirely depends upon the question of the pre-emptive right: how far it may be extended or modified; how far it will meet the condition and circumstances of the Natives living in one part of the colony; how far it will meet the circumstances of the Natives in another part; and how far it will affect the Europeans who are desirous of acquiring small holdings here and there directly from the Natives. But let the principle of honesty be the first consideration in our efforts to bring about a happy solution of the question. Let us be fair and straightforward with all parties. I have every hope that before the Bill passes through the Legislature we shall have come close together, and on the principle of give and take, governed by reason on all sides, we shall make a very fair measure indeed.

Mr. HEKE.—I should like to touch upon the arguments raised by the Premier and the Hon. Mr. Carroll before I touch on the Bill itself. The arguments raised by the honourable member for Waiapu were directed first to the Crown's right of pre-emption, and its benefits to the Natives if that right were resumed by the Crown, and he urged upon the House the disaster that would fall on the Natives if private dealings were allowed, giving cases to substantiate his arguments. I wish to say that it is needless for me to go through the course of the arguments raised by the honourable gentleman. In years back—take the year 1887, when he was contesting the Eastern Maori Electoral District with another candidate—the whole course of his arguments then, and a few years after that, was against the Crown's right of pre-emption, and he gave very sound arguments against it. I may quote instances where, in a special report by the honourable member, when a Commission was set up by this House to inquire into the best mode of coming to a solution of the Native question, he says,—

“Evidence adduced before the Commission proved conclusively that where the Government interposed with its pre-emptive right, as was the case in the King-country, the Natives could not obtain a fair price for their lands. The Government offered 3s. an acre: at the same time, private purchasers were in constant communication with the owners, and willing to pay them £1 an acre. Need one wonder that large areas are blocked, therefore, retarding the settlement of the country, for the simple reason that the Natives refuse to take the 3s. an acre offered to them by the Government, when private parties are prepared to give them more than six times that amount?—and quite right too. During the many years the Government retained the right of pre-emption over the Native lands, the period was one fraught with many acts of injustice to the Natives.”

It was most amusing to listen to the honourable member. He completely changed front. While speaking just now, he raised the argument that it is fair that the Crown should have this right. If such an argument should be recognised by this House, all I can say is this: that I think it very unfair for the honourable gentleman, after putting his views fully and most clearly before the Natives, to come and urge now in the House quite the contrary to what he urged a few years back. Whether he has changed his mind entirely, of course I do not know: perhaps that may be so. Then, on another occasion, he put before the Natives this: that the desire of the Maori people was that the mana of the land should rest with the Maori people. Instead of the Natives being protected by the law, they were placed at the mercy of the Government of the day. Once the people themselves lost control of their lands, they had to say Good-bye for ever to it. I may add that this will be the inevitable result if the rights of the Natives are taken away from them by Acts passed by this Parliament. And he insisted on several occasions, before large gatherings of Natives, that the Natives should hold on to their lands. Listening to the arguments raised by the Minister to-night, they are most inconsistent with all the statements he was so fond of telling the Native people on the East Coast and elsewhere. I should like to touch on some of the arguments raised by the Premier. In the first instance, I will touch upon his flying tour through the Native settlements. I have here a pile of letters, written to me from all parts of New Zealand, and from the leading chiefs in the country. All these letters show that they were dissatisfied with everything put before them by the Premier when he went through on his flying tour. I can substantiate that, as far as the North of Auckland is concerned, the Natives there were pouri—that is, sorrowful—that they were dissatisfied. I helped the Premier myself to convene a meeting, and a very representative meeting, of all the Native chiefs of the Ngapuhi Tribe and the Rarawa in the Hokianga district at Waima, to hear what the Premier and his colleague the honourable member for Waiapu had to say to them. Addressing the Natives, he said that, if they had any grievances at all, that was their opportunity to have them placed before him. The Natives, of course, were delighted to hear this statement by the Premier. The Premier stood and lectured them on different matters; and the time came when they thought it was drawing to a close and the Premier would be leaving. They asked him whether he had time to listen to their grievances: that was about six o'clock in the evening. The answer the Premier gave to the Natives was far from satisfactory. He said he had no time—that he had to catch the ferry-boat at a certain hour; which was no doubt correct. But he should have said that in the first place, and not left them to think that they were going to be satisfied by having a hearing from the Premier, who would listen to their grievances. However, I shall not dwell upon that. Now with respect to the land in and about Waikato. As stated by the Premier himself, the Natives there are entirely against the Crown's right of pre-emption being extended over their lands, and they, as the Hon. Mr. Carroll states, bring forward strong arguments. There is no doubt about that. Now, the main feature of the objections raised by the people of the Waikato, and also by all the Natives throughout the country, is this: that the prices offered to them by the Government purchasers are far too small compared with the prices offered to them by private individuals. I would impress upon the House this: that the only thing the Natives want is the necessary safeguards to prevent sharp practice: that is all they want. Pass some good measure: that is all. I quite agree with the arguments of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. It is only reasonable that a limit should be put to the area that may be sold by the Native owners to any private individual. That would get rid of the chance of private individuals buying from the Natives such extensive areas as used to be the case in times past. We have that now in force under the Act of 1886, which limits the area to about 650 acres. Whether that is complied with or not, of course, I do not know. The Premier says that what should be done is to gain the confidence of the Natives. That is quite right. Now, if the confidence of the Natives should be gained, as stated by the Premier, we have here the Bill of the honourable the Native member for the East Coast—a Bill which deals with the whole administration of Native lands. Now, what I should like to tell honourable members is this: When dealing with Natives' property honourable members must take into consideration that it is very unfair to compare the Native mind with the European mind. If it is the desire of this House to pass legislation to deal satisfactorily with Native property, you ought to accede to some of the proposals that are made by the Natives themselves. There is no doubt about that. Now, there is one thing which would bring the whole question to a speedy and most satisfactory issue, and that is to accede to the Natives all the different provisions set out in the Native Lands Administration Bill that has been introduced before the House by the Native member for the East Coast. There are provisions set out in that Bill which are also set out in the Native Lands Administration Act of 1886. And here I may refer to the arguments brought forward by the honourable member for Waiapu to-night. He recognises the principle which is set out in "The Native Lands Administration Act, 1886." Now, I should like to tell the House that when the honourable member put forth his views before the Natives in 1887, a year after that Act was passed, he was entirely opposed to the principle set forth in the Act. To-night, however, we hear him affirm the principle set forth in the Act of 1886. It is most wonderful. No doubt he is convinced of the necessity of dealing with the Natives through Native committees, which I firmly believe should be conceded by this House to the Natives. I also wish to say that there are several clauses in the Native Land Court Bill now before the House that have been taken from the Bill which the honourable member for the East Coast has introduced. There is the matter of incorporating and setting up of committees. No doubt that has been taken out of the honourable member's Bill, and also the matter of exchange. What I should like to say is this: It is a pity that the Premier could not see his way clear to accept the whole Bill. There is nothing in it opposed to the present laws of the country. It aims at nothing else than the utilising of the Native lands; it gives the Natives power to deal with Europeans or the Government direct, and to settle people on the lands by way of lease to the Government or to Europeans, or sale to the Government or to any Europeans. The Natives who attended the meeting at Gisborne said that the Natives had not the means of stocking their land; and it was thought fit that some provision should be set out in the Bill introduced by the honourable member for the East Coast to enable them to obtain funds to get stock or to clear the land, so as to bring revenue to them, and also to provide for the increase of settlement in the colony. Now, touching upon the Bill itself, there are clauses in the Bill with which I agree. I believe, with the Premier, and also with the Hon. Mr. Carroll, that some of its clauses are good. At the same time I must take exception to other clauses in the Bill, which would do nothing but tend to provoke and irritate the minds of the Natives: such clauses, if carried, would tend to cause trouble, which might result in bloodshed. There is no doubt about that. I refer to clauses 60 and 61. Now, this is a kind of legislation that should not be introduced in any measure that is intended to deal with Native matters. Here you have clauses which take away all rights from the Natives, and vest those rights in persons who have no right whatever to the soil of New Zealand. They may have a piece of land where they live, but they were not the original owners. I think such clauses as these are nothing but unfair to the Native owners. Clause 60 vests the power in a Judge, who can authorise a surveyor to go upon Native lands and cause a survey without the consent of the Natives, thus depriving the Native owners of all their rights. I think that is very unfair. However, I will move when the Bill is committed that a change should be made, and I would ask the Premier to reconsider the matter, and to put in a clause or a proviso to the effect that the consent of the Natives should be obtained in the first place. Then, clause 61 hands over entirely the rights of the Natives to the Surveyor-General. That is awfully wrong. There is no justice in that—depriving the Natives of all their original rights to the soil, and then handing them over to a person who practically has no right at all. It is not only on the Treaty of Waitangi, referred to by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, that the Natives base their rights to the soil, but on the fact that they were original owners coupled with that Treaty. I think it is very unfair that a measure should be passed through Parliament to deprive the Natives of their original rights. Now, leaving that, I should like to refer to the clauses that set out the matter of surveys and survey costs. This is a very important matter. Under this Bill, as honourable members can see, surveys can be forced upon the Native lands whether the Natives like it or not. Now, it is very unfair that, where surveys are forced on the Natives whether they like it or not, the charges for the survey should be laid upon the land, and that they should be charged a cruel interest of 5 per cent. on the principal. If the Natives are unable to pay such survey-cost, the interest to be paid continues. I think that is very unfair. However, I shall endeavour to introduce something that may be reasonable, and I would ask the Premier and his colleagues to act as reasonably as possible and try to put the thing into a reasonable form. I think the rights of the Natives should be acknowledged. There is another thing I should like to see in this Bill. The minority here is shown to have full power over the majority. This is unfair. If the principle laid down by this Parliament, or by any Parliament, was that the minority should rule the majority, it would be all right. In this House the majority must rule, and, if it is recognised that it is right for the majority to rule here, it ought also to be recognised in the matter of the Native lands. The majority of the owners interested in alienating the block of land should be recognised, instead of the minority. We have had cases for several years in which trouble has been brought upon the Natives by one single individual. I venture to say, if this Bill is passed in the shape it is in at the present time, the inevitable result will be that trouble will again arise among the Natives. There is no doubt about it, I think, that this Parliament should try to avoid all that as far as possible. As the Premier has agreed to deal separately with the part of this Bill which refers to the Crown's right of pre-emption over Native lands, I will reserve my right of speaking on that until it is brought forward.

Mr. Heke

Mr. MITCHELSON.—You may not have the opportunity.

Mr. HEKE.—Well, speaking upon this point, I think we have had so many cases bearing upon it that it may be accepted by members of the House that we have just grounds for saying that the Crown's right of pre-emption over Native lands should cease altogether. We hear honourable members on the Government side urging this: that the Natives have suffered materially in respect of dealings with individuals, and that by allowing the Crown to deal with them the effects would not be so disastrous to the Natives, and that it would be better, therefore, that the dealings with the Crown should be made with the Natives direct. I can bring before this House evidence to show that the transactions which have taken place between the Government and the Natives have been just as bad as the dealings which have transpired between private individuals and the Natives. In fact, we have before a Committee of this House a petition which shows clearly that even direct dealings with the Crown have been to the Natives more disastrous than dealings by the Natives with individuals. And here I wish to urge, and again repeat that, if the Government wish to prevent disastrous effects from falling upon the Natives in respect of any transaction made between the Natives and Europeans, they should provide all necessary safeguards to prevent sharp practice. That is all. And I think the matter of having Native committees, so that every negotiation or transaction with the Native owners of land, either by individuals or by the Crown, should go through the committees, should be agreed to. The majority should be recognised, and the consent of the majority should be obtained in the first place before the committee is able to deal with any land or any proposition put before it by the Native owners. Touching upon the question of pre-emptive right again, I have had several communications from Europeans and Natives where they say the offers made to them by Government purchasers are far too small, and by comparing the offers made by the Government with private offers it shows that between the Government offers and the private offers there is a great disparity. In many cases the private offers are in amount treble those made by the Government, and in many cases they are four or five times greater than the prices offered by the Government. In that case, I should like to say this: that any measure that is introduced into this House to obtain betterment or the unearned increment should not be applied to Native property. Here the Crown takes everything under this by offering the Native merely 2s. for his land, where private owners would offer, no doubt, £1. I say that a measure of this kind, which is introduced to obtain the unearned increment, should not be applied to Native land at all, and even rates should be avoided altogether, and all stamp duty on Native-land transactions should be avoided. I think this is only a fair argument to be used in respect of the right of the Crown with regard to Native land.

Sir R. STOUT.—At this hour of the morning I do not intend to keep the House long, but perhaps it would be better, if no other members wish to speak, that I should say a few words now. First, I have to say that the Bill has been divided by the Native Affairs Committee into two parts. The first portion deals with what may be termed the machinery set up for the ascertainment of the Native title, and for settling disputes between the Natives in respect of their land, probates, successions, and so on. The second portion deals with the policy of the Government in dealing with Native lands, or in administering Native lands. I propose to say a few words under this heading, but, before I do, I may refer to one or two remarks that the Premier used when speaking of his visit to Native settlements recently. I quite approve of what he did in making himself, as Native Minister, acquainted with the desires and views of the Native people. I give him every credit for performing his duty in that respect; but I was rather surprised at the way he put it, as if it had not been the custom formerly for Native Ministers to do this. It may be that he really did not mean to give to his words the meaning that they convey. We know that various Ministers in this colony—Sir Donald McLean, Sir Francis Dillon Bell, the Hon. Mr. Bryce, the Hon. Mr. Ballance, the Hon. Mr. Rolleston, and the Hon. Mr. Cadman—have visited the Native settlements and seen the Natives, in order to ascertain their views. And, even though I was never Native Minister, yet when I was in office I visited the Native settlements in order to ascertain the views of the Natives, especially with reference to my idea of dealing with their lands; so that I know something about them too. I will now point out what the attitude of the Native people is generally in reference to dealing with their lands. To the Maori race the land is everything. It is their sole possession. They have not advanced so far as to become an agricultural people in our sense of the term. When we came to this colony they were neither pastoralists nor agriculturists; they lived mainly by hunting, and it is only after long training that you can expect any race to settle down and become an agricultural people. It is absurd to compare their race with ours. Men of our race have been accustomed to agriculture by a thousand years' descent and training. We must therefore, in dealing with the Maori people, make allowance for their history and heredity, and not expect too much from them, or that they will follow our ways very readily. As I have said, the land is their only possession. They have had no training in manufactures. It would take hundreds of years before you could expect them to follow on our lines. Then, the next thing is this: They are not a people that have been trained to individualism, such as our race has been trained to. They are still in the communal stage, and it is absolutely impossible to expect them to get out of that stage at once. In dealing with them, we must deal with them as they are, and not as we would like them to be,—although, I must say, it seems to me that on the part of our own race there is a tendency to revert to what is termed socialism, and to do away in many respects with individualism; and we ought therefore to make allowance for the Maori people. I make these few remarks because they bear on the manner in which I think the Native lands should be dealt with. We must not forget, I say, that the Natives are a communal people living in a communal state, and that they are not yet advanced enough to be treated like races trained in individualism. What does the Bill propose to do? So far as the first part of the Bill is concerned, I agree generally with its provisions. I have no fault to find with them. On the contrary, I believe that the Bill, if passed into law, will confer many benefits upon the Maori people in the ascertainment of their titles, and in their dealing with land, especially in so far as concerns leases. The new part of the Bill really is that referring to the Appellate Court in reference to Native titles. I approve of the provision for an Appellate Court. It was what I suggested some years ago when I was examined before the Royal Commission, and I think, if honourable members will turn up the evidence I gave, they will find that I then sketched out what I believe the Appellate Court should be. I did that, having been engaged in the Native Land Court, and knowing the difficulties in reference to the ascertainment of Native title. It will be seen that Part X. is that which deals with the Appellate Court. What it does is this, and I do not see anything wrong in it: It says to the Maori people, "You shall have the same right of appeal to this new tribunal as Europeans have in carrying a dispute to the Court of Appeal. An Appellate Court is set up for you, and the machinery is set up to give you what is equivalent to a second hearing." There is no limit in reference to the appeal, and I do not know if it would be wise to have a limit. The only distinction between the provisions of the Bill and what I advocated in giving evidence before the Royal Commission is that in my proposal I suggested that all evidence should be taken down in writing in the Court of first instance—the Court which has first to hear applications to determine who are the owners of the land. That evidence would be all taken down in writing. Now, if it were taken down in writing, after the Court had given its decision, if any party was dissatisfied with the decision of the Court he would have the right to go to the Appellate Court, and that Court would not have to take fresh evidence, but would have to decide the case on the evidence given in the lower Court, except under special circumstances, and very strong reasons being shown for a contrary course being pursued. It seems to me that this Part X. should be amended in that direction. I am very sorry that I did not attend the Native Affairs Committee, and I certainly would have done so but for the fact that I had so many other Committees to attend; and, if I had done so, I would have tried to get the Bill amended in that direction. The difficulty in this Part is this,—and I hope the Premier will consider what I am saying, because I think he should move in this direction: Under this Bill we will suppose a case is to be heard. We know that some cases at present take over four months to hear. Under this Bill the whole of the evidence will be gone over again before the Appellate Court, so that it will be gone over in Court perhaps twice. I think that is a mistake. It will entail a great deal of expense on the Native people, and I think that is unfair. The whole of the evidence should be given in the first instance, and then no fresh evidence should be admitted except upon very strong grounds, such as absolute sickness at the time of the first hearing, or something of that kind. Then let the higher Court be guided by the original evidence, listen to arguments based upon that evidence, and give its decision accordingly. I therefore approve of the appellate tribunal, subject to the limitations I have set out. There is another point, and that is in reference to the surveys. I think the surveyors who survey the land with the consent of the Natives ought to have a lien or charge upon it, and when the land is sold or otherwise disposed of that lien ought to be met. The only other thing is what was referred to by the honourable member for the Northern Maori District, as to the power to make surveys—whether there ought to be power to survey without the approval of the owners of the land.

Mr. Heke

12.30. There is a great deal to be said on both sides of that question, but the difficulty about the thing is as to the owner of the land. You may not be able to ascertain the owner before survey until a Court decides; and if, for example, one section of the Natives say the land is theirs, and another section say the land is theirs, who is to give the right of survey?

Some would say if it were given to the person who had a sort of mana over the land it would remove the trouble, and therefore it might be wise for both parties to leave the discretion to the Native Minister. But in that respect the Bill is not so objectionable as the honourable member for the Northern Maori District thought. I shall not say more about the general principles of the Bill than to again repeat that I generally approve of the amendments made, and I have no doubt, if this first part is carried out, that it will be found to be very beneficial to the Maori people. As to Division II., I hold very strong views, and I doubt if it is any improvement on "The Native Land Administration Act, 1886." Notwithstanding that that Act was repealed, and that no transactions were brought under it, I still believe we ought to go on similar lines in dealing with Maori lands; and that leads me to reiterate what I said before, that the Maoris are a communal people, and we ought to allow them committees to manage their land—committees of owners. I agree with Mr. Pere that the committee system should be tried. That is one reason why I urge the passing of a law to set aside a block of a hundred thousand acres in the Poverty Bay District, and to appoint committees to manage the lands. I do not think we should have any land-purchasing at all excepting in special cases; and even then we do not need to borrow the money. If we said to the Maori people, "If you wish to sell your land, here is the Waste Lands Board to act for you as your kaiwhakahaere,—as your agent for administering your Native land; you can have your own committees, who can confer with the Land Board as to the mode in which you wish your land disposed of. If you wish it sold, it can be sold through the operation of the Waste Lands Board: it may be sold under the terms of the Land Act for cash by auction." I think that would be a fair thing. We should allow them to put it up to auction, the Land Board to have the right to get payment for the survey and a certain portion for roading the land. The amount would be limited by Act. This course would be cheaper; and if the Maoris wished to lease it, either under the lease in perpetuity or the perpetual lease, they should have the right to do so, and the colony need not buy an acre of land. It would simply be the agent for the purpose of sale, and the Maori people would get the proceeds. Native-land-purchase I believe to be a great evil, and private dealings in land a curse, for I am entirely opposed to the wholesale individualisation of titles and free-trade in Native land. I do not think that is right at all. You must have a limit, and you must stop people from buying land in large blocks. If the Maoris wish to lease only, as has been done on the west coast of the North Island, you need not prevent their doing so. The Maoris, unfortunately, have not learnt much thrift or foresight, and I am afraid the tendency in them would be to sell more land than they ought to sell, and not to reserve sufficient for themselves. That system should be adopted, and all private dealings in land stopped. I am willing to give the Native Minister all necessary assistance to protect the Maoris; and, instead of the State buying land, I would say to the Natives, "If you wish to sell your land you must consult the Waste Lands Board; we will aid you to survey and road it, and in that way you will get full value for your land, and we can put a stop to those who rob you of it." The Natives will get value, and the colony every benefit. The Maoris have very great grievances, but I do not think that adopting the right of pre-emption will remedy them. What is the meaning of "pre-emption?" I agree with the honourable member for Hawke's Bay that pre-emption simply means that the Crown is to have the first offer, but it was never meant by pre-emption that the Crown was to have the first offer at a lower price than the Maoris could get from other people. I had a letter from a Maori yesterday, in which he states—I need not give the names—that he had an interest in a block of 600 acres or 700 acres, but the Government had put a Proclamation upon the land. Apparently the Government is offering something like 12s. 6d. an acre for land worth £3 an acre. The land was assessed at £3 an acre, and there was a person in the district who would have given that price for it; and I say it is entirely unfair for the Government to say to the Natives, "You must give us this land at 12s. 6d., although an outside purchaser would give £3 for it." How would Europeans like to be treated in that way? Under "The Native Rights Act, 1865," they are entitled to the same rights as Europeans, and therefore the Maoris have a great grievance, and I sympathize with them. We have no right to seize their land at a price less than they can get for it in the open market from other people. That is what they object to, and I would urge the House to consider that objection. Of course I will move in that direction, and, whether successful or not, I believe in doing what I consider is just for Maoris and Europeans alike. I do not mean to say that every detail is perfect in "The Native Land Administration Act, 1886," but I wish to see that principle in force. We should go to the Maori people and say to them, "If you wish to sell your lands we will act for you as a medium in the sale. You shall get the very best price that can be got for your land; it shall be sold by auction; we will not allow you to sell it in large blocks, but with the same restrictions as our waste lands are sold under. We will help you by making a temporary advance for roading and survey, and the Auditor-General shall see that the money is properly applied. You will get cash for it, and you will get rid of the people who live on you—the agents and Commissioners. Or, if you wish to lease the land, we will prepare it for you; we will get the rents audited, and we will arrange for their collection, and see that justice is done." What harm could there be in giving the Maoris this right? It is unfair to expect that the race can compete with us in land-dealing or in anything else, and we ought to try to do what we can to preserve the race.

Sir R. Stout

To force them to go into the open market and compete with us is to ask a race which has for years lived a communal existence to jump at once to a higher civilisation, and no race can do so. The lines I have mentioned are the ones that reform should take, and I believe it will be a fair compromise, and one the Maoris will accept. But if you force on them this pre-emption, and take the land from them at any price, you are casting a great burden on them, and they will consider that they are resting under a heavy grievance, which no amount of speech will ever get rid of. All I ask this House to do is to give the Maori people real justice; and we can give them that justice without doing any injustice to other parts of the population of this colony. We have by law—our honour itself—pledged to treat them as we treat Europeans. They have equal rights with us, and I say it is utterly unfair that we should seize their land at a less price than they can get for it from other people. That, I think, is the line reform should take. Then, they want committees to act for the owners of the land; and we should allow them to elect their own committees to manage the land. They can elect them annually or triennially, and the committees can confer with the Land Board, and the Land Board can proceed to deal with the land, and you can reserve burial-places, pas, and cultivations, and by that means you will educate the race and do what you can do to preserve it. I have to say one word more. There is no doubt that the Maori race is lessening in population very largely. In the North of Auckland, where you would think the Maori race would be better preserved than in other parts of New Zealand, there is great trouble amongst them. They are decreasing very much in numbers; diseases have got amongst them, more particularly consumption, and there is a bitter outlook in many respects for the race. Let us look at the thing fairly in the face. We have to remember, therefore, if we wish to preserve them and their lands from ruin, we must preserve the land for their successors—the Crown is the ultima hæres—so that in that respect we are not putting our population to any undue strain in looking at it from the race point of view as far as effecting the preservation of the Maori race is concerned. There is another reason why we ought to take great care that the race should be preserved and not be lost. It is a noble race, with many noble qualities; and on the ground of brotherhood, now that we live amongst them, we ought to strain a point to preserve them, just as if they were our own flesh. I say it is entirely unjust, entirely inhumane, for this colony to kill the race: for that will be the case if you force them into individualising their titles and introduce free-trade in land. I appeal specially to this House to consider the principle of the laws we have passed to limit, as it may be termed, individualisation in the struggle for life. What are our Factories Act, our Shop-assistants Act, and all the restrictions we are passing this session, and passed in the last Parliament? It is the protest against extreme individualism—against the extreme struggle for life. It says there are weak ones amongst ourselves that have to be preserved, and if you allow extreme individualism and capitalistic monopoly the weak ones must go to the wall. If we are doing this for our own people, why should we not apply the same law to the Maori race in order that it may be preserved with far more care than it has been? I do therefore beg that their lands be dealt with under the system I have indicated. I am not going to say that it can be worked out without trouble. I believe it can be worked out with the sympathy and co-operation of the Maori people. It may be that the Act of 1886 was not accepted by them; they did not understand it, and they had what were called pakeha-Maoris who denounced it, and said it would do great injury to the Maori people, because they wanted what is called individualisation of titles to enable them to get hold of the land. They wanted to have the right to purchase at whatever price they pleased, and that was the class who opposed the introduction of the Act. I believe it is the only Act that would tend to preserve the race and to do equal justice to both, and I wish this House to remember that in doing what I ask it is not inflicting injury upon the European people, but it will really be raising the same feelings of brotherhood amongst them when we shall have done what we can to preserve the Maori people.

Mr. MITCHELSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Debate adjourned.

The House adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Monday, 1st October, 1894.

First Reading—Major C. Brown—Land for Settlements Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

New Zealand Consols Bill.

MAJOR C. BROWN.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT brought up the following report of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of Major Charles Brown:—

“The Public Petitions Committee, having carefully considered the petition of Major C. Brown, of Taranaki, praying for inquiry into alleged grievances, and that he be afforded an opportunity of removing the great reproach cast on his long public service, and having taken evidence thereon, have the honour to report that your Committee, having considered all the facts brought before them, are of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to have the case fully investigated by the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court, and that the Government should take the necessary steps for this purpose.”

He moved, That the report do lie on the table.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY thought it was only fair to the Government that he should make some explanation with regard to the report of the Committee. In the first place, he would say that he had no desire whatever to cast the slightest reflection upon the Committee; but unfortunately the Hon. Mr. Cadman, who had been confined to his bed for some time, had not been able to attend the Committee and give evidence. The Committee reported without taking his evidence, and without having taken the evidence of any one from the Native Office. If the Government had been asked they would have put before the Committee evidence of a character that would have justified the action taken by the Government. He therefore begged to move, That the Standing Orders be suspended, in order that he might move that the report be referred back to the Committee for the purpose of taking evidence which would be submitted to it.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT said that this petition had been a long time under consideration. The Committee had been waiting for more evidence, which they had sought again and again. The Native Minister and the Minister of Justice had been more than once invited to give evidence, and they were invited to attend that morning when the Committee came to a decision. In every way they had sought more evidence, if more was to be had, and had carefully considered what evidence there was. A copy of Mr. Brown's petition had been sent to the Under-Secretary for Native Affairs, Mr. Haselden, to report on, and that officer had sent in a full report, which had been fully considered. If the motion of the Colonial Secretary were passed, the case would again be considered by the Committee; but he might remark that already it had not been loosely considered, but very deliberately, and all accessible evidence taken. The Committee had passed no opinion whatever on the action of the Government, but had merely recommended that the prayer of the petitioner be granted and that an investigation of the case be made by an independent tribunal.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said, after what had fallen from the Chairman of the Committee, he thought the Hon. the Attorney-General, who had quite properly endeavoured to put the Government in a proper position in reference to this matter, might withdraw his proposal, and let the report of the Committee be acted upon by the Government. It was only a recommendation for an investigation.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—It is more than that.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said it did not seem to him more than that. His honourable friend Mr. Barnicoat had said that the Committee expressed no opinion on the subject; they merely said that the matter ought to be investigated by a Judge of the Native Land Court. Major Brown had published a pamphlet, which was merely, of course, an ex parte statement of the case; but on reading that he certainly came to the conclusion that the matter ought to be thoroughly investigated, in justice both to the Government and to Major Brown himself.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said of course it was impossible to say what evidence the Government would bring before the Committee, but, assuming that the documents which had been brought before the Committee disclosed generally the nature of the petitioner's grievances, it seemed quite obvious, in the first place, that there was no reflection whatever cast on the Government; but the Committee thought that the circumstances were sufficiently doubtful, to put it in the mildest way, to justify Major Brown's having the matter investigated by some outside tribunal; and that tribunal was one which the petitioner himself suggested—namely, the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court. The circumstances were somewhat involved. The chief facts were brought out before District Judge Kettle, who tried a case in which the circumstances came out to a certain extent, and the jury in that case held practically that Major Brown had correctly interpreted the document in regard to which he was now impeached, and that, in fact, so far as Major Brown was concerned, he had distinctly complied with his duty in interpreting the document. It was suggested that the Government had some other charges against Major Brown; but the Committee did not consider themselves called upon to investigate any charges which were not before the Committee, even supposing the Government could bring forward evidence of a very strong character justifying, in their opinion, the step which they had taken. There was no doubt that Major Brown had been connected publicly with the Native Department for a considerable number of years. As far as could be known, this was the first imputation which had been cast upon him—at all events publicly. He did not know anything about the circumstances, but he was quite satisfied that the proper course, in the interests of the Government themselves, was to have the matter investigated by some outside tribunal. The suggestions or insinuations which had been levelled against Major Brown were of a very grave character, and such that no man who had occupied the position which he had occupied would allow to rest. There was one matter which he wished to refer to, and that was that the Government showed a very great want of courtesy—not intentional, perhaps—to these Committees. The Committee met morning after morning; they were informed that the Government had been communicated with, but no member of the Government had attended the Committee, or sent any one to represent them. Committees were very often left to hunt after information themselves in order to bring up their reports. In this case, the correspondence between the Under-Secretary for Native Affairs (Mr. Haselden) and Major Brown, and Major Brown's statement of the case, and Judge Kettle's report were all brought before the Committee, and were considered; and upon these different documents the Committee came to the conclusion that the case was a matter for investigation by the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court. He did not know what the Council might say about the matter, but he had a very strong opinion that Major Brown was entitled, before his removal from office, to have the matter investigated by a tribunal in which Parliament would have confidence.

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

The Hon. Mr. BOLT felt that he was expressing the opinion of most members of the Committee when he said it was generally considered by the Committee that it would be very desirable to have some evidence from the Government upon this question. It was quite evident, at least to his mind, that the Government would not have taken the action which they did—namely, that of striking Major Brown off the Commission of the Peace—without having some good reasons for doing so. The Committee thought it was very unfortunate that they did not have some evidence from the Government. At any rate, for his part he would like to see this question referred back to the Committee, so that such evidence as was forthcoming might be taken.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON was a member of the Committee, and he looked upon the case as being this—namely, that it was practically a charge against the Government. That was what it meant. Major Brown contended that he had been unjustly treated by the Government in being struck off the Commission of the Peace and having his license as interpreter cancelled. He therefore wanted some person outside, whom he named, to be appointed to judge the case, and this the Committee had agreed to—he (Mr. Swanson) thought, not very wisely, for it was unusual for a man on his trial to have the selection of his Judge. Major Brown asked that an outside power should investigate the case. That request was agreed to. He had no fault to find with the Judge, and he might be entirely impartial. Even if the Committee had waited several more days, he still thought the Government ought to have been heard, because, if the report meant anything, it meant a condemnation of their conduct.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON said that might not appear so to the honourable gentleman's legal mind, but it did so to his mind. Major Brown complained about what had been done to him, and asked to have inquiry made outside the Government before there was any chance of the Ministers being heard on the subject. He would support the motion, with a view to the report going back to the Committee to obtain further evidence.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY had no objection to the report being referred back to the Committee for the purpose of taking new evidence, but he demurred to the statement that the report of a Committee on the petition of a petitioner who had a grievance could properly be viewed as a charge against the Government because the Committee recommended an inquiry by the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court. One of the functions of the Legislature was to redress grievances of petitioners against the Crown, and, if no redress was to be obtained against the Crown by petition to the Legislature, the privilege was a farce and a delusion. Neither this nor any other Government was free from error, and the Government should not consider the report of a Committee, honestly made, a hostile one.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE knew nothing about this case, but he wished to say that there was no question that within the Province of Taranaki Major Brown had been a good servant to the country, and it did appear to him that, after a long career, lasting, to his knowledge, thirty-three or thirty-four years, he should not be denied, at all events, a chance of making his case good. He should be very glad to see the case referred back to the Committee. Major Brown had served the country in a laudable manner for a long period of years, and had made himself respected by all the people in the Taranaki Province.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN said the Council as a whole had heard nothing about the merits of this case, and it was very important that in coming to any decision on the matter they should have the whole of the facts before them, because it appeared that there was the character of the man at stake as well as his prospects; and there was, on the other hand, the question of how he had been dealt with. He did not quite understand, as the matter had now come before the Council, why the Committee had not had the information they wanted before them. He understood that they had applied for it, but, of course, it was not always convenient for a Minister to be present when there was a great deal of work going on. But he thought, at any rate, all the documents or information in the department ought to have been given to the Committee without delay. In the Native Department, for instance, there were Under-Secretaries and others who could have given the information necessary. He thought there must have been some departmental neglect in the matter. He was only judging from what had been stated in the Council. As the matter stood, they were aware that there was further evidence that could be got, and, in the interests of all concerned, he thought that such evidence should be obtained.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY wished the Council to understand that he had no intention whatever of reflecting upon the action of the Committee. He also wished to inform his honourable friend that the honourable gentleman most concerned, who had been summoned to appear, the Hon. Mr. Cadman, was unable to attend, as it was well known that he had been confined to his bed for some time; the Committee therefore came to their conclusion without hearing what he had to say on the matter. He thought it was quite as much in the interest of Major Brown as in the interests of the Government that this information should be supplied to the Committee and to the Government. He held that it was only right that every subject of Her Majesty should petition Parliament if he chose to do so, and he had a perfect right to be heard. He thought that before coming to a conclusion on the matter the Committee might have had a little patience, so as to enable the evidence to be submitted to it.

Amendment agreed to.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY moved, That the report be referred back to the Public Petitions Committee for the purpose of obtaining further evidence.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT hoped the Colonial Secretary, having moved that the matter be referred back to the Committee, would see that further evidence and information were brought forward. He could only say that they had been endeavouring to get evidence from the source indicated by the Hon. the Colonial Secretary, but were unable to obtain any more. The evidence they had was complete, he thought, comprising as it did a very full report from the Under-Secretary for Justice. He understood the Colonial Secretary to absolve the Committee from any charge of haste or unfairness. He wished to state on behalf of the Committee that the last thing the Committee intended was to impute any fault to the Government. Their desire was rather to enable the Government to completely exculpate themselves. At present the Government seemed to him to have committed an act which might admit of being interpreted harshly, and such a tribunal as was proposed by the Committee ought to be in a position to absolve the Government from any such charge. He hoped the Colonial Secretary would promise that further evidence should be obtainable by the Committee, and that they should not have to sit again and again awaiting information which they were not able to acquire.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS would like to know whether the Council would be afforded an opportunity of seeing the evidence, as well as the report that was brought up by the Committee, as it did not appear to be on the table at present. With regard to those members of the Committee who had expressed dissatisfaction at the whole of the evidence procurable not being taken, there was no evidence or copy of the proceedings attached to the report, as was usual in the case of Committees on Bills. It occurred to him that if they were placed in possession of the proceedings in manuscript they might be able to form an opinion on the report of the Committee when it came down.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said the matter had not been hastily considered. It had been before the Committee a number of weeks, and, if the Government had not placed such evidence before the Committee as they should have done, it seemed to him that they had themselves entirely to blame.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY thought the explanation he had given, that the Minister in charge of the department was ill in bed, would have prevented the honourable gentleman from casting any further reflection on the Government.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said there seemed to be some misunderstanding. There was nothing whatever to prevent the evidence available being given by the Under-Secretary. In no case had there been any reflection on the Hon. Mr. Cadman, because, so far as he could understand the case, the whole thing had been conducted by correspondence. As far as he could see, the Committee had the whole of the correspondence before them. The chief difference seemed to be as to whether the matter should be referred for investigation to the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court, or to a tribunal selected by the Government itself. They thought it was better, on the whole, that the judicial head of the Native Department should decide a question of this kind, and he thought so still. But it seemed to him, in order that there should be no suggestion of the Committee having come hastily to a conclusion, if there was any further evidence to be obtained, it was desirable that it should be so obtained.

Motion, That the report be referred back to the Public Petitions Committee for the purpose of obtaining further evidence, agreed to.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be now read the third time,

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN moved, That the Bill be recommitted.

The Council divided on the question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

AYES, 8.

Buckley	Kelly	McCullough
Feldwick	Kenny	Montgomery.
Jenkinson	Kerr

NOES, 23.

Acland	McLean	Stewart
Barnicoat	Morris	Swanson
Bolt	Oliver	Taiaroa
Bowen	Peacock	Walker, L.
Dignan	Pharazyn	Whitmore
Grace	Reynolds	Whyte
Holmes	Richardson	Williams.
MacGregor	Stevens

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Jennings.	Shrimski.

Majority against, 15.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill recommitted.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 8.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN moved to add the following proviso:—

"Provided that such selection may be composed of first-class, second-class, and third-class land; and that the area selected shall be so determined that the acreage of each class shall not exceed proportionately the prescribed maximum."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the proviso be added to the clause."

AYES, 22.

Acland	MacGregor	Stevens
Barnicoat	McLean	Stewart
Bolt	Oliver	Swanson
Bonar	Peacock	Taiaroa
Bowen	Pharazyn	Whitmore
Dignan	Reynolds	Whyte
Holmes	Richardson	Williams.
Kelly

NOES, 8.

Buckley	Jennings	Montgomery
Feldwick	Kenny	Rigg.
Jenkinson	Kerr

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Ormond.	McCullough.

Majority for, 14.

Proviso added.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN moved, That the following new clause be added after clause 6:—

"No land shall be taken compulsorily until a description thereof has been forwarded to the Council of the county in which such land is situated, or, in any county in which 'The Counties Act, 1886,' is suspended, to the Road Boards within the said county, and the said county or the majority of the said Road Boards have reported to the Governor on the suitability of the land proposed to be taken. It shall be the duty of such County Council or Road Boards (as the case may be) to report their opinion within fourteen days after receipt of such description."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 15.

Acland	McLean	Stevens
Barnicoat	Oliver	Swanson
Bowen	Peacock	Walker, L.
Dignan	Reynolds	Whyte
Holmes	Richardson	Williams.

NOES, 15.

Bolt	Kelly	Pharazyn
Buckley	Kenny	Rigg
Feldwick	Kerr	Stewart
Jenkinson	MacGregor	Taiaroa
Jennings	Montgomery	Whitmore.

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Ormond.	McCullough.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN gave his casting-vote with the "Noes."

New clause negatived.

Bill reported, with further amendment.

The Council adjourned at five minutes to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, 1st October, 1894.

First Readings—Factories Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Mining Bill, Native Land (Validation of Titles) Bill.

FACTORIES BILL.

On the consideration of the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill,

Mr. REEVES said, though he should not ask the House to agree with all the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill, yet at the same time it was his pleasant duty to express his sense of the reasonable, fair, and businesslike spirit in which, on the whole, this Bill appeared to have been treated in another place. On more than one occasion he had had to protest—sometimes rather vigorously—against the manner in which labour Bills, so-called, had been treated by the Council; and so he thought it was only proper on this occasion to say exactly the opposite, because it was right that the spirit in which the Council had treated this Bill should be fairly recognised. A number of amendments had been made, but with many of them he should not ask the House to disagree. In some cases these amendments were positive improvements, and appeared to have been inserted with a genuine intention of making the Bill better. In one or two other cases the amendments made were really of the most trifling character. In certain other cases he did not consider that the amendments were improvements, but, as some of them were of no importance, he should not ask the House to disagree with them. Certain of the amendments, however, were distinctly blots, he thought, on the Bill, of sufficient importance to warrant his asking the House to disagree with them, and asking the House to appoint a Committee to draw up reasons for disagreement. He would not, unless the House wished, dwell upon those amendments with which he should not ask the House to disagree, but would briefly explain the amendments with which he wished the House to disagree. First of all, there was an amendment in the first line of the new subsection put into clause 20. That was a very good subsection, or was intended to be: that was to say, it insisted that a record should be kept in every factory of the sums earned by the workers there, for the purpose of submission to the Inspector, who should, of course, use it in the preparation of his annual report, subject to the provisions and conditions which regulated the using of all information given by factories. However, in wording it—probably inadvertently—the word “wages” had been used instead of “earnings”—that was to say, a record was to be kept of the wages paid. It ought to have been of the “earnings” paid or received, because, of course, wages paid would exclude, he believed, under a decision, the earnings of piece-workers; and it was most desirable, if a record was to be kept at all, that a record should be kept of the earnings of piece-workers. Then, again, for a reason, or without one—for the action was inscrutable—the Council had struck out the last paragraph of clause 54. That was a paragraph inserted to prevent women from working in factories at certain times when to do so would be most injurious to their health. That clause, he might say, had been inserted in the English Factories Act; and why the Legislative Council of New Zealand should object to the insertion of such a proviso as that, of so humane and needful a character,—a proviso which the English Parliament had not objected to,—he confessed was a mystery to him; but probably, on conference, the Council would see fit to reconsider that decision. Then, there was an amendment in clause 56, to which, as it stood, he strongly objected, although he did not think the Council had put it in with any sinister motive. Clause 56 stated that no child should work in a factory, and the Council had added the words “save with the consent of the Inspector.” Now, at first sight, that appeared to be an extremely proper addition; but they must remember that “factory” now, under this new Act, would consist of every place in which two persons worked. One of these persons might be the employer, so that the employer and one employé would make a factory. Now, it was obvious that many factories would be of a domestic character—that they would be part of the house in which the families lived. It was suggested that children belonging to a family factory might well be allowed, for example, to sweep out in the morning the room of which the so-called factory would consist, and unless a permit was allowed to be given by the Inspector, even that could not be done. However, as the reason for putting that in was that it should apply to those very small factories, he thought it should be clearly stated that it could only be allowed to apply to these small domestic factories, and that on no consideration should children under fourteen be allowed to work in the larger factories. He imagined the Council would make no objection to that. Then, in section (c) of subsection (3) of clause 63, by an obvious error in the wording, the Council had enacted that fish-curing factories should be exempted from the operation of the half-holiday clause during the fruit-preserving season. Then, there was a new proviso inserted in subsection (2), clause 63: the half-holiday clause. Now, reasonable as that proviso appeared to him, he wished to ask the House to disagree with it, for certain reasons. It was a proviso that, where a shopkeeper was also a factory-owner, and the shop and factory were attached to each other, he should be allowed to close the factory on the day on which his shop was compulsorily closed by any Act compulsorily closing shops. The meaning was that, if the closing-day for the shop was Thursday, and the closing day for the factory was Saturday, the shop- and factory-keeper should be allowed to close both shop and factory on Thursday. That was exactly the reverse of what he thought should be done. He thought that the shopkeeper should be allowed to close his shop on the factory-day, but not to close his factory on the shop-day. It was obvious that the factory-day usually in the larger places was Saturday, and was likely to remain Saturday. He wished to do nothing which would deprive any of the factory-hands of the Saturday half-holiday, and to force them to close on the shops day—which might be Wednesday or Thursday—would do that. He thought the Council would probably offer no objection to reversing the action of the amendment, and he asked the House to disagree with it. The Council had struck out clause 64 entirely: that was the clause which gave the half-holiday to adult workers. He did not know that there was so much hope of the Council giving way on that point, but, as a matter of principle, he would ask the House to disagree with that. If they could not get their way on that, possibly it would require an Eight Hours Bill, which he trusted would pass into law next session, and would regulate the hours of adult labourers. Although he asked the House to disagree with these amendments, he thought it only right to express his sense of the reasonable way in which this Bill had been treated, and to express the conviction that, if the House was met in the same reasonable spirit with regard to these amendments, this Bill, which he trusted would go on the statute-book shortly, would not only be the best Factory Act in the Empire, but, he honestly believed, the best Factory Act on any statute-book in the world. He moved, That this House agrees with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Factories Bill, with the exception of the following: Those in the first line of new subsection (20); in the last paragraph of clause 54; in clause 56; in the new proviso inserted in subsection (2), section 63; and subsection (c) of section 3 of clause 63, with which it disagrees: and that this House also disagrees with the Council's action in striking out clause 64: and that Sir R. Stout, Mr. J. W. Kelly, and the mover be appointed a Committee to draw up reasons for so disagreeing.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be recommended for the further consideration of certain clauses,

Mr. W. KELLY moved, That clause 25 be recommitted.

The House divided.

AYES, 23.

Allen	Kelly, J. W.	Saunders
Bell	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Buchanan	Mackenzie, T.	Stout
Button	Massey	Tanner
Earnshaw	McNab	Te Ao
Fraser	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Graham	Newman	Guinness
Heke	Parata	Kelly, W.

NOES, 30.

Buddo	Flatman	Lawry
Carncross	Hall-Jones	Mackintosh
Carnell	Hogg	McGowan
Carroll	Houston	McKenzie, J.
Collins	Joyce	McKenzie, R.
Duncan	Larnach	Meredith

Mr. Reeves

Mills	Reeves	Ward.
Morrison	Seddon	Tellers.
O'Regan	Stevens	Harris
Pinkerton	Thompson	Montgomery.
Pirani

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	McLachlan
Russell, W. R.	Russell, G. W.

Majority against, 7.

Motion negatived.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE moved, That the preamble and clause 11 be recommitted.

The House divided.

AYES, 13.

Buchanan	Lang	Thompson.
Button	Massey
Crowther	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Fraser	Parata	Allen
Heke	Te Ao	Mackenzie, T.

NOES, 40.

Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Pirani
Carnell	Larnach	Reeves
Carroll	Lawry	Saunders
Collins	Mackintosh	Seddon
Duncan	McGowan	Smith, G. J.
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Flatman	McNab	Steward
Guinness	Meredith	Tanner
Hall-Jones	Mills	Ward.
Harris	Montgomery
Hogg	Morrison	Tellers.
Houston	Newman	Graham
Joyce	O'Regan	McKenzie, R.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	McLachlan
Russell, W. R.	Russell, G. W.

Majority against, 27.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved the recommitment of clause 64, for the purpose of striking out certain words, with a view of inserting the following words: "who shall at the end of each financial year apply the whole of the moneys received on account of the principal moneys as aforesaid during the preceding financial year in redeeming land-bonds by means of annual drawing."

The House divided.

AYES, 23.

Allen	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Bell	Mackenzie, T.	Stout
Buchanan	Massey	Tanner
Button	Mitchelson	Te Ao
Fraser	O'Regan	Thompson.
Graham	Parata	Tellers.
Heke	Pirani	Montgomery
Kelly, J. W.	Saunders	Newman.

NOES, 31.

Buddo	Carnell	Crowther
Carncross	Carroll	Duncan

Earnshaw	Mackintosh	Reeves
Flatman	McGowan	Seddon
Hall-Jones	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Harris	McKenzie, R.	Steward
Hutchison, W.	McNab	Ward.
Joyce	Meredith
Kelly, W.	Mills	Tellers.
Larnach	Morrison	Collins
Lawry	Pinkerton	Hogg.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	McLachlan
Russell, W. R.	Russell, G. W.

Majority against, 8.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MASSEY moved, That the Bill be recommitted with the view of inserting the following new clause: "Where any person or company lends money at five per centum interest or less no mortgage-tax shall be charged."

The House divided.

AYES, 12.

Allen	Lang	Thompson.
Button	Mackenzie, T.	Tellers.
Earnshaw	Mitchelson	Bell
Fraser	Stout	Massey.
Heke

NOES, 40.

Buddo	Joyce	Pinkerton
Carnell	Kelly, J. W.	Pirani
Carroll	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Collins	Larnach	Saunders
Crowther	Mackintosh	Seddon
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Stevens
Graham	McNab	Steward
Guinness	Meredith	Tanner
Hall-Jones	Mills	Ward.
Harris	Montgomery
Hogg	Morrison	Tellers.
Houston	O'Regan	Carncross
Hutchison, W.	Parata	McGowan.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	McLachlan
Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Russell, W. R.	Russell, G. W.
Te Ao.	Pere.

Majority against, 28.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. EARNSHAW moved, That the Bill be recommitted in order to consider the following new clause:—

"Out of the interest received from mortgages under this Act, a sum sufficient to pay the tax on all mortgages under this Act, as if the mortgage had been to a private company, shall be paid to the Land-tax Commissioner."

The House divided.

AYES, 17.

Allen	Buddo	Heke
Bell	Button	Lang
Buchanan	Fraser	Mackenzie, T.

Massey	Newman	Tellers.
Mitchelson	Stout	Earnshaw
Montgomery	Thompson.	Smith, G. J.

NOES, 38.

Carncross	Joyce	Parata
Carnell	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Carroll	Kelly, W.	Pirani
Collins	Larnach	Reeves
Crowther	Lawry	Saunders
Duncan	Mackintosh	Seddon
Flatman	McGowan	Stevens
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Guinness	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Hall-Jones	McNab	Ward.
Harris	Mills	Tellers.
Hogg	Morrison	Maslin
Houston	O'Regan	Meredith.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	McLachlan
Russell, W. R.	Russell, G. W.
Te Ao.	Pere.

Majority against, 21.

Amendment negatived.

Motion agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 42.—How advances to be made. Sub-section (3): Amount of advance.

Major STEWARD moved to strike out the words "fifty pounds or," and to insert instead the words "twenty-five pounds nor."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 43.—Conditions subject to which advances will be made.

The following subclause, (b), was struck out: "The lessee is entitled under his lease to compensation for all improvements made by him on the land comprised therein."

Clause 46.—Mortgage docket to be executed subject to provisions of Act.

Mr. WARD moved to add the following new subclause, to follow subclause (4): "The Governor in Council may from time to time by regulations alter any of the aforesaid covenants and conditions or prescribe additional covenants and conditions; but such regulations shall not affect any mortgage existing at the time when they are made."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 58.—"The Superintendent shall, within sixty days after the close of each financial year as aforesaid, prepare a balance-sheet."

Mr. WARD moved to add, after "prepare," the words "and lay before Parliament, if not sitting, within fourteen days after the commencement of the next session."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 74.—"The Bankruptcy Act, 1892," shall not apply to this Act."

Mr. BELL moved to add, after "to," the words "debts payable under."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to insert at the end of the clause, "except in cases where the Colonial Treasurer shall certify, in writing, his consent to the discharge of a bankrupt from debts payable under this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved the addition of the following new clause:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this or any other Act, the following provisions shall apply to every mortgage of leasehold land under this Act:—

- "(1.) The term of the mortgage (in no case exceeding the aforesaid term of thirty-six and one-half years) shall expire on the due date of the prescribed half-yearly instalment next preceding the date of the expiration of the lease, and such instalment shall include the balance of principal then owing under the mortgage.
- "(2.) Subject to the aforesaid modification, principal and interest shall be payable by the prescribed half-yearly instalments.
- "(3.) It shall not be lawful for the mortgagor to surrender his lease or to exercise any right of purchase of the land comprised therein without the consent in writing of the Superintendent.
- "(4.) So long as any moneys remain owing under the mortgage the Superintendent shall have the sole right to receive all sums payable to the mortgagor in respect of compensation or valuation for improvements or otherwise however under the lease, and may at the expense of the mortgagor do all things necessary in order to obtain the same.
- "(5.) All such sums when received by the Superintendent shall be treated as moneys arising from the lawful exercise of the power of sale."

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments, and amendments agreed to.

On the question, That the Bill be read a third time,

Sir R. STOUT said,—I do not think that the third reading of this Bill should go through the House without my putting on record my objections to the measure. I do not say I expected that when the Bill went into Committee the Committee would be allowed a free hand in making amendments, but I expected that, at all events, amendments not affecting the principle of the Bill would be considered by the Treasurer, who is in charge of the Bill. But a new doctrine has been laid down, and it is this: that if any person is opposed to the principle of the Bill he is not allowed to suggest any amendment, because it is thought to be fatal to the Bill itself. If that principle is to be carried out in future legislation in this House it makes Committee consideration of a Bill a perfect farce. I wish to point out what I consider defects in this Bill, assuming that the House is willing to affirm the principle that the State is to become a money-lending institution. We have been told that this Bill is not a Bill of class legislation. It is a Bill of class legislation. First, I point out that it does not give to all persons in the State equal chances of becoming borrowers of money. It limits the right of borrowing to those who have freehold land, or who are tenants of the Crown under certain conditions. It does not give to people who have leasehold land the right to borrow except they be Crown tenants, and it prevents people who have leases—most valuable leases—from getting any advantage under this Bill; such, for example, as tenants of Municipalities, tenants of Harbour Boards, tenants of Education Boards, and those who are tenants—as pointed out by the honourable member for the Grey—under the Native Land Act, dealing with leases on the west coast of the Middle Island. It is therefore in one respect a Bill giving privileges to certain classes of the community, and depriving others of like privileges. I submit that if there is to be a Bill passing providing for lending money it ought not to be confined to the classes that are mentioned in this Bill. All those who have leaseholds that are valuable should have had the same right to borrow from the State up to the half value of their leaseholds as other lessees under this Bill. Then, I need not point out, for that has been done before, that the Bill only gives aid to certain classes. Manufacturers and others who may require assistance for carrying on their work are debarred under this Bill, except they be landowners, from getting any benefit whatever. And it is well known that in the towns where manufactures exist very few manufacturers hold freehold land; consequently they can get no loan on their leaseholds, because they have leaseholds of either church property, municipal, educational, or Harbour Board property. Consequently, manufacturers are not only prevented from borrowing on the security of their machinery, but on the security of the leasehold interest which they may have. Then, I would point out that the original limit has been maintained in the Bill, notwithstanding that many members on the second reading said they were in favour of the limit being reduced. They have been convinced apparently privately, not by arguments in the House, but convinced by some meeting or other, or by private arrangement, and they have consequently voted contrary to the opinions they expressed when they spoke on the second reading of the Bill. It might be very useful for the House to look at the only report I believe that was ever brought up in this House dealing with this subject. That was in the year 1885. If honourable members will refer to the Journals of the House of Representatives of 1885, on the 3rd September, they will see set out at length a report on "Advances to Settlers." That report was brought up by the late Mr. Macandrew, and in that report the limit was fixed at £2,000. Not only was the limit fixed at £2,000, but the amount of the advance was not to exceed one-half the value. There were other provisions in the report which it is not necessary that I should refer to further than to mention that the interest to be paid by the settlers was only $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I simply refer to that report as showing that the matter was carefully considered by a special Committee of the House. They did not think proper to give any aid to settlers beyond £2,000, or to advance money beyond half the value of the freehold. There is one thing in regard to which I would congratulate the House, and that is that, instead of having an indefinite amount, as it originally appeared in this Bill, of a million and a half a year, with no limited term, but to go on apparently for ever, the House has—and the Treasurer has consented to it—limited the amount to two years—that is, to three millions. That, no doubt, will be an advantage. I may now state what has happened in reference to the bonds and debentures under the Bill. That is certainly the most peculiar provision in the Bill. We have authorised the Treasurer to borrow in London at 4 per cent. interest. It is true he is not bound to issue bonds at 4 per cent., but he has the power to issue bonds at 4 per cent. in London, whilst we give him power to issue land-bonds here limiting him to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., so that he has no discretion to give 4 per cent., say, in Wellington, for land-bonds, but he may give 4 per cent. in London on moneys borrowed for exactly the same purpose. That is, I think, one of the most peculiar clauses in the Bill. Why he should be permitted to give 4 per cent. to the London money-lender and only $3\frac{1}{2}$ to the New Zealand money-lender I cannot understand, and during all the debates in Committee no explanation was afforded of that peculiar provision. I am now still dealing with some of the clauses of the Bill before saying a few words about the principle. I will now refer to the clause about the Bankruptcy Act. I think it is a great pity that this clause 74 should have been kept in the Bill. What does it mean? It means that the Crown can override every other creditor. I will suppose that a farmer has borrowed, say, £1,000 under this Bill, and that a great calamity happens to him. For example, he may be one of those small farmers who were injured in the Hawke's Bay District by the recent floods; or he may be a farmer in the Taieri district, where the Taieri River might overflow. The river may overflow and seriously injure him, so that it may reduce his property to, say, half its value. He cannot make his interest out of his land. He has borrowed, say, up to two-thirds of the value—that is, £1,500 on the land. He has got about £1,000 on it, but the flood has come and reduced his land in value. He may have lost his stock too; and he may have other creditors. But he may have some stock and other things; but what would happen under this Bill? We will suppose that he owes other creditors £500, and he has property worth £500 outside the farm, we will say, in stock and agricultural machinery. Under this Bill, what may happen? Those creditors who have given him the £500 may be his grocer and his merchant, or those who have advanced money to purchase, say, grass-seed and various other things in regard to which agriculturists get aid.

Mr. Ward

What will happen under this Bill? The Crown can step in and seize the whole of this five hundred pounds' worth of property, and the other creditors may be left lamenting, and will not get a single shilling. It is not as if the Crown could come in and claim the dividend along with the other creditors. Under this Bill the Crown can step in and seize the whole £500, and the other creditors must go without a shilling. I ask, is that fair? Is it fair, if the Crown is entering upon a business like this, that it should have advantages which no other dealer has? If the man borrowed money from a loan company, or from any ordinary mortgagee, this loan company or mortgagee would have no advantage over the other creditors. They would have the security of the land, but outside of that they could not take a single shilling. They would simply get the same dividend out of the man's estate, if he became bankrupt, as the man's other creditors who had lent him money or who had given him goods. But under this Bill the Superintendent, or the Crown, practically,—this new lending institution,—is to have an advantage that no loan company nor any other person has. I think this is entirely unfair. This is giving the Crown an enormous advantage, and I say the effect of it will be very damaging to a borrower's credit, because if a merchant knows that a man is mortgaged to the Crown he will know that the Crown has a prior right, and that if the man becomes bankrupt he perhaps will not get a single shilling—the Crown will step in and take the whole of it; and therefore this man's credit will be lessened, and though he may get his money at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or even 1 per cent. less interest, it will entirely deprive him of credit so long as you keep section 74 in the Bill—that is, so long as you say that the Crown is to have prior rights, and is not to be bound by the Bankruptcy Act. The Crown in 1892 abandoned all its rights; it said that it was to stand just the same as any other creditor if a man became bankrupt; but under this Bill that law is entirely altered, and the result is, that the Crown will have prior rights, and this man will either be deprived of his credit, or, if other creditors trust him, they will certainly be injured. That is most unfair. I submit that, if the State is to become a money-lender, it should take up the same position as any other mortgagee or loan company. It should have no greater advantages than other lending institutions, and ought to be subject to the same liabilities. That would be fair competition. But the present Bill means unfair competition, and I cannot see how it can be defended. And that brings me to the second point, and that is as to the mortgage-tax. I understood the Treasurer to say, in Committee, in regard to the difference between $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and 5 per cent., that he was willing that the Crown should pay the mortgage-tax. But we learned this evening that he was not willing that the Crown should pay the mortgage-tax. The result is that if three millions are raised under this Bill—and it should keep at three millions—supposing only three millions are borrowed, every year so long as these mortgages exist we shall lose £12,500 of mortgage-tax, which, if this money were lent by a private company, the private company would have to pay. The Treasurer may say that the three millions might be lent by a number of companies, and that each of these companies would have certain exemptions. But that would not be so, because exemptions are only allowed in the case of small mortgages. Therefore the result will be to place this department in an unfair position as compared with loan companies. You are practically foregoing a tax of £12,500 a year, and, if you borrow a million and a half every year after, you are giving up an additional £6,250 every year hereafter upon every million and a half borrowed. What will be the result of that? You are having what is entirely a class-tax. You are allowing—for this is really what it amounts to—you are allowing every mortgagor who borrows from the Crown to get off paying $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; he pays 5 per cent., while those who are not fortunate enough to borrow from the Crown are bound to pay $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I submit this is entirely a piece

10.30. of class legislation. Leaving what I may term the details of the Bill, I now wish to point out what this Bill really means. I submit that it means the beginning of a borrowing policy, of which we do not see the end. Now, we—compared with all the countries in Europe, almost—have overborrowed; we are heavily in debt. The honourable gentleman said, I think, on the second reading of this Bill, that if we took the amount of money that had been spent on railways, and added that to the national debt of England, it would have been seen that we compared favourably with England. He is entirely wrong. The total amount spent in the making of railways in England—which would include rolling-stock also—I think, is £865,000,000. That is according to Mulhall. I am willing, however, to give him a thousand millions. If that is added to the present national debt of England, even if we take our population as a basis, we only ought to have borrowed £27,000,000, instead of £39,000,000; and so we at present stand as compared with England very badly—

Mr. WARD.—Have you worked it out?

Sir R. STOUT.—Yes, I have worked it out; and that is what we should have borrowed, taking it at that amount. And if England had borrowed at the rate that we have borrowed she would have a debt—plus the railway debt—of £2,248,000,000; whereas if you add the two together—that is, include the railway debt—her debt is something like £1,600,000,000. That is, even compared with England we do not stand well. We have overborrowed compared with England; and it should be remembered, so far as England is concerned, she has been, so far as she can, reducing her debt. She has reduced the debt since the Indian Mutiny no less than £130,000,000; and so it is with other countries. The United States have, since the war, reduced their debt something like £250,000,000; and we are starting a new borrowing proposal. It is all very well for the honourable gentleman to say that we shall get by the borrowing proposals sufficient out of our mortgagors. If we are only to get it out of our mortgagors by paying $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the mortgage-tax it is affecting our revenue in another direction, because, as the mortgages increase, our mortgage debt will run off, and we shall have to raise some new form of taxation. But I say that no State ought to borrow money simply because it can invest this borrowed money in getting interest. If you increase the debt, financially it remains a debt to the colony. Look at the total debt. Let any person narrowly scrutinise your income and expenditure, and by this proposal I submit you are affecting the credit of the colony. Now, then, Sir, there are two or three questions which may be asked, and I wish to meet them in a practical way. It may be said, "How are you to help our settlers?" Now, I wish to answer that. I will deal first with those who are your freeholders, and I say, so far as helping them is concerned, that you ought to have utilised your Public Trust Office funds and your Insurance funds, and that would have given you, with prudent management, about half a million a year. If you do not take up Treasury bills you might have, say, from the Post-Office Savings-Bank a quarter of a million a year to lend to settlers, and that will make three quarters of a million for the lending departments to help those who require it. That would have been a prudent thing to do. Then you could have reduced the interest, I believe, to 5 per cent., because, so far as your Public Trust Office is concerned, you only require to pay 5 per cent. up to, I think, £3,000 and 4 per cent. beyond; and, so far as your Government Insurance is concerned, 5 per cent. would have paid them, because their premiums are based on a 4-per-cent. table. But, instead of that, you have invested too much of your Insurance money at less than that—4 per cent., and some of it at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Because, if that is lent at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. it is entirely bad finance. You are injuring your Government Insurance by making the rate less than what should be the actual rate. So far you are injuring your Public Trust Office also, by making them come out with a deficit. If you are not investing too much in the Treasury bills you should have adopted a practical scheme to help your settlers—at all events, all the freehold settlers—because half a million a year would be sufficient to aid them. You could have adopted such a plan. It might have been asked, "What about your settlers who are just going or have recently gone on to the Crown lands?" They would, no doubt, require assistance. This Bill has given them no assistance of any value, because, so far as the value of the interest of their leases is concerned, during the early years, in which they require assistance from the Crown or from companies, they can get nothing under this Bill. The value of their leases will mean nothing to them. No wonder an honourable member wished to reduce it to £25. Some of them will not be able to get £10 under this Bill. It will be no aid to the bush settlers who have been only in the bush six or twelve months. When they ask for some aid to enable them to add to their improvements you should have aided them in another way, and I think it would have been a popular way to aid them. You might have said that for the first three or four years, or even five years, that they were in the bush districts you would not charge them any rent at all. By this scheme you are giving no aid to them whatever. And I would point out, as I have shown, so far as giving aid to settlers is concerned, you can aid them without need of this Bill at all. But I do not think the ideal state of the agriculturist is to be a borrower. I think it has been an immense injury in any country where it has been tried, and honourable members will remember that I said in Committee that I thought the true ideal of the agricultural settler was to be a man who was not mortgaged at all, and who was not in debt. I will not, Sir, take up the time of the House by quoting an authority that I have found since; he bears out the statement I made in Committee. I refer honourable members to a book on 'political economy, by Professor Gide, Professor of the Montpellier University in France. He is talking of borrowing under this very system—the Crédit Foncier—that immense syndicate which is lending in France up to one hundred and twenty millions of money. The lending of this money has not been of advantage to the French settler. It has not been of advantage to the French agriculturist. It is not bias, it is not political colour, with Professor Gide. He is writing as a political economist—as a scientific expert dealing with this question—and he points out that the true way to help the settler was to have had the homestead law as it is in the United States. They should not have been allowed to borrow at all on their lands, and they would then have had secured to them their homes, so that their homes could not be taken for debt. Their homes should not be mortgaged or parted with; and if that system had been in existence in France it would have been far better than the mortgage system. He goes on to show what the facility that is given for borrowing by this Crédit Foncier system in France has done. He says of the borrower,—

Sir R. Stout

"It might bring him luck once, but might ruin him ten times over. Following an inverse tendency, we should be inclined rather to demand the adoption of certain measures, such as the homestead laws in the United States, which, by preventing the landowner from borrowing, insure to him and his family the safe possession of his land."

That will be found on page 306 of his book on political economy. And so it goes on to show that, instead of this borrowing facility which has been given in France, in Switzerland, and in Germany, helping the small agriculturists, it has been really their ruin or injury. And yet, with all this staring us in the face, we are now to adopt this system for the first time. We are to load our colony with debt, we are to injure our credit; and for what? Who are to be aided? The people to be aided are the people who are to go up even to £5,000 in amount; and the Treasurer says this is necessary, because if he cannot advance up to the limit proposed—unless he gets mortgages above £2,000—the system will not be a payable system. I ask this House at the last moment, is it fair to adopt this system at all when it has never been considered in the country? When members who have come here pledged to no borrowing have got to go back and reconcile this measure with their pledges to their constituents, when their constituents have never thought out what the indirect effects of such a system might be, I think it necessary, in the short time at my disposal, to point out what this Bill will do. I believe it is mischievous and not necessary, and I believe that all the aid the settlers require could be got from our existing Government Insurance and other departments. I do not think it was necessary to go to the London market for a single penny for the purpose when we could have carried it on without doing that in other ways. And I feel that, so far as our settlers are concerned, if they are encouraged to go into schemes of borrowing, it will happen just as this professor says—it may bring them luck once, but it will bring ruin to them inevitably, and I think it will tend to ruin the colony as a whole. That is why even at the last moment I have entered my protest against this Bill, and I shall certainly vote against it.

Dr. NEWMAN.—Sir, before this Bill goes through its final stages I want to say a few words upon it, as it is a measure of a momentous character. However, I shall not detain the House many minutes. I think the condition of the farmers of the colony is such that, within the limits of moderation, a measure of this kind could have been made a very desirable one, and I should have had much pleasure in supporting such a measure; but I think the Minister has lost a very considerable chance indeed. He had a chance of bringing in a Bill which would have met with the approval of this House and the country had he framed it with more care and been more cautious in the nature of his proposals. Had he proposed to raise a sum of £500,000, and had he proposed to lend that money simply and solely to the farmers for the purpose of increasing the wealth of the country, it would have gone exceedingly well, and if he had limited loans to £1,000 or £2,000, instead of £5,000, he could have had this Bill through a week ago with one-quarter of the opposition that has been raised to it. Had he done what I have pointed out he would have brought in a Bill which would have gained the approval of the country, instead of the hostility of a very considerable portion of it. The speech which the honourable gentleman made in moving the second reading of this Bill is in very striking contrast to the speech which he made to this House at the close of last year, and it is in such striking contrast to the condition of affairs now that I shall read an extract or two from his speech. He said,—

"It is very gratifying to know that during the past financial year our progress has been of the most satisfactory nature. In every direction this is apparent. I have no hesitation in saying that never in the history of the colony were its prospects brighter. Land-settlement has progressed vigorously. Our pastoral and agricultural interests have assumed large dimensions."

Sir, can it be said for a moment that the farmers are to-day in a happy condition? I say No. Then, let us see how he winds up in a glorious peroration, and let us contrast the position stated by him a few months ago and the condition which he pictured in bringing this Bill forward at the present time. He said,—

"Trade and commerce are active and increasing. The bulk of our exports is larger than ever. Our runs have greatly developed. . . . The avenues for employment are large and expanding. . . . It requires only the active cooperation of all classes to steadily advance this colony to an exalted position amongst the countries under the sway of the British Crown."

If he had put in the words "an auxiliary kingdom of the British Crown" he would have made that sentence perfect. What was the condition of affairs with regard to our population at that time? Our population was then increasing; but to-day our population is going away at the rate of about a thousand a month. As regards this Bill, I believe that various amendments could be introduced; and before it finally passes this House, after it comes back from another Chamber, I hope he will introduce several modifications, and make it more workable. I think there should be clauses introduced into it to limit the application of this money. I do not think large buildings, such as hotels, grandstands, et cetera, are properties upon which moneys should be advanced. Various other safeguards should also be introduced to enable the scheme to be conducted with something like safety. Then, I would point out the danger there is of lending money on properties situated in bush townships. I refer to what I might call mushroom townships in the country, in which property, we know, goes up for a time, and then comes down with a run equally often. There is, I say, considerable danger in lending money to these bush townships. For a period they have a glowing time of it, but after a very short time the whole thing collapses; and any man or any State that lends money to these country townships will find that in a large number of cases that money is practically lost. Therefore, I say, it is necessary the Lending Board should be guided by regulations under which money may be advanced in this direction. The success or failure of this scheme depends wholly and solely on the Lending Board. If the Lending Board proceeds with care and caution, if it looks into all securities narrowly, and refuses to be led away in times of a boom, then the danger will not be so great as it might be. We know that in times of a boom it is very dangerous to lend money, because at those periods property goes to what may be termed a fictitious value. I am aware that in some countries of the world this scheme has done a great deal of good to the farming community; the Crédit Foncier in France has done good by reducing the rates of interest from 12 and 13 per cent. down to 5 per cent. The scheme has also done good in parts of Germany, where it has also been a great success. But the honourable gentleman cannot get away from the fact that there are many cases in which exactly the opposite has been the result; and we should profit by the mistakes of other people, and avoid following in the footsteps which have led to disaster elsewhere. Let honourable members take the Argentine Republic as an example. In that Republic the scheme, instead of developing into one for the assistance of farmers, has been turned into a mighty engine of disaster to the community. Though it was safeguarded to the extent that not more than one-half the value should be advanced on property, yet the large amount of paper money which was put into circulation lent a fictitious value to the land. The consequence was that money was lent on a paper valuation, and when the bubble burst these lands went down in value until they became almost unsaleable, and since then the Argentine has been in a miserable state of financial embarrassment and stagnation. The same thing, it is true, has been introduced in Victoria; but if this system had been introduced there a few years ago, when the price of land was run up to a fictitious value, one can easily see how great the disaster would have been. Let me point out to the honourable gentleman what occurred in France in connection with the Crédit Foncier. A gentleman named Wolowski, who occupied, I suppose, a position analogous to that which will be occupied by the Superintendent under this measure, had the guidance of that scheme at its initiation. M. Wolowski was exceedingly careful and cautious in his management of the scheme, and the result was that nearly all the loans were a success, and most of them were paid off; but a demand came from the outside, and very strong pressure was brought to bear against the manner in which he conducted the institution. They said that under his administration it was altogether too conservative finance, and he was deposed from that position. Two others were put in his place: they were to conduct a more advanced and radical finance. They did so, and the result was that the Crédit Foncier under these two men went ahead at such a pace, and lent money so recklessly, that the institution got into very great difficulties, and was almost bankrupt. Then other and more cautious men were put in their place, and the institution was restored to a condition of prosperity and soundness. That is the risk we run here through the introduction of such a scheme as this. If the Lending Board—and the honourable gentleman will be a member of it—adopts a policy of proper caution and carefulness as to how it lends its money, then this Bill can be made one of very great value indeed; but I should like to ask the Colonial Treasurer a question upon one or two matters. Upon the second reading, or somewhere in Committee, the Colonial Treasurer said this Bill would not increase our national debt. That seemed to me an extraordinary position to assume. The honourable gentleman is going to have three kinds of stock. He is going to have debentures; he is also going to have inscribed stock; and he is going to have land-bonds that can at any moment be converted. We have twenty-nine millions in what is called inscribed stock, which becomes due in 1929. If he raises the money by inscribed stock, that inscribed stock will become a part of the other inscribed stock, and will become part of the national debt of this colony. If he issues a large number of land-bonds in this colony I cannot quite see how he will be able to get them taken up; and, if he raises a million in London by means of inscribed stock, how can he prevent people at the other end from declaring that this is part of the national debt? I think he has no escape from the position that it will increase the national debt of the colony. I can quite understand that the two millions guaranteed to the bank will not be added to our debt; but unquestionably, when the money borrowed under this Bill is inscribed, it will be part of the national debt, and I think he should, if possible, try to avert that. I think that in floating these land-bonds at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. he is making a great mistake. I think he will be unable practically to float any of these land-bonds in this colony. Had he taken a higher rate of interest he might get rid of them. In other countries where the scheme has been introduced they floated their bonds at a higher rate of interest, something like a par value, and these bonds were parted with from hand to hand, and the money was profitably employed. The honourable gentleman has given us no idea as to how many of these land-bonds he is going to put on the market. Though we have at various times asked him for information upon that subject, the honourable gentleman has vouchsafed us none, and we are still in the dark concerning it. I think this Bill will require modification in various ways. In my opinion, the rate of interest has been fixed too low to pay working-expenses. Of course, if he gets money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., with $1\frac{1}{2}$ margin to play on, he may be able to pay his way; but if he has to borrow at 4 or 4 $\frac{1}{2}$, and lends at 5, I cannot see how it is possible for him to pay his way, or prevent the colony from incurring a very serious loss. I think the scheme should be safeguarded in this way: that, if the honourable gentleman finds it will not pay to lend the money at 5 per cent., then power should be given to increase the future rate of interest upon these loans. I cannot help thinking that the honourable gentleman would have done a wiser thing if, instead of frightening the English money-lender, he had proceeded on a more tentative scale. In Victoria they propose to borrow only £500,000 a year, whereas the honourable gentleman, under this measure, proposes to borrow three times that amount a year.

Dr. Newman

11.30. And there is this difference: that they borrow their money within the colony and out of their own savings-banks, and the interest is repayable at home; but the honourable gentleman is going to borrow the money in the English market, which, I take it, is very unsatisfactory. It is greatly to be regretted he did not take up the amendment which was divided upon this evening, and which was proposed by the honourable member for Ellesmere. It seems to me that we should now utterly abandon any such thing as a sinking fund. The old idea of a sinking fund is a thoroughly exploded doctrine. Though Priestley and Hamilton and others thought they had only to set aside money in order that it might accrue at compound interest, and so pay off the debt, yet all modern financiers agree with the honourable member for Ellesmere that if you want to get out of debt there is only one way, and that is by paying the debt. In other words, if you have £20,000 or £50,000 in hand, you should pay off £20,000 or £50,000 of the debt. That is the plan, and not to put it into a sinking fund. You, Sir, sitting in that chair for so many years, must have recognised that in the case of a sinking fund, whether for the colony or for a local body, the consequence is that, after the sinking fund has been accumulated by some thrifty Treasurer, an unthrifty Treasurer comes along and takes it up and uses it. At one time the sinking fund in this colony accumulated to three and a half millions; and to-day how much is there left? £850,000. Various improvident Treasurers came in and took all there was; and, if we start with a sinking fund attached to this loan, some Treasurer will come in and borrow all that sinking fund. If the amendment of the honourable member for Ellesmere had been carried it would have meant that, as money came in, so much of the debt would have been exchanged, and then there would have been no money for an improvident Treasurer to lay his hand upon. We have had several local bodies which have accumulated sinking funds, and then they have voted for having them taken up and used. There is another very unsatisfactory thing, and it is that the honourable gentleman has gone in for borrowing all this amount of money at one fell swoop; because, looking over the return of the Lands and Deeds Registration Office, I find the growth each year is about £1,500,000 or £1,600,000. On the 31st March, 1892, the total of mortgages registered was £26,333,000, and it grew to £27,900,000 in 1893. Again, on the 31st March, 1898, it was £27,900,000, and it grew at the end of the year to £29,600,000. That is a little more than a million and a half a year; and yet the honourable gentleman proposes calmly to borrow a million and a half a year. I cannot think a million and a half a year will be absolutely got by him. The pity seems to me that he should have come in with such a large amount, because that is the total growth of all the mortgages, and that includes all above £5,000, and a large variety of mortgages which the honourable gentleman would not accept under the Bill, and which he has no right to accept under the Bill. This is a fact he stated himself: that he would need only £500,000 this year. It seems to me, then, a pity that he should have put in for £1,500,000 in order to frighten the English bondholder. At the same time, I do admit that this Bill has been improved in Committee, and, if the honourable gentleman had only allowed his followers to improve the Bill as they desired, it would have been made very much better still. I think the limitation of the amount, and making the term two years instead of three, are decided improvements. I shall vote for the third reading, in the hope that the Bill will be further improved in another Chamber, and that next year, if it is found unworkable, the honourable gentleman will bring down an amending Bill, which will make it more satisfactory than it now is.

Major STEWARD.—I do not propose to speak at any length on the policy of this Bill. I spoke previously on the second reading of the Bill; and, with members of the House generally, I am earnestly in favour of the object which it seeks to gain—that is, that the settlers of the country shall be enabled to pursue their industries under a lighter handicap than they have at present. Therefore, Sir, with the general policy of the Bill I agree, and I shall be very glad when it is passed into law. But my special object in rising to-night is to say that I feel very much disappointed with the action of the senior member for Wellington City. It became my duty, in Committee, as a member for South Canterbury, in which district three or four village settlements have been established, and from the settlers of which I have received numerous letters asking that they may be enabled to take advantage of this measure, and pointing out the difficulty in their way—it became my duty, I say, to ask that the minimum of advances that might be given upon improvements should be reduced from £50 to a lesser sum. A number of those holdings are of ten, fifteen, or twenty acres, and the value of the improvements that have been put upon them is, in many cases, not more than £50, £60, £70, or £80 within the last year, and it has been a severe struggle for them to do that in view of the small yield of grain and the abnormally low price for the grain in the English market. The fact is this: that the quotation in England lately—within the last three or four days—is £1 4s. 3d. per quarter for grain, which means 8s. 0½d., and the cost of delivering in London of that grain is 1s. 8½d., which leaves 1s. 4d. to the grower—a price which cannot pay. The men who have taken up these allotments of ten, fifteen, or twenty acres have necessarily done so with the view of putting them down in grass, and in the meantime they have raised grain-crops. They have lost heavily, and have not been able to pay their rentals. My honourable friend the Minister of Lands has been very merciful during the last year or eighteen months, and has not pressed them for their rent. A number of them have written to me, almost piteously, asking me to do all I can in their behalf, and they have told me that if they are able to get advances of anything like 50 per cent. on what they have already spent on permanent improvements of their sections they will be able to pay their rent and carry on. Now, in some of these cases the permanent improvements do not amount to more than 50 per cent. of £100, therefore it follows that the minimum of £50 will not relieve them at all; and acting at their instance, and in their behalf, I have succeeded up to a certain stage in carrying to-night in this House that the possible amount that may be advanced under certain circumstances, if the Minister is satisfied, shall be £25. Sir, when the amendment of the clause which was committed—clause 42—was moved by me, and was carried, I was surprised to find my honourable friend—I may say my literary friend, who knows thoroughly what ought to be the construction of language—the senior member for Wellington City opposed me on the technical ground that, because clause 42 was committed simply for the reduction of £50 to £25, therefore it was not competent for me to move a further amendment to make the clause consistent with itself. Sir, I simply wish to refer to your own decision, which will be found at page 29 of the "Decisions of Speakers" of New Zealand, which lies on the table of the House, and which says, "It is not in order to recommit a portion of a clause; the whole clause must be recommitted." Therefore, Sir, clause 42 being recommitted, I was clearly within your own ruling, and entirely in order, in moving the addition of the words that were proposed. I do not propose to challenge the decision of the Chairman of Committees, but I simply desire to place this on record. This being a money Bill, it will not, I think—I speak with due deference—be possible for another place to amend the Bill, and therefore it will have to be amended by Governor's message to bring it within the compass of the Queen's English. The section originally read as follows—I refer to subsection (3) of clause 42: "No advance shall be granted for a sum less than fifty pounds or more than five thousand pounds, and every advance shall be for fifty pounds or a multiple of fifty pounds." The Committee has struck out the words "fifty pounds or," and we have inserted the words "twenty-five pounds nor." The subsection therefore now reads, "No advance shall be granted for a sum of less than twenty-five pounds nor for more than five thousand pounds, and every advance shall be for fifty pounds or a multiple of fifty pounds." Therefore the subsection is in conflict with itself. Beginning by saying that no advance shall be less than £25, it ends by saying it shall not be less than £50 or a multiple of £50. It is therefore perfectly evident that the further amendment proposed in Committee was absolutely necessary to make the clause carry the intention of the Committee. It could not be amended, I believe, in another place, and will have to be amended by Governor's message. It is possible it may be amended on the third reading, in accordance with what is done in the House of Commons; but that is the only course that can be pursued.

Dr. Newman

Sir R. STOUT.—I should like to make a personal explanation. The honourable member has apparently led the House to assume that I was opposed to the reduction to £25.

Major STEWARD.—No.

Sir R. STOUT.—I was in favour of a reduction to £10; and all I said was this. When it was ruled that other sections could not be amended in any other way than by the amendments specially referred to the Committee, I raised the question whether this section of the Bill could be otherwise amended. I was not opposed to the amendment, but I wished the rule to be uniform.

Major STEWARD.—I wish to say I did not challenge the honourable member. What I wanted to point out was that a consequential amendment necessary to the amendment that had been carried had not been admitted in Committee, and that if not put in there it will have to be moved on the third reading of the Bill, or otherwise come down by Governor's message.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I think the House ought to understand perfectly clearly what the honourable member for Waimate did. As far as I was able to gather, the honourable member's speech was an excellent speech to his constituents.

Major STEWARD.—What do you say?

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I said it was a most excellent speech, and would be appreciated by his constituents. Sir, the honourable gentleman states that he was very much pleased to have carried the amendment, which would enable his new settlers to take advantage of the Bill. I have not the slightest doubt but that some of these settlers will take advantage of the Bill to the fullest limit, and that in the course of a year or two they will approach this House with a petition and ask to be freed from the interest on these advances. These new settlers have already been before this House. They petitioned to have areas of agricultural country in that vicinity opened for settlement at Waimate. They were clamouring for the land, and said they would improve it, and pay rent and interest upon the cost, and become good and genuine settlers; but they have not had the land two years before they petition for reduction of rent, and the honourable gentleman himself pleads that a whole year's rent should be remitted. That is where the weakness of the Government administration comes in. They buy land with an excessive valuation put on, like Pomahaka, and the people are handicapped for all time. The honourable member groans; and no wonder. Extend this principle sufficiently and you will find a political influence created that will be quite strong enough to come to this House and insist that remissions of rent and of interest shall be made. This Bill is one which I am sorry to think I did not succeed in amending. I should have liked to have begun by amending the preamble of the Bill, which reads as follows: "Whereas, by reason of the high rates of interest charged on mortgage of land," to add "consequent on the unjust and heavy taxation imposed on the mortgagee, and consequently on the unfortunate borrower." That is what I wished to insert, as it would have made it clear to farmers—that is, the borrowers—that the reason why the rate of interest was so heavy was that people who advanced that money on land had certain taxation placed upon it which was not placed upon other securities. If that amendment had been inserted, they—the borrowing farmers—would have understood the reason why money was dear to them to-day. The preamble goes on to say, "and the heavy incidental expenses connected therewith, settlers are heavily burdened, and the progress of the colony is much retarded." Sir, I did hope that the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill would bring down a measure of genuine relief to the farmers. Has he done so? He has not. The Bill is largely a deception. Let us take an example. You first of all advance to the settler his £100, and you give him to understand that by paying 5 per cent. on the principal and 1 per cent. by way of sinking fund it will be finally wiped out in thirty-six years; and you give him to understand that with 1 per cent. sinking fund he may by his toil have a free estate to hand over to his grandchildren. Let us inquire into it. A man borrows his £100, and for the first half-year he has only 5 per cent. interest to pay, and 1 per cent. goes towards the final extinguishing of the debt; but take the eighth year, and he is paying 7 per cent.; and in twenty years how much is he paying? Why, 10 per cent.—5 per cent. interest and 5 per cent. principal; and, as the principal sum upon which he has to work diminishes, his yearly payments of principal largely increase—that is, as his ability to pay decreases his calls become heavier. I venture to say, when it is understood in this colony that that is the mode in which this Bill is to be applied—

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Does the Otago Daily Times say that?

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—No, the Otago Daily Times is different; but I wonder the honourable gentleman reads the Otago Daily Times, because he has frequently said that you cannot rely upon the Otago Daily Times, and I wonder the honourable gentleman reads anything he cannot rely upon. His time is much too valuable. Let us take this £100 without the aid of the Otago Daily Times. I want to show that the annual instalment required from the borrower is too heavy, and that he is not getting that relief that is necessary. I think it would be far better if you charged them the 5 per cent., and let them understand that they can continue at that rate as long as they keep their farms sound. But the amount you require them now to pay off is too much, as there are few farmers making sufficient to enable them to pay off such a large amount. When a farmer borrows his £100, no doubt he imagines he is getting that sum for the whole period of thirty-six years, but he is doing nothing of the sort. Why, in twelve years' time before expiry it is down to £50, and he has only £50 to work on; and if you take it for a longer period, fifteen half-yearly payments before it is due, it is down to £30; and yet he is paying on that £30 the sum of £6 per annum, which is almost 30 per cent. on the total advance. I venture to say that is not the kind of relief which the honourable gentleman gives them to understand he is extending. I wish also to refer to the mode of borrowing this money. The honourable gentleman has taken authority to borrow it by two methods—first in the colony, and secondly at Home. I say he has no right to borrow in the colony for this purpose at the present time, for every penny is required in the colony for carrying on the work of trade and manufacture and production; and, if the Government induce money-lenders to place their funds in the colonial stocks, they are absorbing the money which is required for the development of the country. But this is not the only thing; there is the Consols Bill, under which the honourable gentleman proposes to borrow £1,000,000. What does that mean? Why, if the money is raised here at 4 per cent. he will be paying £90,000 more on his £1,000,000 than he ought to pay. The honourable gentleman told us that money is over-plentiful here, and seeking investment at $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and, on the other hand, he quoted a case, giving particulars, showing that there are excellent securities going begging upon which 9 per cent. is now being paid. These securities, the Colonial Treasurer says, are only half the land-tax assessment: and the honourable gentleman ought to realise how illogical his contention is. On the one hand he asserts there are ample funds awaiting investment at $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and on the other that there is excellent security going begging at 9 per cent. He also tells us that all this money is to be advanced on new mortgages; and we know perfectly well it is not to be advanced on any such new security.

Mr. WARD.—I did not say that.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I understood you did say it—that you expected that the money was going to be taken up on new mortgages.

Mr. WARD.—No, I did not.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I accept the honourable gentleman's statement. I must have misunderstood what he said, because there are no such mortgages to absorb the amount he states. Now I come to a very important point—namely, that part regarding the taxation of mortgages. The honourable gentleman has refused to-night to place private persons advancing money in this colony on the same footing as the Government are placed. If a private person is foolish enough to come to New Zealand with £10,000 and to settle here, and to bring his wife and family with him, he is told at once that if he advances money on mortgage he is not to be permitted any exemption, but is to be subjected to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. taxation, and will have to pay 8s. 4d. for every £100 he advances. That is what he is told. The Government can borrow from the money-lenders at Home; the money-lender may remain in England, and this Bill empowers the Treasurer to borrow from him at 4 per cent., and that money is not to be subjected to taxation in this colony at all. That is a matter the House and the country ought to understand. The Colonial Treasurer is giving a distinct premium to people to stay in other countries and draw all their income from this colony through the Government, and the money is not to be taxed; but if they come here to settle, and bring their wives and families, and spend their income and live in the place, for doing that they are to be subjected to special taxation. I say that the Colonial Treasurer will never carry out a policy of that sort if he gives it that consideration which he ought to give it. He will perhaps tell us that this money is not to be subject to taxation. He, however, has not yet made the discovery that it is, and he has twice voted against its being placed on the same footing as money advanced by private persons and companies. The Bill shows that, if there is any deficiency in connection with the administration of these funds, the honourable gentleman can fall back upon the consolidated revenue of the country, and make up any deficiency that might arise from advancing money to borrowers or farmers in the colony. And what does that mean? That, if this scheme is not a success, every borrower is to be assisted by persons who do not borrow, but who are consuming dutiable goods in the colony, and that the consolidated revenue is to bear any loss in regard to any advances made under this measure. Speaking generally upon this question of money, I believe myself that, had the Government not interfered as much as they have in this colony with the ordinary trade the ordinary law of supply and demand would have brought down money at the present time to the rate indicated by the late Mr. Ballance. He pointed out in several speeches that money was only worth $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and that Government could not get $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for their insurance money. That was three years ago, and he illustrated in the Financial Statement year by year that charges were coming down in consequence of previous sound administration. And in this House he quoted one case in which one money-lending firm was prepared to take up these advances at a lower rate of interest. The reason money was high in this colony was not far to seek. Firstly, money was scared away a few years ago by the dreadful threats uttered against all who had any money in the colony; secondly, the money which would naturally have taken the place of the withdrawn capital was all absorbed by the Government, as I will presently show; and, thirdly, severe exceptional taxation was placed on all money advanced on mortgage, which was not placed on money going into other investment. If the Government had not absorbed so much of the funds in the Public Trust Office, Insurance, and Post Office there would have been ample money available without going to the London market. Its own funds are very large, and they ought not to have to go to London. The Government Insurance lent something like £1,694,000 in stock, deficiency bills, and Treasury bills, and only some £400,000 odd advanced on mortgage; and if we look at the business last year in connection with the Government Insurance we find that £114,000 of Treasury bills were renewed, and only £3,000 of mortgages were renewed. The Public Trust Office renewed £212,000 of Treasury bills, and not one penny of mortgages was renewed; and if we go still further we find that the money has been absorbed by the Government at a low rate of interest—moneys that ought to have gone in the natural course of affairs to the settlers of the colony in order to give them assistance. In addition to that, we have taxed once, and sometimes twice, every penny advanced on mortgage, and we have put taxation upon money coming here for investment on mortgage. Again referring to this Bill, let us look at the position a man occupies who borrows £100 under this scheme from the Government. First of all he refunds £100; then there is the interest, £117—and we should suppose that for that £217 he was enjoying advantages on the whole £100 for the whole period, but he is not. Twelve and a half years before his final payment is due his advance is down to £50, and he is not enjoying the full benefit of the £100. There are something like fifteen payments, and before the final amount is due it is down to £30. That is the position. After paying no less than £217 for the loan, he does not enjoy the full advantages of the £100 for the whole period. The Colonial Treasurer told us to-night, in reference to exemptions on mortgages, that five in every six were exempt. I find that the money advanced on mortgage, speaking roughly, when Mr. Ballance was preparing his financial proposals three years ago, was about twenty-five millions, and the taxation derived from that was £100,000, and if we work that out we find that it includes almost every penny of that twenty-five millions of money; and, if the Colonial Treasurer's contention is correct, that five-sixths of these advances on mortgage are exempt, surely the vast proportion of that £100,000 would never be levied at all. The honourable gentleman made that statement, I regret to say, without considering the matter in its fullest sense. I say that the intention of this Bill was primarily to aid the farmers of the colony. That intention has

Mr. T. Mackenzie

120. been entirely departed from. You are embracing within the scope of the Bill your town buildings and suburban residences. You may advance a lot of money on the security of some mushroom town, the prosperity of which is contingent upon the mines in its neighbourhood. But a lot of the mines may be shut down, or may run out, and the buildings in that vicinity will, of course, depreciate in consequence. We know how the values of town property rise and fall, and I say, in a measure of this sort, the Government ought not to embrace within its scope securities of that description. Then, Sir, the amount of the advance shows that the intention of the Bill is to secure the large business of the country. There can be no small farmers aided if we are going to advance on properties worth £7,000 and £8,000. This Bill provides that you can advance money on properties worth £8,000 and £10,000 in the towns. Now, an average of £20,000 comes to each constituency, so the money will not go far. The advancing up to two-thirds of the value is also too high, and for these and other reasons I consider that, instead of having a good and useful measure submitted to us, we have a crude and ill-thought-out proposal, such as the settlers would not be justified in accepting. Now, if the Government had brought down a Bill proposing to charge a reasonable rate of interest, and letting the person who borrowed continue to pay interest so long as his security continued good and he was prepared to pay, they might have done some good; but they do not propose that. They are willing to advance money on security, making the borrowers believe that the 1 per cent. sinking fund will in time liquidate the principal of the debt; whereas in reality they will as time goes on call up up to 15 and 20 per cent., which it must be apparent is beyond the means of settlers to pay, and all the time the principal is being gradually diminished. I am sorry they have not brought in a more workable measure. I should like to explain that I gave a pair the other night to a member who was unwell, and I am made to support Mr. Earnshaw's amendment to extend the principle of lending on all classes of property: this, of course, I strongly object to.

Mr. LANG.—I do not intend to take up the time of the House for more than a couple of minutes, but I want to give my reasons for voting against this Bill. In the first place, it is a very different measure from that which was placed before the country at the time of the elections. It was always spoken of then as a measure for providing cheap money for farmers, and the Premier himself, in this House, spoke about it as a measure for providing cheap money for farmers. Then, again, I object to the two-thirds valuation. This, I believe, is the extreme limit to which money is generally lent by private people and commercial firms, and we know that in a great many cases they have failed in consequence. We have no reason to believe that the Government will be more careful than private people or commercial firms are with their money. Then, again, the proposal is to lend money up to £5,000: this sum I consider to be a great deal too high, and altogether it is at variance with the principle laid down by the Government, to do the greatest amount of good to the greatest number. Surely it is better to divide £5,000 among twenty-five people than to give it all to one individual. The smaller borrowers would reap a greater benefit in proportion than the larger ones. The larger one, who wants an advance of £5,000, does not get so much advantage as the man who requires to borrow £50 or £100, because the interest on small amounts is much higher, and the cost of obtaining the mortgage is much larger in proportion. The amount of relief which the measure is intended to afford will be a mere drop in the bucket. What is one and a half millions when compared with the twenty-nine millions which is the amount lent on mortgage in the colony? It seems to me that only a favoured few will get the advantage. The Government, in their system of co-operative works, are stated to be doing good to the poorer people, and it is said to be of greater advantage to let the work direct to them than to let it to contractors. Surely, then, they ought to adopt the same plan in regard to this scheme, and allow the advantage to be obtained by the smaller people, as in the first case. The honourable member for Riccarton, in moving his amendment, excused himself for not supporting the amendment to strike out the £5,000 in order to replace it with £1,000 on the ground that very few would require the larger amount; but the Minister said it was necessary to have the larger amount left in, for, if not, it would not pay. Now, I think it goes without saying that the Minister will naturally prefer the large sums, so as to make it a paying concern. This Bill was not altogether popular in the country, and I feel sure that when it becomes known in its present shape it will be still more unpopular than before.

Mr. MASSEY.—I do not think it necessary to detain the House at any length at this stage of the debate, because when I spoke on the second reading I stated my objections very fully. But there are one or two points which at that time I failed to bring out clearly, and which I propose now to refer to very briefly indeed. The first is that the Bill in its present form has never been before the country. I am willing to admit that one or two members of the Government at the time of the late election mentioned that it was intended to do something in the way of providing cheap money for the settlers; but outside the capital it was never understood that this Bill was to apply to merchants, manufacturers, publicans, and other people in the cities. It was always spoken of and referred to as a Bill to provide cheap money for farmers. Even now, in many parts of the country it is referred to as a farmer's loan Bill. The opposition to it at the present time in the country is very strong, but when the electors realise that we are going in for borrowing to such an extent the opposition to it will be much stronger than it is now. I have received a telegram from a gentleman in Auckland on this subject, and this is what he says—

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—Is he a member of the National Association?

Mr. MASSEY.—I believe he is. All these people are members of the National Association.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The National "Asses."

Mr. MASSEY.—There are no asses in the

Mr. Lang

National Association, but there are plenty of two-legged donkeys in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That, sir, is a very improper remark to make in reference to members of the House. I call upon you to withdraw it at once.

Mr. MASSEY.—I withdraw the remark. This is the telegram:—

"Feeling here very strong against borrowing proposals. Petition against Cheap Money Bill and Consols being numerously signed. First petition, 740 signatures, posted. More to follow."

This is an indication of what is going on at the present time, and a very strong indication too. Turning to the Bill itself, there is the clause—subsection (8) of clause 44—which refers to cases where the mortgagors pay sums, additional to the 1 per cent., in reduction of the principal of the mortgage debt: "All such last-mentioned payments shall be credited with interest at the rate of four pounds per centum per annum." Now, let us suppose a man has borrowed £1,000 under the provisions of the Bill. We will imagine he has paid off £500 of that money. For that £500 he is only credited with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, but he is still charged 5 per cent. per annum on £1,000, which would mean £50 per annum. He is credited with £20 per annum for the £500 he has paid off, leaving £30 per annum which he still owes: that is interest at the rate really of 6 per cent., which, with the 1 per cent. sinking fund, means an annual charge of 7 per cent. per annum. We have heard the property-tax spoken of as a tax upon industry, but, Sir, this is even worse in that respect. This I consider to be a most objectionable clause. I do not think the Treasurer can explain it away. However, it is quite useless to urge objections against the Bill. When the division is taken a large majority will follow the Government into one lobby, and we shall have a small minority in the other lobby. We can only protest against the Bill becoming law, and against another three millions being added to the already heavy burdens of the colony.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—There is an old saying about the Bourbons that they learned nothing and that they forgot nothing. So it is with the Government: though they have had the research and views of others before them, yet they have learned nothing new, nor improved on the scheme before this House in 1885. In that year, upon the motion of Mr. Macandrew, a Committee was set up. Looking through the names I find they were not all of them Liberals; in fact, the Liberal party of to-day would regard them as very Conservative. The purpose for which that Committee was set up was,—

"To consider and report as to how far it is expedient that the credit of the colony should be applied towards making advances at a low rate of interest to settlers on the security of their land, and also as to the best mode in which such credit may be so applied, the Committee to have power to call for persons and papers, and to confer with any Committee of the Legislative Council that may be appointed with a similar object; five to form a quorum; and to report in three weeks."

That Committee consisted of Mr. Bevan, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Cowan, Mr. Dargaville, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Smith, Mr. J. W. Thomson, Mr. J. B. Whyte, Sir J. Vogel, and Mr. Macandrew. And yet, Conservative as this Committee might be considered, they proposed a measure for advancing money to settlers which was far better for the country in general, and for the settlers particularly, than this measure which the Government has brought before us. I will just read a few extracts from the Committee's report, so that members may realise how far they meant to come to the assistance of the struggling settlers of New Zealand:—

"Your Committee is of opinion that the public credit of New Zealand might with advantage be applied towards enabling settlers, on the security of their land, to acquire advances at a comparatively low rate of interest. Such advances might be made through the Land Transfer Department, in sums not exceeding £2,000 to any one individual, for any period not exceeding ten years; rate of interest, $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum; amount of such advance not to exceed one-half of the value as fixed under the Property Assessment Act. Mortgagor to be entitled to cancel mortgage at any time on payment of the principal and interest to date of cancellation."

"The sole instrument of mortgage should be the indorsement thereof on the certificate of title, and its registration in the Land Transfer Office books."

"The amount advanced should be paid in New Zealand Government debentures of not less than £100 each, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, with a currency of fifteen years. Principal and interest to be payable either at the Colonial Treasury or the Bank of England."

"Mortgages outstanding 31st March, 1885.—£100 and under £500: Number, 24,922; amount, £5,421,793. £500 and under £1,000: Number, 7,886; amount, £5,027,883. £1,000 and under £3,000: Number, 6,634. Above £100 and under £1,000: Number, 32,788. Total amount, £10,449,676."

That, I think, is a far better scheme for a Government that meant to come to the assistance of the struggling settler—by advancing him a reasonable amount of money on assured security, and under conditions that were safe to the colony, and it would not have involved the colony in the amount which the present Government choose to do. When I was speaking on the Financial Statement, I asked a question which has since been asked of the Colonial Treasurer, and during this debate he has again and again been challenged by many members on the same point, and to-night he has also been challenged by several members, but he always refused to squarely meet the issue—Who will pay the mortgage-tax? He has at last said that the mortgagor will not pay it; but he has not said that the mortgagee will pay it. He is shuffling on this question, if that is a permissible word to use, and he has not answered it in a way the House had a right to expect from the Colonial Treasurer. The House can only come to one conclusion: that the State is going to forego the mortgage-tax. I contend that the only logical conclusion must be, if the Government foregoes this mortgage-tax, they must forego all mortgage-taxes, because you cannot tax one class of the community and let others go free. And it is not to be forgotten that the manufacturers in towns are not going to get any relief. The Colonial Treasurer has given a distinct assurance that manufacturers are going to get no relief; yet they will be compelled to make good a portion of this mortgage-tax. I think this is very unfair, and if taxation is going to be imposed in this way every one in the community has a right to share in the borrowed money. As I have said before, this Bill is a very specious one, and it is one that country members will have great difficulty in withstanding. Town members can stand very firmly against it, but it must be a great tax on the country members to resist it, because every country settler will believe at the first glance that he will get money very cheaply from the Government, and for the moment members may be in a very uncomfortable position if they do not support it, although I believe in the end the settlers will come to see that it will not be of that great advantage the Government would lead them to believe. I have always been in favour of the Government coming to the assistance of these leaseholders that the Government are creating, seeing that they cannot borrow money in the open market like those who hold in fee-simple, and if the Government had been desirous to feel their way with this scheme and meet this class of settlers to the value of half their improvements, and to a reasonable amount, say £500 or £1,000—I think, myself, £500 would be quite ample at first—the whole of the country would have gone with them. But the scheme they have brought before the House is of such magnitude that the country should pronounce on it before it becomes law, and I trust the Legislative Council will in their wisdom refuse to pass the measure until it has received the sanction of the country. As the measure is now before us no constituency in New Zealand has pronounced in its favour. The general question of advances to settlers has been before them, as I have shown, from 1885; but I say distinctly that, as the scheme now is, it has not received the sanction of the country. It goes without saying that it will pass this House by an overwhelming majority, if not carried on the voices; yet I say the Upper House should exercise its privilege and see that a measure should not be passed by them until they realise that the country has pronounced in its favour. Another thing I should like to point out is that, from the time they spoke on the platforms of the country at the initial stage of the scheme, the Government have shifted their ground. They were at first to borrow money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and lend it at 5 per cent., and all costs were to be paid out of that $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. But since then they have demanded that the House should give them power to borrow at 4 per cent., and that they shall lend it at 5 per cent., plus the cost of the mortgage, although we shall be minus the mortgage-tax. That is widely different from the scheme as first before the country. But, no matter how the Government has changed, it is quite evident that the party as a party is prepared to carry it simply because it is a Government proposal. And this shows how lax members of the party have been with regard to discussing this measure on its second reading, and on committal; and there is also a very small quorum in the House even on its third reading. The course of this measure has been unprecedented, with regard to any of its magnitude, in the history of New Zealand in connection with proposals to borrow money. I am sure, if a ballot could be taken of members on this question, the proposal would be thrown out by an overwhelming majority; and I have good grounds for this opinion in the lax manner in which the members have dealt with the measure while it has been before the House. I altogether oppose the Bill, because I think two-thirds is an extreme rate to lend at. It is all very well to say that land has come down to bed-rock, but we do not know whether that is so. Take, for instance, the best land in New Zealand—in Taranaki: though it may be going up at present, how long can we say that the price of produce will keep up? It will fluctuate in the future as frozen mutton and as wheat have fluctuated in the past. We have seen the time in New Zealand when wheatlands would bring double or treble what they will bring now. You cannot say that prices are at bed-rock with regard to produce. They will always be of a fluctuating character, and if the Government are to lend money for thirty six years and a half I say they cannot afford to do it above a one-half valuation. They should at any rate, in the first few years, feel certain of the ground they are going on, and not extend it beyond the half value. They have had the experience in their own departments of Insurance and Public Trust, and companies, with regard to lending on half valuation; and I say there is no need to go beyond that, at any rate for the first year or two. And I oppose the five-thousand-pound limit, because, if it is true there is such an overwhelming number of people suffering under the payment of high interest for advances, that is all the more reason why they should disperse the money over the widest area and cut down the advances to a nominal sum. This return in 1885 shows that in the first two years, if they had made it £100, they would have had more than they could do with three millions to meet the demands on them. I also object to the clause dealing with bankruptcy. I think that if the Government enters into finance, whether as money-lenders or anything else, it should conform to common usage, and it has no right to have precedence in this case; more especially seeing that there is demanded as an insurance against these risks the putting-by of one-sixth of the payments received, there is no need to have this clause, that if any one goes through the Court the Government shall have a lien upon him as long as he lives. I think it is improper, and not what one would expect from a Liberal Government. I have opposed this measure consistently, as I have opposed all the financial policy measures, because, as far as my lights lead me, the country has not pronounced on them as a whole. There are no parts of the colony, since we have been here, that have declared with any certain sound at all that they approved of these financial policy proposals. In times past, when large money-lending proposals have been brought forward, it has always been that there has been a vitality throughout the country either opposing or supporting them; but I say in no province in New Zealand, while we have had these large financial policy measures before us, has there been any indication that they approve of them. I do not believe a single constituency have declared by any large public meeting that they approve of these financial proposals, but there are many places where they have distinctly pronounced against them. I say on these grounds the hand of the Government should be stayed, and I do trust the Upper House will see its way not to pass the Advances and Consols Bills till the country has pronounced an opinion upon them. I do not believe the Government think they are going to get them through. I am inclined to think that they hope the Upper House will throw them out, for two reasons. In the first place, they will have money enough to go on with. They will have one million for public works and the purchase of Native lands without this, and that is enough for this year. But if the Upper House does throw them out they will be able, on the platforms throughout the colony, to say, "Look at what we should have done for you if it had not been for the Legislative Council." And I am strongly of opinion that, when the Government threw the whole of these financial measures on the floor of the House, it was so done with the sincere hope that the Legislative Council would throw some of the larger ones out. In spite of this, I trust they will not become law this session, and that the country will have time to consider as to whether it will be to its advantage to have them gone on with. I certainly oppose this Bill, and shall continue to do so; and I do not believe it will be of any real advantage to the country as a whole. That part which refers to advances to bush-settlers I can thoroughly understand, and I could cordially support it, because I am of opinion that the people whom we are putting on the lands, and more especially the bush-lands, with hardly any funds at all, have a claim on the colony in this respect: not that this country must assist them with money, but that it would be to the advantage of the State to stand by them and see that they are not driven back into the towns.

Mr. Earnshaw

12.30. And in this respect it will be a wise thing for the Government to advance moneys in small sums to bush-settlers—for instance, to those who take up land under the lease-in-perpetuity system; but that would not require more than half a million of money. Half a million would be ample to meet all these cases to a reasonable amount; and I have no doubt, if the Government would refrain from absorbing the moneys of the Public Trust Office and the Government Insurance Department for Treasury bills, and allowed those moneys to be used for this purpose, it would meet the case, or, if not, only a small sum more would be required. If that was found to be a success, we could increase the margin of advances. That would have been a policy of self-reliance. As it is, it is a policy of plunge. We are trying to do the whole thing at once. I trust that this measure, in spite of the preliminary support which it has received in this House, will be thrown out in another place, in order that the country may be able to pronounce clearly upon it.

Mr. O'REGAN.—I rise to oppose the measure, but from principles apparently very different from those of the honourable member who has just sat down. In this connection I am willing to give the Ministry credit for every good intention; I am willing to accept their assurance that they are actuated by a laudable desire to assist struggling settlers; but it seems to me that the good intentions of these honourable gentlemen are in excess of their comprehension of the true principles of democracy. In the first place, the fact seems to be overlooked that not only are struggling settlers to be assisted under the provisions of this Bill, but also those who certainly cannot be included in that category, because you cannot call a man who has security to offer for £5,000 a struggling settler. He may, of course, be a bonâ fide settler; but I venture to say that you cannot place a man who has twenty-five pounds' or fifty pounds' worth of security in the same category as a man who has security to the value of five thousand pounds. A man in the latter position is generally able to make his own terms, and to meet the money-lender on something like terms of equality. Therefore it seems to me that it is quite erroneous to consider this as a Bill to assist only the struggling settler. It is equally as absurd to say that this Bill has met with the approval of the country. In discussing all the policy Bills of the Ministry during the present session we have been repeatedly met with the cry that because the Ministry were returned by a large majority the country has approved of their measures. How can that be said, when so many issues are put before the electors? Under these circumstances the country, having had so many issues involved in one election, cannot be described as having declared in favour of any particular measure. The honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) has also committed an error in saying that, if there had been an appeal to the country after this Bill was proposed, then, in the event of a majority coming back to support the Government, we could have taken that as being a declaration of the country in favour of the measure. I think the honourable gentleman, when he reflects, will agree with me in saying that the only way by which we can find if the country is in favour of a Bill is by putting the question to the direct vote of the people. Therefore I hope when the Referendum Bill comes on again honourable gentlemen will recognise that the true way to test the feelings of the country is by such a measure as that. It is a fundamental principle of political economy that if you depress the rates of interest or wages you raise rent—that is, the value of land. The whole of the producers of the colony are divided into landowners, labourers, and capitalists; or, in other words, the sum-total of the wealth of the community is divided into rent, wages, and interest. It is a characteristic of material progress that, as a country becomes more populous, as industries become more intricate, and as civilisation advances in every respect, wages and interest decline. What we have suffered from in the past is not high rates of interest, because high interest is a very good thing. High interest is to capital what high wages are to labour. The true index to the prosperity of a nation is the rate of wages and the rate of interest. It is a popular error to suppose that wages and interest rise and fall inversely. They both rise and fall together. What does rise as material progress advances is the value of land. If we succeed in lowering the rate of interest by this Bill—and I do not admit that we shall—we certainly cannot raise the rate of wages. Where does the increased increment go? It goes to raise the value of the land. An honourable gentleman says that the cry is that wages are too high already. If the honourable gentleman wishes to get a seat in the House at the next election he will certainly have to keep that statement in the background. And I, for one, shall feel enlightened if he will explain how any community can prosper with low wages. How can trade flourish if the people are not able to buy? How can there be purchasing power but when the people are earning? However, I have not risen to give a dissertation on the theory of wages, but I simply wish to point out that, if the rate of interest is reduced in consequence of this Bill—I do not say that will be the inevitable effect—it will not raise wages, but the increased increment must go to the value of the land. This Bill must have a stimulating effect. I think that the prospect of obtaining cheap money must inevitably have the effect of inducing a large number to go upon the land. It will have the same stimulating effect with regard to the settlement of the land as protective duties have upon the development of industries. But it by no means follows that such stimulation is healthy. Stimulation by such artificial means is never healthy, and it must in the end be disastrous. A large number of people will be induced by the prospect of obtaining cheap money to take up land and embark in the pursuit of farming; they will find that there are no adequate markets for their produce; and in the end they will be unable to pay off the interest or principal of these loans. This scheme will have an enlivening effect for a time; it may cause a moderate land-boom, but it will not promote healthy settlement or find employment for the people. It must have the ultimate effect of strengthening the position of those who are already very well able to take care of themselves, by adding to the increment of their land. Again, if cheap money is such a good thing, why tax mortgages and incomes? It must be clear to every one that if you tax capital it is not the owner who is taxed, but the user, the borrower. Those who borrow have to pay the taxation by increased interest, just as the masses have to pay the Customs duties in the increased prices. If the Government wish to give the people cheap money let them repeal the income-tax and the mortgage-tax. If they would do that they would find no stronger supporter than I should be. Another objection to the Bill is that it creates costly and elaborate administering machinery. It will find comfortable billets, no doubt, for a number of people, and it will, I think, open the avenues to political corruption and favouritism. I do not say that will be the case, but I say most emphatically that when the Bill becomes law there will be innumerable opportunities for such corruption. For these reasons, I cannot see my way to support the Bill. I may be told by the Minister of Lands that this is not true Liberalism; but, at the risk of obtaining another dressing-down from that honourable gentleman as to what is true Liberalism, I must adhere to my decision in regard to this Bill. It must not be understood for a moment that I am in any way antagonistic to the interests of the farmers. I know the farmers are in a very undesirable condition, and I know they are a very deserving class. They are in a true sense struggling colonists, and if I thought this Bill would give any genuine assistance to them I should very gladly support it. The Bill cannot in reality assist bona fide or deserving settlers, and will only give substantial assistance to those who are well able to take care of themselves. I cannot support the Bill; but if my views on it are not borne out by experience hereafter, I shall not only be surprised, but well pleased.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—I wish to explain a vote which I gave when the Bill was in Committee. A division was taken over one clause, which provides that the Bill should apply to both town and country. On Tuesday night I gave a general pair against the Bill, and during the evening I was paired against the motion mentioned, of which I was entirely in favour. I merely wish to explain this, to get it into Hansard.

Mr. WARD.—There have, I think, been a few peculiar positions in the debate which has taken place this evening. In the first place, let me point out briefly to my honourable friend the senior member for Wellington City the position in regard to several of the questions raised by him. The honourable gentleman urged that the provision as regards the Bankruptcy Act should not be kept in this Bill, and he therefore advocated that the security to the State should be reduced. Practically, that is what he did. If his proposal were carried out, the security of the State for moneys held in this way would certainly be weakened. Then the honourable gentleman urged that the margin should be increased.

Mr. O'Regan

Sir R. STOUT.—Hear, hear. Margin increased; made half, instead of two-thirds.

Mr. WARD.—From the arguments of the honourable member, it appeared to me that he was underrating the security the State was to hold under these proposals. That appeared to me, at any rate, to be the trend of his argument, and I think I listened to him attentively. Surely the honourable member cannot understand the proposals. Now let me deal with one or two of his contentions. He said that no amendments were allowed to be made in the Bill when in Committee this evening. I would remind the honourable gentleman that he had the same opportunities as other honourable members to move amendments. There was no attempt to prevent reasonable amendments being made, but I objected to the amendments proposed in the House to-night without notice. In Committee no fewer than five important amendments were made in clause 25, however, and honourable members had opportunities of moving further amendments in Committee, which they could have availed themselves of. The honourable member states that the tendency of this Bill is in the direction of class legislation, and one of his arguments was that it did not enable manufacturers to obtain money. Now, I merely desire to repeat the arguments that I used on a former occasion, to the effect that, if an amount of money were going to be lent by this process to the country settlers, clearly you would set free a large sum of money which must benefit the towns. I do not think you can get away from that position; and it seems to me that to have every class of the community included in the measure would only cause the system to break down, and I say the original object of the Bill was never intended to cover that. By obtaining a large sum of money for the use of the country you must at the same time benefit the towns very considerably. Now, Sir, the honourable the senior member for Wellington City and the honourable member who sits beside him—the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw)—both referred to the proposal made by the late Mr. Macandrew in 1885, and favoured it as against the one put forward by the Government.

Sir R. STOUT.—Only on the two things, the £2,000 and the half-margin.

Mr. WARD.—While Mr. Macandrew proposed to borrow money at 4 per cent. and to lend it at 4½ per cent., we propose to borrow at 3½ per cent., and to lend at 5 per cent. His proposal was ½ per cent. margin, ours is 1½ per cent. margin. I am referring now to the interest, of course. I think our system is, therefore, undeniably the better and the sounder of the two. This being so, and if those honourable members favoured the Macandrew proposal, their arguments against this Bill will, I think, scarcely bear looking into. Let me now, Sir, deal with the proposal to issue debentures in London and land-bonds in the colony. My honourable friend said that no explanation had been made as to why it was proposed to raise money in London up to 4 per cent. and in the colony at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I did explain that the 4 per cent. was put into the Bill for the simple reason that at odd times we may not be able to obtain money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for short-dated debentures. I have, however, said in the House, and also when in Committee, that it is not intended to raise this money at over $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Let me refer again to the Macandrew system. Under it the money was proposed to be raised at 4 per cent., but they had absolutely the power to obtain it at much below par. This being so, the present system is much to be preferred to that, whichever way you look at it. I will now deal with the bankruptcy proposal. The honourable the senior member for Wellington City commented adversely upon the proposal to exclude debtors under this Bill from the operation of the Bankruptcy Act. Simply stated, the position is, that we are asking that the Crown debtors under this Bill shall be placed in the same position as they were in before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act of 1892. I say that every member in this House, and every person in the country, whatever his attitude towards the Government of the day may be, must admit that this is only a reasonable provision. So far as the unfortunate bankrupt is concerned, if his bankruptcy is brought about by misfortune, then, undoubtedly, no one representing the Government or the Lending Board would be harsh with him under those circumstances.

Sir R. STOUT.—They would have priority.

Mr. WARD.—They would have priority, and rightly so. I say that in a case where the State is lending money all over the country, and where the money is in the position of being an investment by the State, it is only right that the State should have the first claim to be secured against ordinary creditors. I do not think any practicable man need have anything to fear under the proposal contained in this Bill, whatever Government may happen to be in office. I would now, Sir, like to say a word or two with regard to the mortgage-tax. The honourable gentleman said that the three millions to be lent under this Bill would cost the State £12,500 a year, and he wanted to know who was going to pay this. There has been a great deal said on the mortgage-tax, and an amendment was moved in the House with regard to it. I opposed that amendment, for the simple reason that under the Bill the mortgage-tax is not paid by the mortgagor at all.

Sir R. STOUT.—It never was.

Mr. WARD.—Very well; that being so, there is no necessity to have an amendment to prevent its being charged to the mortgagor.

Sir R. STOUT.—That was not the amendment. It was that it was to be charged to the mortgagees.

Mr. WARD.—Well, it was to be paid by the mortgagees, and, of course, that is the Superintendent.

Sir R. STOUT.—You objected to that.

Mr. WARD.—I objected to it under the circumstances; because what is the use of putting an amendment in the Bill which is already provided for? I say that under this Bill the mortgagor is relieved from the mortgage-tax, and, because he is relieved from the mortgage-tax per se, the mortgagees pay the mortgage-tax. That is quite clear. I think, when, as the honourable gentleman says, the mortgagor is not called upon to pay the mortgage-tax, then, as a matter of ordinary business, the Superintendent will require to provide for the mortgage-tax. Then, again, let me deal with this argument of the honourable gentleman about the indebtedness of England and the comparison which he has made between England and this country. The honourable gentleman was quoting the year 1889 from Whitaker. I have taken the year 1891, and when I quoted from Whitaker the other evening I said the private debt of England for railway-construction alone was nearly a thousand millions. It was really £919,425,121 in 1891: that is two years ago; and if the honourable gentleman takes the trouble to look he will find that at the present time the debt of England is over a thousand millions; so that the figures I used upon that occasion were quite correct. For two docks alone England has spent £11,000,000; none of which is included in the public debt. Who will say what this country will be fifty years hence? This is still a young country. Yet, look at what has been done here in little over half a century? We have constructed all our railways and many of our harbour-works out of loan; we have opened up the country by roads; we have established postal and telegraph services all over the country, and promoted public works in every conceivable direction. Notwithstanding this, we find the honourable gentleman saying that if the debt of England was proportioned to that of this country it would be £2,248,000,000. I ask any honourable member to say whether, with our limited population, we have not very well provided for our public works for many years to come. We cannot duplicate our railways, our harbours, and our telegraphs. I say that, taking a reasonable view of it, we have provided for ourselves many years ahead of our present population. And, in order to have a true comparison of both countries' indebtedness, you must compare the age of each, the population of each, and the increase that has taken place. With a population fifty-seven times greater than ours, England ought of course to be improving her position at a greater rate than we are. One hundred and fifty years hence will be the time to make a reasonable comparison between our position to-day and that of England to-day. But to compare a young country like this with a huge empire like Great Britain is, in my opinion, absurd. The honourable gentleman's argument will not stand looking into. Then, as to the honourable gentleman's counter-proposition, with reference to the Insurance and Trust Office funds. He says that half a million a year should be contributed by way of advances to settlers by these two departments. But, I would ask, have those departments not done all they could in this direction?—and are they not doing so now? Have they, however, been able to meet the reasonable demands of the people of this country for loan-moneys? Certainly not. And why? Because they have not had the money to do it. The honourable member for Clutha was mistaken in some of the figures he used, and these figures were, of course, misleading. I do not say the honourable gentleman was purposely misleading; but in making a comparison between the renewals of Treasury bills and the renewals of ordinary mortgages he talked about he forgot that they were the ordinary renewals of the Government Insurance and renewals of the Public Trust Office. The honourable gentleman entirely overlooks the fact that as Treasury bills mature they must be either paid off or be renewed in the ordinary course, and when the honourable gentleman used the term "renewal" he confused two distinct systems; and, as a matter of fact, he cannot in a case of this sort make any comparison between the advances of ordinary mortgages and the renewals of Treasury bills. But let the honourable member take the gross amount of loans advanced by these two institutions on mortgage. That is the right way to do it. As a matter of fact, during the last twelve months the Government has had comparatively little for public purposes from either of the departments; they have been allowed to invest the funds with private people; and I have said this before, and I repeat it: Our desire is to allow those institutions to lend a much larger proportion of their money to private individuals, and a less amount to the State. So that clearly cuts against the argument of the honourable gentleman. Now, Sir, just a word or two in connection with the arguments of my honourable friend the senior member for Wellington City about the French system. The honourable gentleman quoted, in connection with the Crédit Foncier system, that, while £120,000,000 had been advanced, the same writer stated that it had done no good as far as the mortgagors were concerned—that it had been of little or no use to agriculturists. Now, as a matter of fact, I venture to say no one will deny the statement that if a book were written by the honourable member himself upon the proposed system of advances to settlers in this country we should find—and it would only be natural to find—that, in accordance with his views, he would use every conceivable argument he could against these proposals; and, on the other hand, you would find that those who favoured the system would produce counter-arguments just as sound and just as strong; and, of course, it would be easy, fifty years hence, when we are all dead and gone, for some one to quote from a work, say, by the senior member for Wellington, and say, Here are strong reasons why a scheme such as this should not be carried. It generally happens that, when one authority can be quoted to show that a particular system is not good, equally good authorities can be quoted to show that it is excellent. But to show that the honourable gentleman did not go quite far enough in order to give the real cause of the £120,000,000 not having resulted in the relief of agriculturists, here is what was said by the writer he referred to: "In spite of these ingenious combinations, the Crédit Foncier has not been able to render very great services to agriculture; the sum-total of the capital lent by it rises, indeed, to the imposing figure of nearly £120,000,000 sterling; but the greater part of this has been employed in building, and hardly a quarter has gone to country property." Very well, the primary object of this system is to allow money to go to country property; and, as a matter of fact, the Lending Board is created for the purpose of making advances chiefly on land. The same system exists in connection with Government Insurance and Trust Office advances, which have hitherto been largely lent on that class of security. How many loans have been made on buildings? Comparatively few; and I say that under the system we have here you will find the Lending Board will make comparatively few loans upon properties in town. Then, again, the honourable gentleman quoted the United States, and held them up as an example which should be followed.

Mr. Ward

Sir R. STOUT.—No, I did not; not in borrowing at all. I quoted the same author as saying that the homestead system should be adopted, and borrowing discouraged. I did not say the United States were an example we should follow, especially not the Western States. They are dreadfully mortgaged.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member said we should rather be inclined to adopt certain measures, such as the homestead law in the United States, which prevented the owner from borrowing. Very well; I hold in my hands the Investors' Review for November, 1893, and in it I find the farm mortgages in the United States amount to £187,240,600. That being so, how can the honourable gentlemen advocate the system referred to in this work from which he quoted, and from which I have just quoted? I find in the same work the following statement: "Four States have a total indebtedness upon 'acres' of £114,000,000 odd, and this debt had all been created within a period of ten years—from 1890 to 1890." Now, the honourable member advocates that that system should be adopted.

Sir R. STOUT.—No; the homestead system. They cannot mortgage a homestead.

Mr. WARD.—Now, just let me for a moment deal with the remark made by the honourable member for Waitemata. The honourable member said that he represents the views of a certain section in the northern portion of the colony, who, I may say, are opposed to every part of the policy of the Government; and then he read a letter in connection with the matter.

I will, however, read a letter that was sent to me from Cambridge, Waikato, dated the 24th September, 1894. This statement is made in this letter:—

"I take the liberty of writing you in reference to your 'cheap-money scheme.' Notwithstanding petitions to the contrary, there is a very general feeling of favour to the measure about here; but, to be candid, I must state that, on account of your being personally unknown in this part, many people are under the impression that the whole of the money will be advanced to the southern farmers, thus leaving the North Island out in the cold. Hence the antagonism. Personally, I think that, with proper safeguards, no Bill yet before the House has promised such beneficial results to the colony as this one, which reduces the burdens of the 'root of the colony's prosperity'—viz., 'the producer.'"

The friends of the honourable member for Waitemata have evidently given expression to the opinion that the whole of this money is to be lent in the South; but I can assure the House that it is to be fairly distributed by the Lending Board from one end of the colony to the other.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—What is the name of the writer of the letter?

Mr. WARD.—I do not think it is necessary to give the name.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I think that letter should be laid on the table.

Mr. WARD.—Probably the honourable member does not understand the rules of the House. Here is another letter from the same district:—

"I must congratulate you on the very statesmanlike measure you have brought forward, and I am sure if honourable members knew what a great boon it will be to a large number of settlers, who at present suffer under a heavy burden of interest paid to foreign capitalists, they would not offer the opposition they are doing to its safe passage."

Here is another letter, still from the same district: "Your cheap-money proposals meet with the general support of those who have usually been favourable to the Government; but they are bitterly opposed by those who have been usually opposed to the Government." In my opinion those three letters give a very fair index of what is going on in the northern portion of the colony. I have other letters from the same place almost to the same effect, but I do not propose to read them, as I have not time. Let me tell honourable members what the position is in the seven colonies in connection with the borrowing of money from 1871 to 1892, and then they will be able to judge what it is the Government are aiming at. The seven colonies borrowed no less than three hundred and forty millions during the period I have named. Half of that amount is represented by local and State loans—that is, £170,000,000. They paid away £106,250,000 in interest on public loans, and they sent away forty-seven and a quarter millions for investment elsewhere; therefore ninety-nine and a quarter millions of the earnings of the people were sent away to non-residents in twenty-two years. They imported three hundred and forty millions, and exported two hundred and fifty-three millions for interest and reinvestment. That is an indication of what has gone on in the seven colonies. I could point out to honourable members to what extent the diminished rates of interest proposed under this Bill would have reduced the total amount of interest sent out of the colonies, and by how much the colonies would have been richer in consequence if those rates had obtained in the past, but time does not permit me to do so. Let me now quote a Conservative authority, one which, I think, will reassure some honourable members who have shown great hostility to the proposals of the Government in this Bill. I am about to quote from the London Times, which is, I think, an authority that has a good deal of weight with some honourable members, and it may make the honourable member for Clutha seriously consider his position, and perhaps the honourable gentleman representing Waitemata will change his views after hearing this authority. I need hardly say that the Government are not in any way responsible for, nor have they inspired, articles appearing in the London Times. What does it say? It says,—

"Mr. Ward's cheap-money scheme will remove the chief obstacle to extreme settlement—the lack of capital. The Government, in venturing to borrow in the English market for the purpose, is leading the way more boldly than the other colonies. If the movement proves successful it will be of an importance which can hardly be exaggerated, not only to the colonies concerned but also to the rising generation of Great Britain. It seems, indeed, to carry with it something not far removed from the settlement of our most pressing social question. But, precisely because it is so important, it is necessary that it should be conducted with the utmost caution."

Now, Sir, I think the honourable member ought to be satisfied with that.

Mr. MASSEY.—Quite so.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman says, "Quite so." Yet does he assist us? Why upon every amendment that was moved in Committee the honourable gentleman voted against us.

Mr. MASSEY.—No.

Mr. WARD.—It was the same with some other country members. The honourable member for Clutha, for instance, opposed the Bill. Yet just now he referred to the fact that it was because it was intended to benefit the cities as well as the country settlers. What did my honourable friend do when various amendments were proposed for the benefit of the settlers? Why, Sir, the honourable member voted against the Government. Does that show the desire on his part, which he professes to have, to promote the interests of the country settlers? Those honourable members who have already opposed the Government in this important matter think that they may place themselves in a position of security wholly and solely because they profess to believe that it should be for the country alone. We found them, however, when it was a question of extending the assistance that was proposed for the country settlers with a view of promoting the producing interests of the country, voting against the amendments proposed in that direction. What did my honourable friend the member for Wellington Suburbs say just now? He said, "I am going to support the third reading of the Bill." What a lot we have to thank him for! Notwithstanding this, he opposed almost every amendment in Committee; on almost every division he voted against us. And after opposing it in all those divisions we find him now actually coming forward at the last moment and telling us he is going to support the third reading. It is most magnanimous on his part, and I hope the honourable gentleman does not usually support a Bill in this way. He votes against it at a critical time, and afterwards he supports the third reading. It is really "too much joy" altogether. I would here add that the Government have made the Bill as safe as possible. We have provided for an Assurance Fund, and for a Sinking Fund, and we have provided for a Board to be kept clear of political control for the purpose of administering this important matter in a right and proper manner. We have provided for a Board similar to that which has carried on so successfully the lending operations of the Government Insurance Department, and those of the Public Trust Offices. In the ordinary sense this is an entirely different system of borrowing from that usually carried on in the country. If any one tells me that the obtaining of cheap money for the settlers to increase their spending-power, and thereby to promote the productiveness of the country, is a thing that is going to prove damaging to the colony, and is merely increasing the amount of our borrowed money, I must say that that is not a right position to take up. How can the honourable member for Inangahua say that reducing the rate of interest in the country will not tend to increase wages? Will not the opportunity afforded the settlers of obtaining money at a cheap rate enable them to go in for improvements that they are now debarred from undertaking, and will not that be the means of giving employment to people who are now out of work? It is absolutely contrary to the experience of people who know anything of business to imagine that if a man is paying high interest for his money he can afford also to pay high wages. How can those engaged in industrial enterprises, or how can the settler in the country, if he has to pay exorbitant rates for his money, afford to give wages to his employes at a rate as high as he could afford to give if he had only to pay 5 per cent. for his money? While an attempt has been made to make a certain amount of political capital against the Government in connection with this matter, I repeat my firm conviction that no measure has ever been introduced in this

Mr. Ward

House which has been likely to do as much good for the colony as a whole as this scheme, if properly administered, for obtaining money at a cheap rate of interest for the people of the country. We depend to a large extent for our prosperity upon the success of our producers. The wealth of our cities to a large extent depends upon successful production in the country, and if we are going to do anything to aid the producing-power of the country we shall undeniably enable every one to do better. I would, in conclusion, express my surprise at finding some very intelligent members of this House, from whom I expected better things, giving expression to views utterly hostile to a proposal which, in my opinion, is calculated to be of considerable benefit to the whole colony.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I wish to make a personal explanation. The Colonial Treasurer stated that I had made the assertion that some £1,690,000 was all invested in Government stocks. I made no such statement. The statement I made on that occasion was that some £498,000 of the Government Insurance Fund was invested on mortgage, and the balance was invested in securities of various characters; but I did not say the whole funds were invested in Government stocks, but that they were chiefly in Government stock. The honourable gentleman was also wrong in saying that I voted against the Government on all measures referring to small settlers obtaining benefits. My votes were distinctly in the other direction. I voted for genuine but opposed spurious assistance.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman misrepresents me. I did not say that. I said that on every amendment favourable to settlers the honourable gentleman voted against them.

The House divided on the question, "That the Bill be now read a third time."

AYES, 36.

Buddo	Mackintosh	Seddon
Carncross	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Carnell	McGuire	Smith, G. J.
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Steward
Duncan	McNab	Tanner
Flatman	Meredith	Ward
Guinness	Mills	Willis
Hall	Morrison	Wilson.
Hall-Jones	Parata	Tellers.
Harris	Pirani	Hogg
Houston	Reeves	Pinkerton.
Kelly, W.

NOES, 11.

Earnshaw	Maasey	Stout.
Graham	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Heke	Montgomery	Kelly, J. W.
Lang	Saunders	O'Regan.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
Joyce	Button
Larnach	Bell
Lawry	Allan
McLachlan	Green

Newman	Buchanan
Pere	Te Ao
Russell, G. W.	Russell, W. R.

Majority for, 25.*

Bill read a third time.

The House adjourned at twenty minutes past one o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Tuesday, 2nd October, 1894.

First Readings—Third Reading—New Zealand Consols Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Government Advances to Settlers Bill, New Zealand Consols Bill.

THIRD READING.

Land for Settlements Bill.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, the object of this Bill is to encourage thrift, and to enable persons of small means to invest their moneys in safe securities. As honourable members are aware, there is in the Post-Office Savings-Bank an institution in which small amounts of this character can be safely invested, but, as honourable members also know, the amount on which interest can be paid cannot exceed £500, so that persons depositing money in the Post-Office Savings-Bank are confined to a sum not beyond £500, for beyond that amount interest is not paid, and therefore it is useless to deposit it. It may be said that probably it would be as well to extend the operation of the Post-Office Savings-Bank, with a view to enabling it to pay interest on larger sums than £500; but, Sir, the sums which are placed on deposit in that institution are deposited at call, and it would be impossible for any Government or institution, no matter how strong its finances might be, to bear the strain supposing there was a rush upon an establishment of that character. It has therefore been considered desirable to adopt something in the nature of what are known as British Consols for the purpose of enabling persons to deposit small or large sums, as the case may be, for the currency of the period limited in the Act, and on which interest at a price not exceeding 4 per cent. may be allowed. The object of the Bill is to enable the Treasurer to receive sums of money not exceeding in the whole £1,000,000, to be invested in the manner to be prescribed by this Act, and to be subject to the control not only of Parliament, but of the Controller-General, and to be placed to a separate account. Sir, I know there will be some difference of opinion upon a matter of this importance, which is new to the country; but I need scarcely point out that in doing this we are following the example of a country whose finances, probably, are not to be surpassed so far as soundness is concerned—we are following the example of the Mother-country in taking this step. Sir, the amount of Consols in that country exceeds, I think, £760,000,000 at the present day, and I undertake to say that no member of the Council, no matter how much he may disapprove of this Bill, will say for a single moment that the existence of Consols in Great Britain has disturbed the finances of that country; on the contrary, it has helped the finances of the country, and helped the finances in more ways than one. I need only refer to another example, and that is, what took place after the Franco-Prussian war, when the thrifty people of France found—what Prussia never expected they would find—the two milliards of francs that were wrung from France at the point of the bayonet. The people found the money because they were thrifty, and placed their money in the hands of the Government, for which they received a small rate of interest. Now, as I said, the object of this Bill is to enable the Treasurer to receive small sums or large sums, not exceeding one million in all, from the people of the colony. That is expressly provided for, to enable the people to place this money on safe investment, bearing interest on sums beyond the limit on which the Post-Office Savings-Bank would give them interest. The mode of inscription is very simple, as honourable members will see upon reading the Bill. There is a Registrar appointed, and the Registrar is to inscribe stock, if I may so call it. Any person wishing to inscribe his name, say, for £1,000 goes to this officer, pays his money, and gets his receipt; and if at any time afterwards he wishes to obtain a portion of that money for the purpose of converting it to some other use he also gets what is called a Consols certificate, and that bears interest also; and upon that being granted to him the original amount is reduced by the amount of the certificate; and any person holding that certificate can either retain it or get it also inscribed. The rest of the Bill is a piece of machinery for the purpose of carrying out the object referred to. I do not think further explanation is necessary, and move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Sir, I hope my honourable friend who brought down this Bill will not think I want to lecture the Council or himself if I oppose the Bill. I am not given to lecturing, and I should be very sorry to add the labour of listening to a lecture to the hard work my honourable friend says is his special heritage. However, I think this Bill is too important and serious a one not to be considered carefully. It is one concerning which every honourable member in this Council should ask himself whether it is required by the country, and whether it would be beneficial or injurious to the country. Now, it appears to me that in the very inception—in the naming of the Bill—there is a confusion of ideas. I do not understand why this particular loan should be called Consols any more than any other loan that is raised by the colony. I take it, Sir, that all our loans are secured upon the Consolidated Fund of the colony. The word "Consol" originated in the consolidation of the liabilities of the Crown, and of the securities which were offered to the lender in Pitt's time—a consolidation which was effected pari passu with the consolidation of the Customs revenue. Up to that time it had been the custom to pledge special items of revenue for special loans—a practice which was very inconvenient and led to great confusion. Why this million which is to be borrowed now should be specially called New Zealand Consols I cannot understand, and, as I said before, I am afraid it shows a certain amount of confusion of idea in the matter. My honourable friend spoke, on introducing the Bill, of its being the means of encouraging thrift among the people; and I find this extraordinary preamble to the Bill: "Whereas it is expedient to encourage thrift by affording the people of New Zealand facilities for the safe investment of their savings." Well, Sir, I never heard of a loan being proposed for the purpose of enabling the people to exercise thrift by lending money to the Government. My honourable friend says it is on the same footing as the great consolidated debt of the British Empire. Sir, it does not require any great consideration to remember how that debt accumulated, painfully, step by step, through the great necessity and the danger of the time when most of it was incurred. Certainly it was not incurred in order to encourage thrift among the people and to find an investment for them. I think his other illustration of the subject, when he spoke of the millions which the unfortunate French people had to pay after the Franco-Prussian war is quite as inappropriate, for I do not think the Prussians, when they levied upon France the two millions which had to be raised, had much idea of promoting thrift among the people of France. My honourable friend also spoke of the savings-banks, and pointed out that we had this machinery for encouraging thrift; and it is certain that State savings-banks are most beneficial institutions if kept within reasonable bounds. But he said that our State Savings-Bank did not go far enough, and that we required further means of encouraging thrift among the people. As it is at present, people can invest up to £500 in the Savings-Bank; and is it advisable to permit investments beyond £500 in the Savings-Bank? In the first place, I do not believe it would be a good thing for the people themselves, or for the country, that so much money that is wanted for legitimate enterprise should be locked up under Government control. I do not believe it is a proper thing for the State to have large sums locked up in such a way that there would not be any liquid money available to meet a run on the bank at any time. At this moment there are three millions deposited in the Post-Office Savings-Bank, the chief part of which is invested in Government securities. In England they limit the deposits in savings-banks to £150, while we limit them to £500. In France, where the limit of deposit is considerably less than in England, there has been a great deal of discussion on this matter, and M. Jules Simon, one of the most enlightened statesmen of France, has very forcibly pointed out the great danger that arises in France from allowing too large sums to be kept on deposit in the State savings-bank; and he has shown that if any great public calamity took place at any time, when it would be most necessary for the people to fall back on their deposits in the savings-bank, it might be most difficult for the State to meet the demands made upon it suddenly, and he strongly urged that there should be a smaller limit than at present. Well, I do not think depositors can complain of the limit in New Zealand, and I should like to point out that the State is in a far worse position for meeting any sudden run than the English Post Office would be, because there the Consols are a comparatively liquid security, and one upon which money can be always raised, whereas I very much doubt whether, if any great calamity suddenly befel this country and a great run took place here on the Savings-Bank, that institution, with all its resources, and with the State behind it, could meet at a moment's notice all demands. The mention by my honourable friend of the Savings-Bank led me to say this, because I think it is a very mistaken idea that it is for the benefit of the State that a very large sum of money should be locked up in deposits which can be operated on at the pleasure of the Government. That idea is founded on the belief that the State can spend the people's money better than people can do it themselves. That is a very great fallacy. It has always been held hitherto that the less dragged out of the pockets of the people, by taxation or otherwise, the better it is for the State; that it is better for the people to spend their money than to give it to the State to spend it for them. But now it appears we are to legislate with a view of finding investments for the people. I think that in itself is a great fallacy; and, further, I do not believe that this Bill will find investments for the people, for there is no provision in the Bill to prevent outsiders from coming in and investing in this colony. You offer 4 per cent., whereas you can raise the money in England at 3½ per cent.

Hon. Mr. Bowen

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Look at clause 3.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—I know clause 3. It reads as follows:—

"The Governor may from time to time, by Order in Council, authorise the Colonial Treasurer to receive, by way of deposit, from persons in the colony, such sum or sums as may be mentioned in such order, not exceeding in the whole one million pounds sterling, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding four pounds per centum per annum."

There is such a thing, however, as dealing through an agent, and I do not see any machinery in the Bill for preventing people outside, who wish to invest at 4 per cent. when they can only get 3½ per cent. in England on our bonds, from investing in this colony. If the money was really all found by people bona fide living in the colony, and who were settled here, it would be greatly to the detriment of the colony, especially at this time, that a million of money should be locked up in the hands of the Government which would otherwise have been devoted to improving the country and settling the people on the land—a process that is so much talked about at the present time. It is one of the complaints nowadays that the banks are reeking with money and refusing deposits. And why? Because the people have lost their confidence in what is going on. They are hampered in trade, in manufactures, in farming by harassing legislation; they are losing faith in wholesome enterprises and locking their money up in the banks. And now we are to ask them to lock up more money in deposits which are to be held by the colony. I cannot see any reason whatever for asking them to lend this money to the Government. Again, the Consols in England can be converted at any time; and if there is a change in the value of money, and the public credit grows stronger, the Government can convert or pay off Consols that are at too high a rate of interest, just as was done not long ago by Mr. Goschen, when the rate of 3 per cent. was reduced to 2½ and 2¼ per cent., decreasing automatically. Under this Bill, in a country where there are great fluctuations in the value of money, we are to borrow at a fixed rate for the long period of forty years; we shall have to pledge ourselves to pay 4 per cent. during that period. There is a great difference between Consols in England and what are called Consols here. It is said that this Bill is not borrowing. Well, it is not borrowing in the ordinary sense of the word. If it were stated straightforwardly that money was wanted for a certain purpose we could openly proclaim our object and borrow the money in the cheapest market. But this is indirect borrowing. It is accumulating funds which can be borrowed and used by Government without attracting public attention immediately. The money will be swallowed up in what has been termed the maelstrom of colonial finance, and we shall have to pay the highest price, because the lender will not know exactly where we have borrowed, how we have borrowed, or what we have borrowed before. It may be thought that this will not influence our credit in London, because it is not borrowing by a loan in the open London market. But does any one seriously suppose that London—that is, the London that lends money to the colonies—will not know what we are doing? Those who are going to invest their money will know all about it, and we shall hear a great deal about it very quickly if these so-called Consols are not put upon the market like any ordinary loan. It is also said that this money may be used for Treasury bills and deficiency bills in the same manner as Savings-Bank money is used; but, if it is, will not these facilities for getting money lead to further borrowing?

Surely it is always the case that the greater the facilities you give for borrowing, and for borrowing easily, the greater will be the extravagance in expenditure. That is always the case, both in private and public affairs. If this money is withdrawn from local enterprise, and employees in town and country are not to spend it, the “unemployed” difficulty will be largely increased, while the taxation of the country grows more burdensome every day. We are asked to sanction this Bill for the purpose of borrowing a large sum of money which is to be taken, possibly, out of the pockets of the people here, but more probably, I believe, out of the pockets of other people elsewhere—from whom we could have got the money at a less rate of interest by borrowing in the ordinary way—in order to spend it nobody knows how. And the only reason given for the measure by the Government is that it is to provide investments for the people. Sir, I think this is such a very novel procedure, and one so little expected or even dreamt of in any circle, social, financial, or political, that the colony ought to pause before plunging into such a career as suggested in this Bill without any reason given. I therefore move, That the Bill be read the second time this day six months.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—Sir, I should not like to see the amendment carried without a few words being said in favour of the Bill, although I am hardly prepared to deal with the question, as the Bill was only circulated last night, and I have not had time to study it. There are, however, one or two remarks that have fallen from the honourable member who has just sat down I must refer to. We are told that this is a Bill to borrow a million of money. Supposing that were so, which I do not admit, I say that under some circumstances it might be advisable that we should borrow a million of money. I do not know why we should be afraid to borrow money if it is required; but the point is, in what manner the money is to be invested or applied, and that is where the difficulty lies. If we are going to invest money through the Government so as to obtain a percentage over and above what we pay for it, then, I say, it is to our interest to borrow as much as we possibly can, because in so far as we succeed in making a profit on these investments we shall become the more prosperous. This is done every day in the mercantile world, and it is just exactly what promotes private enterprise and industry, and spurs a man on, and brings forth all his energy, and it is why many are enabled—by obtaining money at such a rate as will yield them a profitable return—to earn a competence for themselves, and in many instances a fortune. But is the borrowing of this million of money, supposing it to be borrowing, any more a borrowing transaction than borrowing the money that is deposited in the Government Savings-Bank? When money is deposited in that institution, it is never asked how that money is intended or is going to be invested; for when people place the money in the Savings-Bank they invest it because they have confidence in the Government, and they invest it because they get a percentage on their investment, and, so far as the person depositing the money is concerned, all matters affecting him end there. He takes little or no risk; the interest is guaranteed by the Government; and at the same time he gets a return for his money, and is satisfied that he has a good and safe investment. If, then, it is desirable that people should invest their money in the Post-Office Savings-Bank and get a percentage on that investment, what is the difference between so doing and investing money in Government Consols? The only difference is one of degree, and lies in the amount of deposits bearing interest, because in the Savings-Bank the amount is limited on which interest is paid, and in the other it is not so. There is little or no difference between the two classes of investments, and to call one borrowing and the other non-borrowing is what I really cannot understand. Then, we are told of the difficulty the State would experience in the event of a run taking place on a Savings-Bank, owing to the fact that it might not have sufficient liquid assets to meet the demands made upon it; but I would point out that the bank which is least likely to have a run upon it is a bank which is a Government institution, because, as I said on a previous occasion, the backbone of credit is confidence, and as long as people have confidence in the State—which is really having confidence in themselves—there is no likelihood of any run taking place upon any banking institution which is supported by the State. If it is wrong that money should be invested in these institutions because a run might take place upon them, what shall we say when the money is deposited in private institutions, which are not backed by Government? How are they going to meet a run? Can any one suppose for a moment that there is any bank here that could meet a run if it took place to-morrow—that is, a run upon the whole of its deposits at call and also its note-issue? Therefore in that respect the people are better off in having their money invested in Government Consols than in any private institution. The Hon. Mr. Bowen referred to the fact that under this Bill foreign capitalists might invest their money in the Consols. I agree with him there. I have looked through the Bill, and I find it would be possible through an agent for them to do so. But do we not frequently hear complaints that capital is being driven away from the colony by the Government?—and yet here we find the honourable gentleman complaining that capital is going to be attracted to the colony.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—At 4 per cent., when you can get it at 3½.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—Yes. Even supposing that is the case, we know that there is something like sixteen millions of money—I speak from memory—on deposit in the banking institutions of the colony, and, that being so, it is fair to assume that a proportion of these deposits will be transferred to the Consols, and, if a proportion of those deposits should be so transferred, I do not think we need trouble ourselves about a matter of ½ per cent. In course of time it may be that investors in the Consols will be solely confined to New Zealand, but I do not see, at the present time, how we can prevent foreign capital from coming into the country under this scheme, even at 4 per cent. Then, we are told that the banks in the colony are overflowing with money, and that this is because the people in the colony have lost confidence in it. I would ask the honourable gentleman, when I state the fact that gold is accumulating in the Bank of England at the present time to a greater extent than at any time during the present century, if that is a sign that the people of England have lost confidence in that country. Then, we are again told that it is our legislation that is causing a want of confidence in the country, and that such legislation is the cause of the depression that exists; but the honourable gentleman does not seem to see that the depression is world-wide, and that the want of confidence is world-wide, and that consequently it is unfair to put down to any matter of local legislation a state of affairs that is almost universal. I have on a previous occasion explained what I believe to be the cause of this depression, so that I need not again refer to it; but we cannot believe for a moment that a depression which is universal is on account of anything we may do in New Zealand. This is all I wish to say. I should have liked to have a little more time to properly study the Bill; but I trust, at any rate, that the amendment will not be carried, but that we shall have an opportunity of going through the Bill in Committee: and probably the debate that will take place in Committee may cause some honourable members to alter the opinions they at present hold in regard to it, and we shall find it placed on the statute-book.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down has told us that this is really borrowing a million of money, and he also said that if it was advisable to borrow money for some purpose—possibly a very much larger sum—that should be done. I quite agree with him; but in all cases, whether of public or private borrowing, the first thing to be considered is as to the manner in which the money is to be invested. No private or public body ever borrowed money unless they were certain beforehand as to how they were going to expend it; and nothing can be more reckless than this kind of borrowing. If any private person were to borrow money in this fashion he would very soon find himself landed in the Bankruptcy Court, and no person would think of borrowing money unless he had decided what return he was likely to get for the investment he had made. We all like to make advantageous investments, but under this Bill we are simply borrowing in a very indirect and expensive manner a million of money, which is to be placed in the hands of the Government apparently to play with. I will not use that word, because that was the case when the Bill originally was brought down. The expenditure of the money is now confined to a certain extent by clause 7; the money to be borrowed is to be paid into the Public Account, and is deposited under "The Public Revenues Act, 1891," which provides that no public money can be expended without being voted by Parliament or on a warrant of the Governor. It is, of course, a considerable check upon this money being used recklessly, but at the same time the fact remains that money is to be borrowed without our knowing how it is to be disposed of; and that appears to me to be a very dangerous kind of finance. To borrow money without saying how that money is to be expended, or why it is being borrowed, is, as I said before, borrowing in a very unbusinesslike fashion. Instead of going to the cheapest market and borrowing the necessary million at the cheapest possible rate—at, possibly, 3 per cent. or less—we go to borrow at 4 per cent.; and we know perfectly well that the money will really be raised in London, because a considerable amount of profit will accrue to those who have speculated in the matter, of course at the cost of the colony. Well, this seems to me an unbusinesslike proceeding. I can quite understand that it may be possible or advisable to borrow money, but to borrow in this extremely foolish manner does seem to be altogether unwise. The indirect effects of borrowing in this way are very difficult to arrive at. If the money is actually deposited in considerable sums by the people of this colony, it will possibly be to the injury of all kinds of enterprise, for all the money will be absorbed by the Government, and the expenditure will not ultimately be distributed in public works, and so on. Under this system of investment a considerable amount of financial difficulty will arise, and, if the money is to be borrowed, it will be borrowed at an extravagant rate, and practically in London, and we shall have to pay a higher rate of interest than we should have to pay if we went straight to the London market. I object altogether to this kind of borrowing as being very unbusinesslike in every way, both as regards the amount of interest and as regards the method. I think that to determine upon borrowing before the purpose for which the money is required has been defined is untenable. In all previous cases we have always said that the money is to be raised for some particular purpose—for the making of railways, et cetera—and appropriations are made in various forms for the money proposed to be borrowed; but for money to be borrowed without any specific appropriation being proposed is wrong. It seems to me to be a most important point, and chiefly on that ground I shall support the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Bowen. My own experience of Governments is that, whenever you have to put money in their hands, if you do not tie them up, they are pretty certain to waste it; and the experience of all legislation is that to keep a Government economical and thrifty you must keep them poor. The Bill is intended, according to the preamble, no doubt to encourage thrift amongst the people; but I should like to see a Bill which would encourage thrift in the Parliament and Government. What we want is, practically, a Bill to encourage thrift on the part of the Government rather than the people. I do not say this Government, but any Government. The people will be thrifty enough if only left alone. If left alone they will make their investments in the best possible way to obtain the best value or interest for it. We shall then soon have plenty of thrift; but if we constantly interfere, and allow the State to interfere, with the desires of the individual, and place this power in the hands of the Government, although, no doubt, it is with the best possible intentions, we shall diminish the thrift, the savings of the people, and we shall increase the extravagance of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Rigg

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—I wish merely to say one word. I conceive that these Consols will be a very convenient form of investment for trustees, executors, and people of that kind. These are obliged to carry out the principle of investing in Consols in England, and it has proved a very great protection to minors and persons holding trusts in the past. If it is intended, if there is any surplus from this expedient, to apply it to the repurchase of Treasury bills I think it would be a very good Bill indeed, except for one thing—that it would take an enormous quantity of money out of the industries of the colony. I very much doubt if there is a very great quantity of money belonging to New-Zealanders not invested. People may have some money in those teapots and stockings in the country. That may be so to some extent; but the probability is there is very much less there than people fancy. It was undoubtedly proved that the French people had put away money in that way, and when the French nation had to find money for the indemnity after the Franco-Prussian war it was quite wonderful how much money was found in the country. But there had been very many years through which the French nation had been accustomed to hoard up money, and they hid it because they had very little confidence in the joint-stock banks or anything else. In fact, the success of the first Imperial loans was entirely due to this: that the people trusted the Government and would not trust the banks. That feeling of insecurity existed all over France, and money was put away. I have seen exactly the same thing happen in the eastern part of Europe, where people would produce money that had been put away several hundred years before. But as far as the Consols here are concerned, assuming the Colonial Secretary has informed the House correctly, I think it is not a bad thing. I think it will be a good thing to allow persons who have money available an opportunity of investing it for a short time in an easily exchangeable form of Government security that may go from hand to hand. I have sufficient faith in the present Colonial Treasurer to believe that he does understand the matter. If this money is applied to the repurchase and withdrawal of a certain amount of Treasury bills—which, I am sorry to say, have come to an enormous amount at the present time; a sum which has a tendency year by year to increase, no matter what Government may be in power—I think the Bill is, in the main, a good Bill, or, at any rate, a measure quite worth trying. Another year we shall have an opportunity of seeing whether it is successful, or has had the effect, which I rather fear it will have, of withdrawing a great deal of the working money, which belongs to private individuals, from industrial use. Honourable gentlemen have not far to go to see how that operates. There is the Manawatu Railway: there is a very small portion of that railway capital which has been paid, or, at least, has been taken out of the pockets of the people, for most of the money is in debentures. Ever since that was started to the present day there has been the greatest desire on the part of the people to take their money out of it, although they are getting regular dividends, and the railway is said to be paying well. I think it will prove to be a little that way with the Consols. We shall find that no very great surplus exists in the pockets of the people or in teapots. I shall be glad to hear that it is otherwise, but I think it is not. However, I am quite willing to give the Bill a trial.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—This Bill, the last honourable gentleman said, was brought forward as an experiment. Now, the real essence of the Bill is borrowing, and the honourable gentleman who introduced the Bill has not shown us that borrowing is necessary. He has not indicated in any way that the Government require money, and until that is done it seems to me it is the duty of this Council not to pass legislation which is unnecessary, and which may lead to complications. Does the honourable gentleman say the Government require money?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—If the honourable gentleman is addressing me, I would ask him to give notice of the question.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—The Government apparently admit that they do not require money, and yet they want to borrow money now. I want to know why it is this money is required. I do not wish to use any offensive expression, but it seems to me this Bill is simply a subterfuge—that, under cover of giving facilities to the people to put their savings in Consols, the Government are really endeavouring to obtain power to raise a loan of a million. I say it is a mere subterfuge for borrowing, and nothing but borrowing. If there is one thing more than another which the working-classes in this colony have declared for some years past it is that the colony shall not borrow. That has been the universal cry; and at a meeting in Dunedin, at which I spoke, some time ago, there was a very emphatic protest entered by the people there against the idea of borrowing being entertained. There was a feeler put forward in certain quarters there that the Government should be asked to borrow, I think, either £2,000,000 or £3,000,000; but almost nine-tenths of those who were present—and it was a very full meeting—declared against borrowing, and would not have anything to do with it. And why? The persons who suffer from this borrowing in the end are the working-classes. The taxation ultimately goes, like water, to the lowest level. They are the persons who are suffering now; and if we had not so much money to pay for the money we have borrowed people who now have to pay taxation would be able to employ their surplus earnings in the development of the colony in a way that they cannot do at the present time. I do not understand this insatiable thirst which every Government indicates to get money by begging, borrowing, or stealing. It is simply, "Let us have money under any circumstances whatever, and let the future look after itself." I maintain there is a very healthy public opinion in the colony at the present time against borrowing, and I think it is a pity to impair or interfere with that public opinion. This Bill, as has been pointed out already, is professedly a Bill to raise money from persons in the colony; but I think honourable members will admit—in fact, every honourable member who has spoken so far has, I think, admitted—that this Bill does not accomplish that object. There is nothing whatever to prevent an English millionaire's coming here and taking up the whole of the loan if he can get it—this million of money—absolutely nothing; and the various attempts here are more assumed than real—the attempts to confine the loan to the colony. I perfectly admit, as the honourable and gallant gentleman who last spoke stated, that there are difficulties at times on the part of trustees and others who have trust moneys to secure a ready and safe mode of investment. But this Bill is apparently not brought forward in their interest, it is promoted practically in the interests of those with small savings, and there are other facilities at present for investing money of that kind in the hands of trustees. An Act was passed in 1891 the scope of which was that the power of investment on the part of trustees was very largely extended, and some of the difficulties which had been experienced in reference to investments by trustees were removed. For instance, formerly if a trustee paid money into a bank on deposit, and the bank came to grief, the trustee was personally liable for the loss. Now, in regard to any bank carrying on business under a statute of this colony—and I think all the banks have been either incorporated or sanctioned by Parliament—trustees can deposit money in them, and have there as high a rate of interest as, if not a higher rate than, is given by this Bill; so that the evil which existed some years ago was removed by legislation in 1891. My objection to this Bill is that it is borrowing and nothing but borrowing; and until the public has had an opportunity of pronouncing in favour of a borrowing policy I do not feel justified in supporting the Bill. I perfectly admit that at the present some of the banks have a plethora of money, arising from the absolute want of enterprise of a large number of the inhabitants of the colony. Instead of taking their money and entering into investments—that is to say, into enterprises in land, or manufactures, or business of various kinds—they prefer, rather than run the risk which the outlook seems to indicate, to deposit their money in the bank, so that, at all events, they will be sure to have the principal, though the income may not be so great. They wish to make certain of the principal when the time arrives. That, probably, is a temporary evil; I hope it is. But there is no question that enterprise is absolutely paralysed in this colony. At the present moment we are practically at a standstill, and it may be that a similar state of things exists in the other colonies—I dare say it does to a certain extent—but that is no reason whatever for it in this colony: at all events, there should be none. There is a want of confidence, no doubt, and that is the cause, to a great extent. But this Bill is bad in its conception; it is bad in its execution, for it in no way accomplishes the purpose which the Government have in view, and I shall therefore feel compelled to support the amendment of the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Sir G. S. Whitmore

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—Sir, there seems no inclination to continue the debate. I do not know if that is because the honourable gentleman who proposed the amendment and those who think with him wish to force a vote on the amendment. I do not think that would be the wisest course. I think that this measure brought down by the Government deserves a greater amount of consideration at the hands of the Council. Therefore I propose saying a few words upon the matter. The last speaker's sole objection to the Bill was that it was a borrowing Bill, and he is opposed to borrowing.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—They do not require money.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—That is not so. The honourable gentleman made a good attempt to draw the Colonial Secretary by asking him to reply to a question; but the Colonial Secretary is of the same profession as the honourable gentleman who asked the question, and probably is as clever in refusing to answer a question when it does not suit him to answer it as the honourable gentleman is clever in asking it. I think that the Bill, as far as I can see, is a fair and reasonable measure—that is, if the position as stated by the Colonial Secretary and by other members of the Government in another place is correct—namely, that they find there is a great deal of money in the Colony of New Zealand waiting for investment. They find, from their experience of the Post-Office Savings-Bank, that a great deal of money is placed there, even though they can give no interest upon it. I think that fact is admitted.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Am I to understand the honourable gentleman to say that more money is put into the Savings-Bank than the Government can pay interest upon?

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—Than the Government are allowed to pay interest upon.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—I think you will find you are mistaken.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—I am perfectly sure I am correct in making that statement. The Government pay interest only on sums up to £500, and frequently there are larger sums of money deposited, though the depositors can only receive interest upon sums up to £500. That is a fact. If that is so, the Government themselves are proposing, by this Bill, to offer facilities to persons with plenty of money and who are desirous of a safe investment for their surplus money. That is the object of the Bill so far as I can read it. It is a permissive measure, for it is not compulsory on any person to buy the Consols or to take them up. From the tenor of the remarks made by several honourable gentlemen who have spoken, it appears that they have the impression that the money will be found, and the anticipations of the Government realised.

An Hon. MEMBER.—From outside.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—It does not follow that it will be from outside at all. An honourable member has reminded me just now that it is intended by this Bill to encourage thrift. Manifestly the intention of the Government is to afford facilities to thrifty persons who have money to buy these Consols. The Hon. Mr. Pharazyn remarked that we are going to give 4 per cent. for the money, and that the money could be obtained in London probably for 3½ per cent. I do not think there is anything in this Bill which justifies the honourable member's saying that. The clause says, "an amount of interest at a rate not exceeding four per centum." It does not follow at all that the Treasurer is going to give 4 per cent. He is going to give the market value of the money, and it may be 3½ per cent.

An Hon. MEMBER.—In New Zealand?

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—In New Zealand. He will probably get his money for 3½ per cent., and he could not get the money anywhere else cheaper than 3½ per cent. Therefore I say the assumption that the Treasurer is going to give 4 per cent. is not a fair one. The Bill contains nothing to justify that. It says "not exceeding four per centum." There is another thing regarding these investments. The Bill says that the Treasurer may issue them for any number of years not exceeding forty years. There is nothing to prevent the Treasurer from issuing the Consols for five, seven, or twenty-one years, or any number of years less than forty years. Will any honourable member say that persons who have money, and who care to invest it for a term of twenty-one years at 4 per cent. are not acting wisely in doing so? It will be a good means for investing the money in trust estates. I believe the Government will find they will have a great deal of these Consols taken up by trustees. I do not anticipate that they will have a million subscribed, but I anticipate that they will have a large sum of money offered upon the terms mentioned in the Bill. Now as to the objection as to borrowing, and not so much to borrowing, as I understand the Hon. Mr. Stewart, as to the fact that there is nothing stated as to what the Government are going to do with the money when they get it. That seems to be a great objection. The Hon. Mr. Pharazyn raised that objection. He says it is customary, when money is borrowed by the colony, that the purport for which the money is borrowed should be stated. That is so, under ordinary circumstances. Now, I ask the honourable gentleman if, when money is placed in the Post-Office Savings-Bank, the depositors turn to the Government and ask, "What are you going to do with it?" Of course they do not ask such a question. And yet the Post-Office Savings-Bank investments and the Consols are exactly alike. This Bill provides that the money shall be invested in the same way as provided by the Public Revenues Act of 1891; and the Public Revenues Act of 1891, in clause 77, deals with the way in which deposits in the Savings-Bank shall be treated. The Government, I believe, will be quite justified in using some of the money that they get under this measure for advances to the local bodies. There is nothing to prevent their doing that, and it would be a very good way of using the money. They would have security for the money advanced to local bodies, and I believe it would be wise if the Government would spend money in that way. The Hon. Mr. Bowen feared that if the Government got this money so easily they would spend it easily—that money easily got is very frequently easily spent. I do not think that is a question affecting this Bill at all. That is a matter of opinion—the opinion entertained by the honourable member concerning the Government, the question of whether the Government is a bad or a good one.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No; all Governments.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—All Governments? If you think that, then the honourable member would equally oppose the lending of money to any Government, and as money must be lent to Governments, as Governments must get money to carry on the work of the country, then I do not see why this Government should be singled out as likely to be more extravagant than any Government which has preceded it or is likely to succeed it. No doubt honourable members will admit that money must be had for the government of the country,—for administration and other services. Do honourable gentlemen think that from the surplus revenue, we will say, the Government of this colony are in a position to carry out the demands of the colonists in the direction, say, of settlement—in roading and bridging, and in other directions, all adding to the capital of the country?

An Hon. MEMBER.—That is another Act.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—That is quite true; there is another Bill dealing with land improvements: but I am speaking of the main question of borrowing, to which the Hon. Mr. Stewart and others have referred this afternoon. In their eyes this is borrowing. I admit that this Bill means borrowing, or having money lent upon special terms, and for use in special directions: these directions I have already referred to. I do not see any reason why, in a general sense, borrowing should not take place. The colony cannot carry on public works without borrowing, and I think all the objections that have been raised against the Bill because of borrowing do not carry weight. In my opinion, the money is safeguarded. The Government cannot deal with it in an arbitrary manner; they cannot spend it foolishly; they can only use it in certain directions, and those directions are laid down in the Public Revenues Act of 1891; and, if there is surplus money in the colony, I think the Government are justified in bringing in a measure which will offer facilities to persons having the money to invest to do so on what may be considered good security; therefore I propose supporting this measure.

Hon. Mr. McCullough

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I understand this is a Bill to encourage thrift, and we are informed that the Government are under the impression that there are vast stores of money somewhere or other in the colony—in stockings or other receptacles, possibly in dens and caves of the earth. Sir, I am not aware of the existence of these large funds. I believe that their existence is a fiction—that is to say, their existence in the hands of these persons who are intended to be covered by the Bill. That there are large funds in banks which are held there temporarily waiting a chance of more profitable investment than can be got at the present time is highly probable; but to suppose that there is any large sum of money in the hands of the settlers of this country is, I am perfectly convinced, an utter delusion. Sir, let me say that I wish it were the case that money was so held. That is precisely the sort of thing which, above all others, is the best for any nation, and the one which, I regret to say, does not exist, and under probable conditions is a state of things which we on this side of the globe are about as far from as is possible. Sir, it appears to me one of the most important points has been missed in this discussion, and that is: Supposing the stores of money were there, would they be invested at the rate of interest offered? Certainly they would not. I cannot understand how any one—I heard my honourable friend who has just spoken deliver his speech—how any one can possibly be possessed of the amount of faith my honourable friend enjoys. Sir, I would give many years to be blessed with such an amount of faith as my honourable friend. He believes not only in the existence of the money, but that the people are going to lend it to the Government at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., subject to deductions by way of income-tax—a point which my honourable friend did not appear to see, but which I think the lender of the money would very soon discover. We are told also it has been suggested that the trustees are likely to make use of this. Well, if the money were at short dates—if the money were in bonds, not issued for more than a year, or some other short period—I could quite understand some of it would be taken up by individuals who might be trustees or otherwise. But I am not at all sure that the people who represent foreign insurance companies may not, to some extent, avail themselves of the Consols, as proposed, because it appears that they are to be taken by the throat and made to stand and deliver to a considerable extent. They must invest their funds to a large amount in the colony, and it is quite possible they may avail themselves of this as a means of getting a certain amount of interest on the sums they must deposit; but the idea that it is going to be made use of by others and by trustees appears to me to be an entire delusion. Look, for instance, at the position of a trustee who would invest money for forty years in New Zealand Government Consols at $3\frac{1}{2}$ or even 4 per cent. I should think the beneficiary, when he attained his majority, would immediately set in motion against the trustee an institution known as the Supreme Court, for having made an exceedingly bad use of the money during the term of his minority. I know that is exactly what I should attempt to do were I the beneficiary. But the most extraordinary proposition in the Bill is this: that it is to be taken in conjunction with another measure before the Legislature which we had the honour of receiving from the other Chamber this afternoon—I mean the cheap-money scheme. Let us read the two together, as to their titles, and we actually find that it is proposed to borrow money from the people of this country and then to go and lend it to some other people in this country. Does it not strike every one that it would be much simpler to let them keep their money and lend it to the others, instead of turning the Government into a collecting institution, getting all the funds that may be available, and then lending it to people who could just as well borrow it from the owners themselves? Yet that is exactly the proposition placed before the country in the form of these Bills, and it is mainly in consequence of the utter absurdity of the proposal that I feel constrained to vote for the amendment of my honourable friend; because, otherwise, the Bill appears to me to be of so singularly inefficient a character that I believe it would have no effect whatever, except for the purpose of enabling the insurance companies to make some use of it. Sir, I trust there will be a time when some change may take place in the views which are held about this sort of thing, and when experience may possibly prevail; but this is a new finance, and when you have such a grotesque transaction as the one now before us, all I can say is that I am afraid, instead of the people in London, as suggested, taking alarm at our proceedings, they will be filled with what is known as inextinguishable laughter. With these few remarks, I shall, under the circumstances, vote against the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—Sir, what has struck me in listening to this discussion is that if the arguments of the Attorney-General, who introduced the Bill, and the arguments adduced by the other honourable members who have supported it, are the strongest arguments that can be used in support of the measure, then it must be a very peculiar measure indeed. Now as to the arguments that the Attorney-General used. If we refer to the preamble of the Bill we learn that it is an imitation of the English system of Consols, which, as has been pointed out, is no argument in favour of it at all, because the two systems are so entirely different that there is no similarity between them; not even is there analogy. The preamble of this Bill describes its object as being the investment of savings by the creation of New-Zealand-inscribed Consols, or rather this is the short title. The preamble describes the object to be the encouraging of thrift by affording to the people of New Zealand facilities for the safe investment of their savings. That, Sir, is another name for simply a proposal to borrow. It is neither more nor less than borrowing under false pretences; and it seems to me that the Bill is in no sense a Bill for the purpose of encouraging thrift, and I am quite sure it will not have that effect. From the arguments that have been used, a more appropriate title, it seems to me, would have been "An Act to provide Investments for Well-to-do People." One of the strongest arguments used in favour of the Bill was advanced by Sir George Whitmore, who stated that it will afford a more convenient investment for trustees and others. Now, that is certainly not the professed object of the Bill: in fact, it is entirely inconsistent with the object of it. The object, we were told, is to encourage people in thrift, and it cannot be said that to provide a safe investment for trustees has anything whatever to do with the encouragement of thrift. If the real object of the Bill is what it professes to be, the answer to that is simply that the Post-Office Savings-Bank affords all necessary facilities for the encouragement of thrift, and provides a safe investment for small savings. There is, no doubt, a great difference between the provisions under the Post-Office Savings-Bank Act and this Bill, and there is probably, as explained by the Attorney-General, sufficient to account for the difference. In reference to this proposal, moneys deposited in the Post-Office Savings-Bank are, as we know, held at call; and there is this difference also: that on money deposited in the Savings-Bank the interest may be varied, but under this scheme of Consols it cannot be varied. It would seem a very peculiar way of encouraging thrift. Supposing Consols were issued for, say, twenty, or thirty, or even forty years at 4 per cent., the rate of interest cannot be reduced; and that strikes me as most peculiar, and an unlikely way of encouraging thrift. Supposing a trustee wants to find a safe investment, and he is receiving interest at 4 per cent., his investment is secured for forty years, while thrifty people who are anxious to make small savings, and who can only make small deposits, would not receive perhaps more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ or $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. A remarkable feature in the money-market at the present time is the extraordinarily low rate of interest prevailing, or to which interest is tending. We have heard lately, on the most authentic authority, that the amount of money in London seeking investment is something altogether unprecedented, and that the rate of interest there at the present time is lower than it has ever been. It is also almost certain that before many years have passed, under the circumstances in which New Zealand is placed, if the Consols under this Bill were issued for forty years, before those forty years were up the rate of interest would be very much lower. It has been pointed out that the rate of interest proposed to be offered under this Bill would not necessarily be 4 per cent., but I am quite certain that at present in New Zealand the Colonial Treasurer would not receive very much money under this scheme except for special purposes, such as that suggested by the Hon. Mr. Stevens. There are a few insurance companies that will probably be compelled to deposit money, but at the present moment in New Zealand they could not deposit it at a less rate than 4 per cent., and the result would be that we should be raising money at a higher rate than it could be obtained at in England. The Hon. Mr. McCullough has told us quite correctly that the rate of interest under this Bill would not necessarily be 4 per cent.; but the Bill professes in its preamble to be one for the benefit of the people of New Zealand by affording them facilities for the investment of money. If the Bill is to have any effect at all, then it is quite certain that the rate of 4 per cent. is the very lowest rate of interest which could be fixed at present, and the result would be that we should then be borrowing money at a higher rate than we could get it at if we were borrowing in the open market. It is admitted even by those honourable members who have supported the Bill that it is a borrowing Bill. No one can deny that, and if we have to borrow money it is the duty of the Government to say so, and to obtain it at the cheapest price. Therefore the proper statesmanlike course for the Government to have adopted would have been simply to have said, "The Colony requires to borrow a million of money, and the proper way to raise it is to raise it in the London market, where we can get it cheapest." But to raise the money under this Bill in the colony at present would be simply making a present of at least $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to the English creditor. That is what it would come to, because, no doubt, although the Bill professes that it is intended to be limited to New Zealand, it cannot be so limited, for it contains at present no provision by which its operation can be restricted to the colony, and I cannot conceive any provision that would have the effect of absolutely restricting the lending to the people of New Zealand. That being so, it comes to neither more nor less than a proposal simply to borrow money, and so borrow it needlessly at the high rate of 4 per cent.; and, in practice, although it is intended for the people of New Zealand, in point of fact we shall be giving away the greater portion of it to the English investor, and we shall pay $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more than we should pay if we had given it to him direct. As to the arguments that have been used in favour of the Bill, it has been said that it is a right and proper thing for the Government to enter upon this line of business; but, if it is the proper thing for a Government to borrow money from the people of New Zealand, in order to make a profit by lending it out to other people in New Zealand, that strikes me as a very peculiar proposition. There are many capitalists borrowing money in New Zealand, and lending it out at a profit; and, if the present owners of the money can lend it to the same advantage, it would be in every way better that the transaction should be carried on between the private lenders and borrowers than that it should be carried out by the Government. The Bill, however, does not profess to be one for the purpose of making a profit out of the investing of money, but it professes to be a Bill for the encouragement of thrift. I do not think that it is a wise thing for the Government to enter upon a money-lending business merely for the sake of making a profit, in the first place, and I do not conceive it to be possible that the Government can invest money and make a profit. That would not be a proper thing for the Government to do, and it is not the object of the Bill, which is really something entirely different. It is simply to raise money; and here I must say that there is another very bad point about the Bill which distinguishes it from former borrowing Bills—a point referred to by previous speakers. There is no indication and no appropriation as to how the money is to be applied. The Bill is admittedly a borrowing Bill, and yet, if it becomes law, it does not say how this money is to be applied. Either of these objections should be sufficient to condemn it, and, to my mind, either is sufficient. As to the argument used by the Hon. the Attorney-General in introducing the Bill, with regard to the Post-Office Savings-Bank, the honourable gentleman said the Bill was necessary because of the restrictions as to the terms on which money could be received on deposit in the Savings-Bank, and also because the moneys deposited there are held at call. These are, no doubt, two very important points. But the Hon. Mr. Bowen pointed out that it is a very risky thing for any Government to hold even such large sums as £500 at call, and therefore the argument of the Attorney-General as to the Savings-Bank is entirely futile. The Post-Office Savings-Bank is a perfectly legitimate thing, and occupies a necessary place in the community. It is an institution which is intended to enable people to invest small savings, and which is designed to encourage thrift; but this proposal is nothing of the kind, and it has not really the object it professes to have. Another great fault I have to find with the Bill is that it is entirely different from what it professes to be. What its real object is I am not going to say. We know that on a former occasion a former Colonial Treasurer introduced a New Zealand Consols Bill, or a New-Zealand-inscribed Stock Bill. I refer to the Consols Bill introduced by the late Sir Harry Atkinson in 1882. Now, that Bill was described as a New-Zealand-inscribed

Hon. Mr. MacGregor

Stock Bill, and it was what it professed to be. It was simply a borrowing Bill, and the purpose for which that money was borrowed was declared—namely, the prosecution of public works. It would be infinitely better, if this money is intended to be used for the purchase of land for settlements, for the improvement of lands for settlement, or for the acquisition of Native lands, that it should be stated; and, if it is necessary to borrow money in addition to the millions to be borrowed under the provisions of the Bills introduced for those purposes, it would have been very much better if it had been stated. It is not a Bill in any sense for the encouragement of thrift, but it is one simply for the raising of money. It would not have the effect of encouraging thrift, but it would be used as a means for English speculators and English investors to rob the colony of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That is the difference between the rate at which the money is proposed to be borrowed, and the rate at which it could be legitimately borrowed. For these reasons, I consider that the Bill is not called for, and that it would be pernicious in its operation; and therefore I intend to vote for the amendment.

Debate adjourned.

The Council adjourned at ten minutes to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, 2nd October, 1894.

Third Reading—Insurance Companies—North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan—Mines Statement—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill—New Plymouth Harbour—Bank of New Zealand—Waitekauri Telephone—Te Aute College—Bank of New Zealand—New Zealand Loan and Mercantile Agency Company—Local Rating—Local Bodies—“Thirds” and “Fourths”—Old-age Pensions—Bush-burning—Cheviot Schools—Otara Block—Acetic Acid—Duke and Duchess of York’s Visit—“Arab” and “Shah” Teas—Flax—North Island Trunk Railway—Old Soldiers’ Pensions—Wanganui Prisoners—Syrian Hawkers—Caversham Telephone—Colonial Bank—Bank of New Zealand—E. S. W. Butler—Bank of New Zealand Globo Assets—Guaranteed Banks Amalgamation Prohibition—Adjournment—Native Land Court Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THIRD READING.

Foreign Insurance Companies’ Deposits Bill.

INSURANCE COMPANIES.

On the motion of Mr. MILLAR, it was ordered, That a return be laid before this House showing—(1) The number of insurance companies trading in the colony, and their names; (2) the date upon which they commenced business; (3) the amount of money invested by each company in this colony in (a) Government securities, (b) freehold and leasehold lands, and (c) mortgages.

NORTH ISLAND MAIN TRUNK RAILWAY LOAN.

On the motion of Mr. MITCHELSON, it was ordered, That a return be laid before this House showing the amounts that have been taken from the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan for the following purposes—namely: (1) Purchase of Native land, (2) construction of roads and bridges, (3) surveys, (4) snagging and clearing the Wanganui River, and (5) postal subsidies.

MINES STATEMENT.

(For tables referred to in the Statement, see Appendix C.-2.)

The following Statement by the Minister of Mines (Mr. Cadman) was laid on the table:—

Mr. Speaker, — In preparing a Statement on the mining industry of the colony I find myself limited to localities and matter trodden over and dealt with by other Ministers during the past ten years, thus affording one very little latitude for original remarks. The industry may be said to be confined to gold and coal, for, although there are a variety of other metalliferous and mineral ores in the colony, very little attention has as yet been directed towards their development, and, in all probability, so long as gold and coal continue to be worked remuneratively, we need not look for rapid strides in other branches of mining. The reason for this is obvious. Gold is found in the ore in a metallic state, and, although it occurs in many instances in combination with other metals—making its extraction of a somewhat complex nature—yet those persons at present engaged in mining pursuits in the colony are better acquainted with the methods of extracting gold and silver from ores than they are with the mode of dealing with any other metals. Hence the difficulty in getting people to devote either their labour or capital to the opening-up of other mines.

The improvements in machinery and appliances for the reduction and treatment of auriferous and argentiferous ores have done a great deal towards making lower-grade ores pay for working. The introduction of the Cassel process, by which the gold and silver in the pulverised ore is leached out, and a far larger percentage of the assay-value obtained than hitherto got by any other method, was last year the means of making some of the mining companies in the North Island remunerative ventures; whereas without this process the operations would have been carried on at a loss. The Cassel process is, however, far from perfect, as it will give only an average result of about 85 per cent. of the assay-value of the gold in the ore, and about 50 per cent. of the silver. The loss therefore of the precious metals is still very considerable. This loss varies in proportion to the character of the ore: when it contains argillaceous material forming a great deal of slimes no method has yet been adopted whereby the cyanide of gold and silver can be completely washed out. The slimes absorb the cyanide, but after being for some time in the vats it seems to set closely together and form impervious bands, through which the solution cannot be filtered. For the reason stated, the process has not as yet proved a success in treating the tailings in the Middle Island, but it is expected that the difficulty will soon be overcome.

As showing the value of the Cassel process, I would mention that the Cassel Company purchased the tailings belonging to the Waihi Company, which had been stacked from the time that crushing operations were commenced up to November last, for £5,000; and, from the beginning of the present year up to the 23rd of August, bullion to the value of £11,369 has been recovered.

I may also be permitted to remark that the improvements in hydraulic and dredging appliances enable ground to be worked remuneratively that a few years ago could not be operated upon except at a loss. There is still plenty of scope for the extension of hydraulic sluicing; but, in order that a much larger number of men could be employed in this branch of mining, it would require a conservation of the water in numerous available streams and rivers, which can readily be brought to command localities where auriferous drifts are known to exist. The whole of the water-rights, however—the streams which are easily brought to command the ground—are held by private parties, who in many instances do not utilise one-half of the water for which they hold rights. Some of the water-races are not of sufficient capacity to convey the number of sluice-heads for which the rights are granted, and in most cases the water is used only from eight to twelve hours a day, it being allowed to run to waste for the remainder of the time. In many instances this waste could not be prevented, as the topographical character of the country is not suitable for the construction of storage reservoirs; but there are many places where these could be constructed, and the spare water conserved.

The utilisation of water as a motive-power to work mining and other plants also deserves consideration. There are a number of rapid rivers which could not be diverted at a reasonable cost to command the auriferous drifts, but which, in many instances, especially on the west coast of the Middle Island and in Otago, could be easily utilised to generate electricity, which can now be transmitted for long distances with very little loss. In some places even large pumping-plants might be used with success to raise water for hydraulic sluicing, where the motive-power would cost nothing beyond the necessary expenditure on machinery and appliances for lifting the water. There are large areas of country, which could be made remunerative for working by hydraulic sluicing were water available, which are not suitable for either agricultural or pastoral purposes, but nevertheless could be utilised so as to afford employment to a large number of men for many years.

Assistance to the gold-mining industry has always been subject to the whim of the Minister or Ministers of the day, the result being that help has been rendered spasmodically in accordance with the political pressure generally from goldfield members. What is required is the establishment of a definite fund whereby reasonable amounts will be periodically raised, and to which may be added any sum Parliament may consider advisable. In very few instances will any company venture to test deep levels without assistance, with the certainty that such assistance will be given on some definite basis to be agreed on before the work proceeds, and that any balance of an unexpended vote at the end of any financial year will be again revoted.

MINERAL PRODUCTION.

On reference to Table No. 1, annexed, it will be found that the quantity and value of gold and silver produced for the year ending the 31st December, 1893, was 239,887oz., of the value of £922,881; while 700,603 tons of other minerals (including 8,317 tons of kauri-gum), of the total value of £899,793, were also produced for the same period; as against 280,132oz. of gold and silver, of the value of £958,740, and 687,295 tons of other minerals (including kauri-gum), of a value of £907,566 produced for the previous year.

The details of the quantities and values of the different minerals exported for the year are as follow: Gold—226,811oz., value £913,138; silver—63,076oz., value £9,743; antimony-ore—331 tons, value £3,467; manganese-ore—319 tons, value £943; mixed minerals—37 tons, value £650; coal—69,136 tons, value £72,699; coke—51 tons, value £53; kauri-gum—8,317 tons, value £510,775; while the coal produced and consumed in the colony amounted to 622,412 tons, valued at £311,206: making a total value of all minerals of £1,822,674.

The value of gold and silver produced up to the end of 1893 was £49,454,886; and the values of other minerals and metalliferous ores, including kauri-gum, are as follow: Copper, £17,866; chrome, £37,367; antimony, £49,507; manganese, £56,107; hæmatite, £226; mixed minerals, £70,322; kauri-gum, £6,860,196; coal exported, £659,882; coke exported, £23,643; the value of coal raised and consumed in the colony being £3,842,408: making a total value of £61,072,410.

I may here mention that the quantity of foreign coal imported for the year ending the 31st December, 1893, was 117,444 tons, of the value of £111,956: of this, 6,026 tons, of the value of £6,460, was, however, again sent out of the colony.

GOLD-MINING.

The gold-mining industry has done more than any other towards the settlement of the colony. When we look back at the small number of inhabitants in New Zealand before the discovery of gold, we must admit that the present population is due to the great influx of people in the early days of the goldfields. Although the number of persons now employed in gold-mining is small compared with what it was when the Dunstan, Shotover, and West

Mr. Cadman

Coast diggings broke out, there are still about sixty thousand people supported by this industry, which even at the present time forms an important factor in the prosperity of the colony. Thousands of acres of land have been put into cultivation which, but for the large population the discovery of gold brought to our shores,—giving the bonâ fide agriculturist a local market for his produce,—would in all probability still be in its natural state; either covered with bush and fern, or devoted only to the pasturage of a few sheep and cattle.

Gold-mining, like all other industries, is rapidly being brought to a science. The happy-go-lucky method of working hitherto pursued, by sinking here, there, and everywhere without a defined plan, is fast dying away. Men are getting a better knowledge of mineral and metalliferous ores, and the formations in which to look for them. The improvements in machinery and appliances admit of ground being worked far more cheaply than formerly; but, notwithstanding this, gold-mining is becoming more difficult as year after year passes by.

The auriferous lodes, where rich patches of gold were found in the past, are getting worked out on the upper levels; and deep-sinking in many places, with a large influx of water to contend with, has to be undertaken in order to follow the lodes down. This, together with requiring men of skill and ability to carry on the operations to a successful issue, adds considerably to the cost of working.

In alluvial mining the greatest labour-saving appliance that can be used is a large supply of water at a high elevation above the ground proposed to be worked; but this requires a considerable outlay in the construction of water-races, tail-races, and hydraulic plant. The working miner of to-day is very differently situated from the miner of former years. He now requires not only to give a large amount of labour, but he must have a considerable sum of money at command, to enable him to go into the undertaking. The wages of the miner are much less than formerly, and now many of them, having large families to support, cannot afford to lay by sufficient money to enable them to undertake operations on a large scale. To bring a mining venture to a payable stage, capital and labour require to go hand in hand, and every encouragement and facility should be afforded the miner to get our mineral wealth developed. The field for gold-mining operations to be carried on should be extended to the utmost possible limit, as this industry will afford employment to the working-classes, and have a much greater tendency towards solving the question of the "unemployed" than any other. Even on the old-established goldfields men can always earn a livelihood, though they may not be able to make the ordinary rates of wages. It is intended to give better facilities by granting a good tenure to land on goldfields, so that the miners can build comfortable homes and have a sufficient area on which they can grow their own vegetables and keep a cow or two, thus enabling them to maintain their families and reduce the cost of living to a minimum.

The yield of gold for the year ending the 31st March last (Table No. 2) shows an increase over the previous year of 12,043oz., representing a value of £52,753. The total yield last year, according to the Customs returns of the quantity entered for exportation—not including the gold manufactured into jewellery, &c., in the colony—was 247,702oz., representing a value of £970,220; while the yield for the former year amounted to 228,659oz., having a value of £917,467. The increased yield last year came from the Auckland and Otago Districts, being 11,374oz. and 4,781oz. respectively; while the Marlborough District showed a decrease in the yield over the former year of 793oz., Nelson 613oz., and the West Coast 2,706oz.: making the total increase in the North Island and Otago 16,155oz., and the total decrease in the other districts 4,112oz. Of the gold produced last year, the Auckland District contributed 52,426oz., or 21·78 per cent. of the total yield; Marlborough and Nelson, 4,441oz., or 1·84 per cent.; the West Coast, 98,930oz., or 41·10 per cent.; and Otago, 84,905oz., or 35·28 per cent.

Earnings of the Gold-miners.

The only way this can be arrived at is by taking the returns furnished to the department by the various Wardens of gold-mining districts of the number of miners actually employed in claims on the goldfields, and the quantity of gold entered for exportation, according to the Customs returns. This does not, however, represent the whole of the gold, as there is a certain quantity manufactured in the colony each year, and parcels are, no doubt, taken away by Chinese and others leaving the colony which do not go through the Customs. On the other hand, there are a number of men employed by the miners in getting blocks and sawn timber for mining, who are not included in the return of miners employed in claims. These may, I think, be fairly taken into account, as against the extra amount of gold obtained over the quantity shown for exportation in the Customs returns.

The total number of miners employed last year was 11,553, as against 12,197 for the previous year, showing a decrease in the number last year of 544. This decrease is principally in the Otago District. Taking the number last year, and the value of gold obtained—namely, £970,220—the average earnings of the miners are equal to about £83 19s. 7d. per annum, while their average earnings for the former year amounted to £75 4s. 5d. This shows an increase of £8 15s. 2d. over the average earnings for the former year. Taking the different districts, with the number of miners employed in each, and the value of the gold obtained, the average earnings in each locality would be as follow: Auckland, £161 13s. 7d.; Marlborough, £36 5s. 10d.; Nelson, £38 8s.; West Coast, £75 7s. 3d.; and Otago, £75 18s. 11d. a man per annum.

The average earnings in some districts are—small, but many of the miners employ a portion of their time in other pursuits.

QUARTZ-WORKINGS.

The returns furnished by the proprietors of crushing-mills, which will be found in detail in pages 33 to 85 of the Inspecting Engineer's Report on the Goldfields, will show honourable members that this branch of gold-mining is steadily progressing, and the yield increasing. As the quartz-workings may be termed "the permanent gold-producing mines" of the colony, it is gratifying to find the yield of gold increasing from this source. The returns referred to show that in the Auckland District 89,916 tons of quartz were crushed, and 18,900 tons of tailings treated, which gave 54,385oz. of gold and 61,389oz. of bullion, representing an estimated value of £219,651. This would be equivalent to about 85,202oz. of gold, as the average value of the gold found in the North Island is about £2 11s. 6d. per ounce, whereas the value of the gold found in the Middle Island is about £3 19s. per ounce. In the Nelson District 4,551 tons of quartz yielded 914oz. of gold, having an estimated value of £3,610; on the West Coast 45,090 tons of quartz yielded 28,553oz. of gold, having approximately a value of £114,214; and in Otago 9,723 tons of quartz yielded 5,573oz. of gold, representing an estimated value of £22,015: making a total of 168,190 tons of quartz and tailings crushed, which yielded 120,253oz. of an approximate value of £359,490, as against £320,282 for the previous year. This shows that about 37½ per cent. of the value of the gold obtained last year came from auriferous lodes.

In connection with quartz-workings I may observe that the improvements in the appliances for recovering the gold from the crushed pulp have had a great deal to do with the increased yield from the North Island last year. In some cases nearly as much gold has been recovered from the tailings as from the crushed ore, after passing through the ordinary process of gold-saving. This is entirely due to the introduction of the cyanide process. Wherever this process has been adopted in the North Island it has proved a success. At the same time it is only on ore having a certain value that it can be used, as the expense of treatment, together with the royalty to the Cassel Company, would in very few cases be less than 12s. per ton, exclusive of the cost of fine crushing. The cost of treatment, however, varies with the class of the ore to be dealt with. This necessarily requires men having a metallurgical knowledge to treat the different ores successfully.

I shall now briefly refer to the different localities where quartz-mining is carried on.

Coromandel.

The yield of gold from Coromandel, including Kuaotunu, last year was 10,019oz. This was obtained from 10,242 tons of quartz and 2,388 tons of tailings; while for the former year 12,403 tons of quartz and 2,760 tons of tailings gave a yield of 12,954oz.: showing a decrease in the yield of gold of 2,935oz. for the last year.

Mr. Cadman

The English company referred to in last year's Statement has not met with much success, but recently it has got gold-bearing stone in the deep levels of the Kapanga Mine; and rich stone has also been discovered in the ground forming portion of the Coromandel Company's property. This will, no doubt, give an impetus to further prospecting in the locality.

At Kuaotunu about the same number of claims have been worked as during the former year, but some of them have been giving very poor returns. The introduction of the cyanide process, however, added considerably to the yield of gold from that field last year. Both the Try Fluke and Great Mercury Companies have erected Cassel plants in connection with their crushing-batteries, and last year 3,420oz. of gold was obtained by this process. The total yield of gold from the Kuaotunu field last year was 8,044oz. This came from 9,660 tons of quartz and 2,240 tons of tailings, but the tailings may be said to form a portion of the quartz crushed.

Thames.

Notwithstanding the cry of depression in this district there were 1,068oz. more gold obtained—according to the quantity entered for exportation for the year ending the 31st March last—last year than for the previous year: vide Table No. 2. The mines are, however, getting deeper as every year passes by, and a feeling is entertained that, unless something is done to test the deep levels, in a few years many of the properties will be valueless, as the holders have not sufficient means to undertake prospecting operations below the level that can be drained by the Big Pump; and, although there are a number of companies affected by the drainage system, the areas of their separate holdings are, however, comparatively small. A combination of the whole of the companies interested in the deep levels is required before any extensive prospecting operations in this direction can be proceeded with. The holdings below the 500ft. level are at present utterly useless, but nevertheless the value placed on the ground in many instances is such that it will be a difficult matter to find outside capital to come to the assistance of the companies. Before any practical results will ensue, the present holders of mining property in this locality will have to modify their views in regard to the value of their claims, or else offer sufficient inducements for capitalists to assist them; otherwise mining in the district is bound to dwindle down, and in time many of the properties will be forced into liquidation. Every year the payable stone in the upper levels is gradually getting less, and the time will come when, unless money is forthcoming to test the lodes at deeper levels, the mines will have to be abandoned. It is a difficult matter to find persons philanthropic enough, even with Government assistance, to embark their capital for the benefit of others unless they receive a corresponding advantage.

During the last year there were 34,637 tons of quartz and 14,970 tons of mullock crushed, also 13,220 tons of tailings treated, on this field, yielding 84,637oz. of gold, representing an estimated value of £92,650; while 650 men were employed in the mines.

The principal gold-producing mines have been: The Moanataiari, 4,586oz.; New Alburnia, 5,992oz.; Hazelbank, 2,669oz.; Waiotahi, 2,719oz.; May Queen, 4,369oz.; and the Cambria, 1,470oz.

Ohinemuri.

This is a district which is likely to become a very large gold-producing one, as it contains a large area in which auriferous lodes have been already discovered and are known to exist. In many places no prospecting has been done, and portions of the field are yet unexplored. The yield from the Waihi Company's mine last year proves that, by using improved machinery for saving the bullion, the property is a valuable one. Nevertheless, the same property from which this company is obtaining such large returns was worked for over eight years by the Martha Company, the yield being only sufficient to pay working-expenses. The lode was previously worked by the Martha Company, which took out only what was considered the best portion of the stone, and from this only about 4dwt. of gold per ton was obtained by the process adopted by that company. Last year 19,343 tons of quartz were crushed from this mine, yielding bullion to the extent of 84,661oz., having a value of £54,000. As the company has erected a Cassel plant to treat the ore by the cyanide process, they expect this year to have much larger returns. By this means they get about 90 per cent. of the assay-value of the gold, and not more than 50 per cent. of the silver, in the ore. Previous to this only 66 per cent. of the gold and 40 per cent. of the silver was obtained.

At Waitekauri good returns have been obtained from the Komata Mine, and from Lowrie's New Find. Another discovery has been made by Birnie and party, who have recently erected a crushing-battery, but the results of the crushing have not been so far satisfactory. At Karangahake the Crown Company has been working successfully, and getting good returns. No doubt there are other lodes in this locality which, by judicious working, with proper appliances for saving the bullion, would give payable results. All through the Ohinemuri district the gold is found in combination with a large percentage of silver, and the system of treatment requires to be quite different from that for ore containing free gold only.

The battery returns from Waitekauri last year were: Komata Mine, 14,606oz. bullion, from 1,708 tons of stone and 1,705 tons of tailings; Lowrie's New Find, 1,682oz., from 600 tons of quartz; and the Crown Company, at Karangahake, crushed 4,644 tons of ore, yielding 11,131oz. of bullion.

The Crown Company was the first to introduce the cyanide process into the colony; and, as they have made considerable improvements in the method of treatment, a much larger percentage of the bullion is now recovered.

The total yield from the Ohinemuri district last year was 68,608oz. of bullion, representing a value of about £107,000; while 454 men were employed in the mines.

Waiorongomai.

There are very few men now working at Waiorongomai. There appears to be a considerable amount of bullion in the ore, but so far it has not been treated successfully. A fair percentage of the value cannot be recovered by the ordinary battery process, and the ore contains too large a percentage of copper to treat it economically with cyanide of potassium. There are a large number of lodes in the district known to contain gold, but most of the miners originally in this locality have left the field, and very little prospecting is done. The total yield from this field last year was 2,515oz. bullion, representing a value of about £2,500, while only twenty-nine men were employed in connection with the mine.

Lyell.

This was never a large quartz-reefing district, the principal gold-producing claim being the Alpine. In this claim the lode has been stoped out from the surface to a depth of 800ft., and it still gives payable returns. Adjoining this claim the Larnach Company have constructed an adit-level for a distance of about 3,300ft., and have succeeded in cutting the north block of the Alpine lode, which is said to show gold freely. This company has been about twelve years constructing this adit-level, and it is to be hoped it will yet be rewarded for its labour and perseverance. During the past year there were 9,876 tons of quartz crushed in this locality, yielding 9,186oz. of gold, valued at £36,744; while seventy-four men were employed in the mines.

Inangahua.

This is by far the largest quartz-reefing district in the Middle Island. It extends for a distance of forty miles, but the claims are greatly scattered, Reef-ton being in the centre; but there are only a few claims working within a radius of three miles of the town. The workings are gradually extending from Devil's Creek to the Big River. At the latter place some very good auriferous stone was obtained last year in the Big River Company's claim. At Merryjigs, the Cumberland Company has been doing fairly well; but the adjacent companies—namely, the Golden Lead and Sir Francis Drake—were not successful in their operations last year. The Progress and Globe Companies, at Devil's Creek, both have a large number of men employed, and the former company has been successful in paying dividends, but the other company has only been paying expenses.

The Keep It Dark and Wealth of Nations Mines, at Crushington, have been worked steadily during the year. The latter company has been fairly successful, but the former has had to make calls to carry on prospecting operations. The Keep It Dark is the deepest mine below sea-level in this district, being about 150ft. below that datum.

At the Sir Charles Russell Mine, at Painkiller, some good stone has been struck, and a crushing-battery is now being erected near the mine. Prospecting operations at the deep levels are being carried on at Boatman's by the Welcome Company, but no payable stone has yet been struck.

During the past year 35,214 tons of stone were crushed and tailings treated in the Inangahua district, yielding 19,367½oz. gold, representing a value of about £77,470. The total quantity of quartz crushed in this district since it was opened amounts to 594,461 tons, which yielded 449,486oz. of gold, having a value of £1,696,997, out of which dividends have been paid to the extent of £529,429; while the whole of the calls made by the mining companies amount to £305,379. This shows that there has been £224,050 returned to the shareholders more than has been paid in calls. The value of the dividends paid last year was £18,832, while 312 men were employed in the mines.

Otago.

The principal quartz-mining districts in Otago are Skipper's, Macetown, Old Man Range, Nenthorn, and Barewood; but the two principal claims where operations were carried on last year were the Phoenix and the Premier, both of which are now held by English companies. It is to be hoped that both these companies have been floated on the London market in such a manner that those investing their capital will receive a fair percentage for their money. We require capital in our mining ventures to assist in the development of our lodes, and I wish to see all persons who invest their money in undertakings of this nature receive adequate returns.

The Phoenix Mine has recently been purchased by the Achilles Company, but no extensive operations have yet been commenced. The Premier Mine yielded a fair quantity of gold last year, owing to its operations having been extended.

The Tipperary Mine, at Macetown, is now the property of an English company; but, so far, no payable returns have been obtained. The Cromwell Mine, at New Bendigo, is also the property of an English company, which has expended a considerable amount of money in prospecting the lode to a greater depth, and in sinking a new shaft, but, so far, without finding any stone of a payable character. Some very rich stone was obtained from this mine in the early days, and it is expected that another rich gold-bearing ledge will be found at a deeper level.

At the Old Man Range, and also at Barewood, some of the mines have been worked at a considerable profit, but at neither of these places are extensive operations carried on. A few parties are still working some of the Nenthorn lodes, and getting a fair quantity of gold.

The total quantity of gold obtained last year from quartz-mining in Otago was 5,573½oz., representing a value of about £22,015.

Mr. Cadman

Very little more is known this year respecting the Wilson River reefs than there was last year. The Golden Site Company, the owners of the prospectors' claim, have opened out on both sides of Wilson's River, and a portion of the lode on the north side is said to be very rich. A crushing-battery has recently been erected, and the result of crushing the first 130 tons of lode-stuff was 204oz. retorted gold. It is stated, however, that, during the eight days occupied in crushing, six days were spent in putting mullock through the battery.

Concluding Remarks on Quartz-mining.

In concluding my remarks on quartz-mining, I may be allowed to point out that the system hitherto adopted in working the mines is neither advantageous to the shareholder nor to the colony. Every mining company should have a fund to draw on to carry on prospecting operations when the day of adversity comes. Instead of paying away every shilling of the profits in dividends, a certain percentage should be placed to a reserve fund, which should be allowed to accumulate until required to open up fresh workings. This is exemplified in the case of the Welcome and Keep It Dark Companies, at Reefton; and also in some of the companies at the Thames, which have paid away large sums in dividends without retaining any reserve fund; and applications are now being made to the Government to come to the assistance of these companies to help in the development of their properties. Had a reserve fund been created, and left to accumulate, many of the shareholders would not have been so eager to dispose of their shares, so as to get clear of calls. The effect of having a reserve fund would be that the shares would be better held, and money would be available for prospecting and opening out the mines afresh without having to make calls.

ALLUVIAL MINING.

I now come to alluvial mining, which is confined to the Middle Island and Stewart Island, but at the latter place there is scarcely any one working. About 62½ per cent. of the gold produced last year came from the auriferous gravel drifts of the West Coast and Otago. Very little alluvial mining is carried on, however, in the strict sense of the term, the principal workings being hydraulic sluicing and dredging. The ground, as it becomes poorer, requires to be worked on different methods from that adopted in former years, when only a pick, shovel, and tin dish were required to enable the miner to earn his livelihood. Water must now be made to do the work, instead of manual labour. By having a good supply of water, and plenty of dump for tailings, a grain and a half of gold to the cubic yard of material can now be made remunerative, and when the material can all be sent away without having to handle any boulders even less than that can be made to pay.

Seeing, therefore, that water is so necessary an adjunct to working the auriferous gravel drifts, more attention should be given to its conservation. Every site for a dam or reservoir should be set aside for this purpose. At the present time the whole of the streams that can be diverted are utilised by the miners for a certain portion of the day; but sufficient provision is not made for storing up the night-water, and also the flood-water. If this were attended to, both the West Coast and Otago fields would afford profitable employment to a far larger mining population than at present.

The number of miners employed in alluvial mining is almost entirely limited to the quantity of water available. Very little of the ground contains sufficient gold to pay for driving the best portions of it out, and water is the only factor that can be used to make such ground remunerative.

There are also many places where the rivers could be utilised as a motive-power to generate electricity, and where this could be done at a reasonable cost pumping appliances might, in some instances, be used to lift the water into reservoirs at sites where it would be scarcely possible to get a stream of water by gravitation. I shall now refer to the principal fields where alluvial mining is carried on.

Mahakipawa.

The early workings in the upper portion of the field are now nearly exhausted, but there is still a considerable extent of ground left in the lower part of the creek-bed which would afford employment to a limited number of men were it not for the frequency of floods, which in every case fill the underground workings with water. The gold has been traced for a short distance into Mr. Cullen's freehold, and very good washdrift is being obtained in the King Solomon Mine. Several shafts have been sunk lower down the flat, but none of them has got on to the same run of gold. It is expected, however, that this gold will yet be traced under the township, and near the terrace on the north-east side of the flat. About 125 men were employed in this locality last year.

West Coast.

This embraces a large field, which may be said to extend from Collingwood to Jackson's Bay, a distance of about 350 miles. At Collingwood extensive preparations are being made by the Parapara Sluicing Company to work the alluvial flats in the vicinity of Appo's Creek and the Parapara Flat, but it will be a considerable time yet before operations can be commenced.

During my recent visit to the West Coast I was greatly surprised to find such extensive areas containing auriferous drifts, which can be made remunerative by hydraulic-sluicing operations. The whole of the West Coast abounds with rivers and streams which can be utilised for mining, a great portion of the country in this locality being suitable for no other purpose. The quantity of gold produced on the West Coast last year was about 98,980oz., having a value of £395,728, and there were about 3,860 men employed in working alluvial claims, of whom 990 were Chinese.

Matakaitaki.

There is an extensive field for sluicing operations in the upper portions of the Matakaitaki Valley and Glenroy Terraces, where a large supply of water can be brought to command the ground at a comparatively small outlay; and, from the information afforded me in the district, there is a large area of ground likely to pay for working, with a good supply of water. A company has recently taken up a special claim in this locality, and is now engaged in bringing in water from the Matakaitaki River to work it. From the prospects shown me—said to have been taken from shafts sunk in this ground, giving an average of 3gr. to the cubic yard of material—it should make a valuable mining property.

Westport, Addison's, and Charleston.

In the Westport district a considerable number of men are engaged in working the auriferous black-sand leads at Addison's, Croninville, Charleston, and between Westport and Ngakawau. Many persons also find profitable employment in washing the auriferous black sand found on the ocean-beach along the West Coast, from Karamea to Jackson's Bay. A prospecting association has been formed in Westport, with a view of cutting a tunnel tail-race through the Pakihis, from the ocean-beach to Fairdown, so as to cut the black-sand leads which are supposed to run through this flat. At Addison's Flat a large number of men are employed. Some of them have been working there since it was first opened, and are said to be making fair wages. At Charleston rich patches of gold-bearing sand have been worked, and a number of men are still finding profitable employment in this locality.

Grey Valley.

In the Grey Valley, at Granville, Orwell Creek, Callaghan's, Nelson Creek, Red Jack's Creek, No Town, Moonlight, and Blackball, there are a considerable number of miners making a fair livelihood. There are large areas of auriferous ground in these localities, which will yet be worked by hydraulic sluicing. Provision will have to be made for proclaiming several streams in this valley watercourses into which tailings and mining débris may be discharged.

Greenstone, Kumara, and Waimea.

At Maori Gully, Maori Creek, Greenstone, Westbrook, Kumara, and Waimea there are a considerable number of miners employed, especially at Kumara, which is the principal field for sluicing on the West Coast. When one sees the extensive hydraulic-sluicing operations which are carried on in a part of the country valuable only for mining and the timber it contains, every facility and encouragement should be given to men who are ready and willing to expend their capital and labour in extending the field of operations. When it is considered that the Kumara field has yielded gold to the value of about £1,250,000 from an area of not more than 600 acres, and then only on a false bottom, it fills one with wonder and admiration at the resources and wealth which have lain hidden for such a period from the eyes of man.

At Callaghan's, between Kumara and Waimea, a party of miners have constructed a tunnel tail-race for drainage purposes of about 3,000ft. in length, and are now getting sufficient gold to pay them fair wages. There is also a considerable area of ground in the Upper Waimea Valley which has scarcely yet been prospected, and is likely to afford employment for a large number of miners when the branch of the Waimea Water-race is completed.

Humphrey's Gully.

At Humphrey's Gully, near Arahura, large sluicing operations are being carried on, but the quantity of water yet brought on to the ground is not sufficient to work the claim—which is over 200 acres in extent—on such an extended scale as the holders of the property deem advantageous. From what I could learn, steps are being taken to get more capital to extend the head-water race to the Arahura River, when a never-failing supply of water will be obtained.

Kanieri and Woodstock.

Coming to Kanieri, Woodstock, and Rimu, we find a considerable mining population, some working the ground by shafts and tunnels, and some by hydraulic sluicing, where water and fall for tailings can be got. The Rimu field is, however, at so high an elevation that the expense of getting a large supply of water would be so great that few individuals with sufficient capital could be found to undertake the construction of a water-race sufficiently large to work the ground on the hydraulic principle. Recently a new discovery of gold has been made between the branches of the Kanieri River, which seems to be a continuation of the Gentle Annie Diggings. This discovery was made by the Rimu Prospecting Association, who have been doing very useful work in this locality. A few shafts were bottomed at the time of my visit, and a little gold was being found in each of them—about 2½dwt. to the load; but further work will have to be done before much is known respecting it.

Ross.

At Ross there is now only a small mining population compared with what there was in the days when mining operations were carried on in the deep ground. Most of the Ross Flat is now held by the Ross United Company, who are working the upper levels by the aid of a tail-race on the ocean-beach. The water used in sluicing the ground is discharged into this tail-race, and the tailings are lifted by a bucket-elevator for a certain distance, and afterwards in trucks up an incline tramway. The large quantity of stones and tailings which cover the flat mark the extensive workings which were carried on in the early days of the field.

There are said to be eight different layers of gold-bearing wash-drift, one above the other, in this flat. The lowest one, worked in the early days, proved to be far the richest. This is about 240ft. under the sea-level, and yet no main bottom has been reached. The pumping-plant formerly used by the company was insufficient to contend with the water, and as all the available capital was expended the lower workings had to be abandoned. Several efforts have been made to get extra capital to place a larger plant on the ground, but so far without success.

Mr. Cadman

A little to the south of Ross is the Mont d'Or Sluicing Claim, with a face about 200ft. high. A large quantity of gold has been obtained from this, and steady dividends paid to the shareholders. From the appearance of the country, and the information afforded me when visiting the West Coast fields, I believe this is a part of the colony where profitable employment will be found for willing and energetic men for a long period.

Otago.

The discovery of gold in Otago was the means of the first rapid influx of population to our shores; and from this district 5,054,592oz. of gold, representing a value of £19,975,412, have been obtained. This goldfield is a portion of the colony where there is comparatively no dense bush, and consequently the difficulties met with in prospecting are not very great: at the same time some of the land is at such an elevation that mining operations can only be carried on for about six months of the year. I have not been able to visit this important mining district yet, but hope to do so during the recess.

There is a large area of land in Otago having a very old quartz-schist formation, and where this exists the overlying drifts are in most cases auriferous. The elevation in many places, however, prevents an adequate supply of water being obtained. This is the case, for instance, at Mount Criffel, Mount Buster, and the Old Man Range, where the supply of water is dependent on the melting of the snow. Last year 4,182 miners were employed in the alluvial workings in the Otago District: of these, 1,238 were Chinese.

Maerewhenua.

There is a considerable area of ground covered with auriferous drifts in this locality, but the expense in bringing in a large water-supply to the field is too great for individual miners. The number of miners on the field has varied very little for several years. Last year there were seventy-seven men employed in mining, and the gold obtained was 2,397oz., representing a value of £9,849, which is equal to about £128 11s. per man. This shows that even with a small supply of water on the field the miners here are doing better than on many of the other goldfields.

Mount Ida.

The Mount Ida field includes Taieri, Nenthorn, Hindon, Hamilton, Hyde, Kyeburn, Mount Buster, St. Bathans, and the Upper Manuherikia Valley. In these localities 530 miners were employed in alluvial mining last year, of whom 180 were Chinese, and the quantity of gold obtained was about 13,880oz., representing a value of £55,583. In some parts of the field the miners are making only small wages, but in other parts rich yields are obtained.

In Naseby, where the largest population is situated, the ground is very poor, and it is only by having a good supply of water that the miners can earn even small wages.

Mount Buster.

This was known as Clark's Diggings in the early days, where very rich drifts were found in the beds of the small gullies; but as these shallow workings became exhausted the gold was traced into a large deposit of quartz drift, which has been worked every season since the discovery, yielding handsome returns. It is, however, only for about six months of the year that mining operations can be carried on, owing to the severe frost and the large quantity of snow which falls at this elevation — about 4,000ft. above the sea-level. The discovery was not only an important one to the lucky finder, but it has led to similar deposits being worked in other localities in Otago, with equally good results. From the explorations made by the Mining Geologist, there appear to be many places yet untouched which contain similar formations, and which are likely to prove remunerative for working by systematic methods on the hydraulic principle. Passing on from Mount Buster, at the foot of the range is the Kyeburn diggings, where a limited number of persons are said to be earning small wages. The line of quartz drift can be traced along the foot of the mountains through the Naseby field and into the Upper Manuherikia Valley, and similar drifts occur in almost every goldfield in Otago.

St. Bathans.

The whole of the alluvial workings at St. Bathans are in the same class of quartz drift as found at Mount Buster, and some of the claims in this locality are yielding handsome returns. One of them, belonging to Mr. John Ewing, has been giving a large yield for a number of years. Last season he washed up 800oz. of gold, and he has only eight men employed. The depth of the quartz drift at St. Bathans has never yet been tested. Mr. Ewing is now down nearly 200ft., and no bottom has yet been reached. The gold occurs in bands and layers, and, from the manner in which this deposit lies, it must be one of the oldest auriferous drifts in Otago, being found in some places under 500ft. of "Maori bottom" belonging to the Miocene formation.

As the workings are being extended in this locality, the quartz-drift formation is likely to be found remunerative wherever a good supply of water can be obtained to command the ground at a sufficient elevation to admit of hydraulic elevators being used.

A short distance from St. Bathans are Scandian Hill and Muddy Creek, where rich finds of gold have been obtained in the past, and payable results are likely to continue for the future.

Vinegar Hill and Welshman's.

Again, at Vinegar Hill rich auriferous gravel drifts were found near the surface, and the gold was traced from these into deep ground, which seems from its formation to have been an ancient fresh-water lake. This is indicated by the large number of the vertebrae of small fish found in the beds of green silt sand-mud, which is now hardened to such an extent that it is difficult to disintegrate even with water under a high pressure. Mr. Ewing, who has been working a claim in this locality for many years, has recently got out of the greensand formation and come on a deposit of quartz drift which, judging from the prospects obtained, is likely to prove a valuable discovery. At Vinegar Hill and Welshman's there are several claims giving good returns.

Tinker's.

This has been for many years the richest alluvial diggings in the colony. There is a comparatively small population, but the average yield of gold for the number of men employed for the last ten years has been considerably more than on any other goldfield in New Zealand. Last year, however, notwithstanding that there was a plentiful supply of water during the whole of the season, the quantity of gold obtained was not so great as formerly. The estimated yield last year was about 2,200oz., representing a value of £8,800, and about forty men were employed on the field.

Tuapeka.

This is the oldest field in Otago. It was discovered in 1861. The news of the discovery of gold in this locality reaching Australia was the means of inducing thousands of people to flock to our shores to try their luck at mining, while others came to follow commercial and other pursuits. The only indications remaining to mark the places where the crowded population was then residing, in Gabriel's, Weatherstone's, Munro's, and Waitahuna Gullies, are large deposits of tailings and old workings. Very few persons are now working in these gullies, but strange to say that after the ground in Gabriel's Gully has been turned over time after time there is still a company getting very good returns from washing the old tailings on the hydraulic elevating principle.

At the head of Gabriel's the famous "Blue Spur," from which a very large quantity of gold has been obtained, is now being worked in a face by an English company, who are blasting the brecciated material, breaking it up with picks and hammers, then lifting it with hydraulic elevators and sluicing it away. The results of this company's operations last year have been very satisfactory.

The auriferous brecciated material follows a fault-line across the country, and is found at Weatherstone's and Waitahuna. Probably other portions of it may pay for working on a similar principle to that adopted at the Blue Spur.

Included in the Tuapeka district is a portion of the Clutha Valley, and also the Waipori and Waitahuna goldfields. The results of the alluvial workings in this district last year were 26,070oz. gold, representing a value of £105,283; while 763 men were employed in the mines.

Clutha Valley.

There is a large area of auriferous drift-gravel in this valley, and also in the bed of the Clutha River. Several mining companies are carrying on hydraulic sluicing and elevation operations in this locality, amongst which may be mentioned the Island Block and Island Block Extended Companies. The results of the workings last year have given very satisfactory returns. The former Island Block Company, which is formed almost entirely of English capital, has entered into an agreement with Mr. Joseph Clark to work his freehold on his receiving a certain royalty. This company obtained last year about 2,000oz. of gold as a result of its operations. There are also three large hydraulic sluicing companies near Roxburgh—namely, the Hercules, the Hercules Extended, and the Roxburgh Amalgamated. The last-named company was fairly successful last year, and paid one dividend to the shareholders.

Every tributary of the Clutha, from the Lindis to the Pomahaka, has in the past carried large quantities of gold into it, and may be said to be still doing so. There is scarcely an acre of ground in the valley of this river that is not auriferous; and, as the bed of the Clutha has been shifted from time to time, wherever any of the ancient beds are found large deposits of gold are obtained. The auriferous drifts in this valley will therefore take a long time to work out.

Old Man Range.

A considerable quantity of gold has been obtained from Campbell's, Potter's, Butchers', and Conroy's Gullies, also from the shallow gullies leading into Bald Hill Flat. The whole of the face of the Old Man Range above the latter place is highly auriferous, and in recent years a rich quartz lode has been discovered and worked by Messrs. Crossan and Gray. There are also two hydraulic elevating plants now working the ground on Bald Hill Flat with payable results.

Cromwell.

There are a number of sluicing claims on the banks and terraces alongside the Clutha and Kawarau Rivers, and also at Bannockburn. In the early days there was very rich ground at the latter place, and a large number of miners were employed for a long time. The shallow workings are now all exhausted, and, although there is still a rich layer of auriferous gravel near the bottom, there is a great depth of material to sluice away containing little or no gold, which makes the general average value of the material low. There are still a good number of miners in the locality, but the greater portion of them are making only small wages.

Cardrona and Criffel.

The number of miners about Cardrona varies
Mr. Cadman

very little from year to year. As one portion of the field is worked, another is opened up. Last year some new ground was opened in the face of the range, on a line of quartz drift, which is likely to prove a valuable discovery. The same run of ground extends along Criffel face to the foot of Mount Barker. The ground is, however, at a high elevation, and the supply of water that can be got to command it is consequently limited. The drift does not contain sufficient gold to pay for working by any other method than hydraulic sluicing. Several of the miners combined together and brought in a water-race from the Roaring Meg, and constructed dams on the top of the range: these store the water for about sixteen hours. By this means several parties have each a small supply of water for about eight hours a day.

Last year there were about 1,200oz. of gold obtained from Cardrona and 700oz. from Criffel. At the latter place only a few claims are being worked. The whole of the water brought on to the field is in the hands of one party, and sluicing operations can only be carried on for about six months of the year.

Arrow and Shotover.

The rich auriferous drifts obtained at the heads of the Arrow and Shotover Rivers have afforded profitable employment to a large number of miners for many years, and at the present time there are a number of claims which still continue to give good returns. The beds of these rivers have been cut down for some hundreds of feet below where the water originally flowed, causing numerous slides and slips from the sides of the ranges. The atmosphere and the action of the water have disintegrated the material from these slips and allowed the lighter particles to be carried away with the streams, leaving those of greatest density in the beds. No doubt the action of the stones, and the large quantities of shingle travelling down the streams, ground the gold to such an extent that large quantities of it have been carried away in suspension in the water to the ocean; but, notwithstanding this, heavy deposits of gold have been found both in the wash-drift in the beds of the rivers and in the crevices of the bed-rock, which in places formed gigantic ripples for collecting the precious metal. The large undertaking of Miller Brothers at the Arrow Falls and at Londonderry Terrace on the Shotover, as well as the operations of Davis Brothers on Stony Creek Terrace, are all works where a considerable capital had to be expended in opening up the ground. Unless they were men with sufficient means at their command, they could never enter into mining ventures of this description. There are several other claims—such as Aspinall's at Skipper's Point, Smith's, Monk's, and Gemmel's at the Sandhills, and R. Johnston's on Pleasant Creek Terrace—which give excellent returns, year after year, when there is a good season for water. Some of these claims have been worked for thirty years, and it is said that from one of them over 30,000oz. have been obtained. When we have such large areas and great depths of auriferous drifts as there are in some of the terraces on the Arrow and Shot-over and other rivers, with streams carrying large volumes of water that could be lifted and conveyed along the side of the ranges, it must be admitted that the colony has valuable assets in these drifts. The time will come when more attention will be given to the conservation of water, and this will afford greater employment for the labouring-classes. There are plenty of men who would rather work on a mere pittance on the goldfields, and be their own masters, with the chance of finding payable claims, than work for others. There is no class of men in the colony with more independent spirit and more intelligence than the gold-miner.

Wilson's River.

The number of men employed about Wilson's River is considerably less than last year, but gold is being discovered in other places in this locality, which keeps a fair mining population in the district. Last year there was a new discovery at Crayfish Island, and some rich deposits of gold-bearing drifts were found. This is a new district, very little explored, and one where there is a probability of good yields being yet obtained. On the mainland very few persons have travelled through the country between Wilson's and the Waiau Rivers, where there is likely-looking country for gold to be found, but at present this locality may be termed terra incognita, as there is no road or track, and there are large and deep rivers to cross, which greatly militate against the district being prospected.

COAL-MINING.

I will now call the attention of honourable members to the progress of the coal-mining industry. A comparatively few years ago there were only three mines where bituminous coal was raised—namely, the Brunner, the Coal-pit Heath, and the Coalbrookdale; but more recently a mine has been opened up at Blackball, and two mines at Mokihinui—the Cardiff and Mokihinui Mines; while large works are also now in progress to open mines at Granity Creek, near Ngakawau, in the Westport district, and at Coal Creek, in the Grey district. A mine has been in existence at Collingwood for a number of years, but the limited extent of the field, and the difficulty of getting the coal to a market, will always make the output from this mine very small.

The total number of coal-mines on the last last year was 153, but a large number of these are merely pits, or open cuttings, where lignite is worked in a face to supply local demands. Both lignite and brown coal are suitable only for local consumption, or within such a radius of the place where it is raised as will admit of its being sold at a cheap rate. So far as is yet known, the whole of the bituminous coal in the colony is confined to the west coast of the Middle Island, and, as this is the only class of coal we have suitable for ocean-going steamers, it is from the mines in this locality that we may in future look for a largely-increased output.

So far the coal-mining industry has progressed only in proportion to the growth of commerce and the number of new industries which have been established; and the output from the mines newly opened up and in progress will depend entirely on the trade that can be established with other countries. Foreign markets will have to be found before the coal-mining industry assumes large proportions. A great deal also depends on the further improvement of the harbours of the West Coast.

These works will have to be more advanced before we are able to send away large cargoes of coal to compete with coal from other countries in foreign markets, and even when the harbour-works are completed it will take a considerable time before a large trade can be established with other countries. As regards the price per ton, we cannot compete with the coal-proprietors in China and Japan. It is only from the superiority of our coal that we can hope to succeed. Hence it is gratifying to find that, at the tests made with different coal, at the Woolwich Dockyard, the evaporative power of the Westport coal was placed higher even than that of the coal from the Welsh mines.

During the last year the output from all the mines in the colony was 691,548 tons, as against 679,315 for the year previous, showing an increased output for the year of 18,233 tons. The total quantity imported was: From Victoria, 1,383 tons; from New South Wales, 118,122 tons; and from Queensland, 2,939 tons: making a total of 117,444 tons. This makes the total quantity raised and imported 808,992 tons; but, of this, 24,288 tons were exported to other countries, and 50,888 tons were used in coaling direct steamers for Europe. However, this may be taken as consumption within the colony, as it is owing to the extension of our commerce that these steamers are required. The total consumption of coal in the colony therefore last year was 784,704 tons, as against 770,599 tons for the previous year. This shows the increased consumption for last year to be 14,105 tons.

There has not been a great fluctuation in the import of coal for the last twelve years. During that period the import has ranged from 128,068 tons to 101,341 tons. Last year about 8,000 tons less than the previous year were imported. The import of coal is principally from New South Wales; and, as that colony is an outlet for a considerable quantity of New Zealand produce, kauri timber, &c., coal is carried as return cargo instead of ballast. Thus, if only the cost of loading and unloading be obtained, it pays better to carry coal than to come back in ballast, which has to be bought in the first instance, besides which there must be reckoned the cost of loading and discharging.

Notwithstanding that bituminous coal is the class we have to look to for an increased output, the last year shows a decrease in the quantity raised of 25,927 tons, while there was an increased output of 41,526 tons of pitch-coal and 6,694 tons of brown coal. The decrease in the output of bituminous coal last year was in a great measure due to the faults which have been met with in the Brunner Mine, and the flooding-out of Coal-pit Heath Mine. The latter mine has now been abandoned, but operations in the Brunner Mine are now being extended by opening up new workings. Operations have also been suspended in the Mokihinui Mine for most of the year. Two new mines have, however, been opened up—namely, the Blackball and the Cardiff—both of which now send coal into the market. The Westport Company are also constructing an incline to open up the Granity Creek Mine, and four sections of the railway from Cobden to Coal Creek are in course of construction; and, when completed, these works will enable coal to be put into the market from the Coal Creek and Hamilton and Smith leases. The output from the Brunner Mine was 40,065 tons less than the year previous.

The Blackball Company have constructed an aerial tramway for three miles to connect their mine with the railway, over which about 400 tons a day can be sent. The same tubs used for bringing the coal out of the mine are hooked on and carried across on a wire rope to the bins which are erected alongside the Greymouth-Reefton Railway at Ngahere. It is a pleasure to see this tramway working; and when people become better acquainted with the working of tramways of this description they will be more extensively used in transporting the coal from the mines to where it can be taken away. The cost of construction of tramways of this description is, in the first instance, not one-half that of a railway; and they can be taken across rough country, where grades for an ordinary railway could not be got.

A new coal lease has been granted to a company at Hikurangi, and the work of opening up the mine is being rapidly proceeded with. There are two other coal-mines in this locality, and another lease has been applied for. The railway between Kamo and Hikurangi has recently been completed, so that coal from this field can now be brought to a port of shipment.

At Kawakawa the Bay of Islands Coal Company have abandoned the mine, but a lease of the area lately held by the Bay of Islands Company, of 640 acres, will shortly be issued to a new company. It is to be regretted that the Kamo Company, at Whangarei, had to abandon their mine in the beginning of the present year. This company carried on operations for several years at a loss, and finally had to succumb to circumstances. The land is freehold, and there is little hope of the mine being opened again. Last year the output from the Kamo Mine was considerably larger than it had been for some years previously.

At Ngunguru a small mine has been opened, having the best class of coal in the North Island, but, at the same time, it is inferior to the bituminous coal on the West Coast. However, the output will never be large, as vessels of more than 8ft. draught cannot come into the port.

Mr. Cadman

Earnings of the Coal-miners.

It is very difficult to get at the exact earnings of the coal-miners. In previous years it has been arrived at on the basis that it cost the mine-proprietors 6s. per ton to put the coal in the trucks or wagons ready to send it away to market or a port of shipment. If the same basis be taken this year, the earnings of the miners would be £202,464 8s. The average number of men employed in the coal-mines last year being 1,888, this would give an average wage of £107 4s. 8d. a man per annum. The number of men employed in the coal-mines for the previous year being 1,693, the average wage was equal to £119 7s. 1d. a man per annum. The average output per man last year was 366 tons, as against 400 tons for the year previous. The lower output last year is accounted for by the large amount of dead-work in opening up the Cardiff, Granity Creek, the new mine at Brunner, and the Hikurangi mines.

METALLIFEROUS MINING.

Very little has yet been done in metalliferous mining, other than gold and silver, in the colony, owing, in a great measure, to the difficulties there are to contend with, not only in getting machinery and appliances on the ground, but also in getting men with sufficient capital to open out and work the mines. The attention of those persons who put their money into mining is generally directed to gold only.

No doubt several companies have been formed to work metalliferous ores in the colony, but their failures in many instances have been due to want of sufficient capital to prosecute the work. When once the limited capital first available was expended, the small number of men who would invest their money in undertakings of this character rendered it almost impossible for any company that in the first instance proved unsuccessful to get fresh capital to assist them in continuing their operations. The extremely rough and broken nature of the country where ores are found makes the difficulty of access very considerable, which greatly increases the cost of working metalliferous mines. The only ores of this character that are at present worked are antimony and manganese.

Manganese.

There are large quantities of manganese in the colony, but its low value will not admit of costly transit to a port of shipment; and it is only when the ore can be got near the ocean-beach, where vessels can come to load, that it can be made remunerative for working.

Hitherto mining for this ore has been confined principally to the Auckland District—at Whangarei, Bay of Islands, and Waiheke Island. There is some very rich ore in the Otago District, near the mouth of the Taieri River, but it has not been found in sufficient quantity to work remuneratively. During the last year 319 tons were exported, representing a value of £943.

Antimony.

The principal workings of antimony-ore are at Endeavour Inlet, Queen Charlotte Sound, the present company being the third one to embark in the undertaking. The two former companies failed to make the venture payable, and, after spending a large capital in opening up the mine, and in placing machinery and appliances on the ground, the mine was disposed of to the present company. Considerable sums of money have been expended in the erection of furnaces to produce crude antimony, and failure after failure ensued, until recently, when Mr. Seager, ironfounder, of Wellington, invented a process whereby, it is hoped, crude antimony will be produced at a comparatively small cost. It is stated that by this process one cord of firewood is sufficient to produce one ton of crude antimony. The process has now been working for three months continuously, and, so far, has given every satisfaction. The slimes of the antimony-ore, which were until recently considered a waste product, are now converted into a marketable commodity. If the process is successful, it has overcome one of the greatest difficulties in the way of the production of antimony from its ore that has been experienced in all the countries of the world where this metal is obtained. It is stated that the cost of production is so small that, even at the present low price of star antimony, it can be delivered in the Home-markets at such a rate as to leave a fair margin of profit. This process, when it becomes generally known, may have the effect of reopening other antimony mines, at Waipori and elsewhere. Last year there were 331 tons of antimony and antimony-ores exported, having a value of £3,467.

Cinnabar.

Prospecting operations were carried on last year with a view of finding a lode of cinnabar at Puhipuhi, but, so far, no lode has yet been discovered. The cinnabar is found amongst the gravel wash-drift in the bed of a small creek in small rounded pellets. About 75lb. of cinnabar has been collected by washing the drift, and in all probability this mineral will yet be traced into the solid country, where it will be found in situ. A sample of this ore was sent to the Colonial Laboratory for analysis. This proved to contain about 84 per cent. of quicksilver. A syndicate has also been prospecting a lode containing cinnabar at Ohaeawai, but the ore is of a very poor quality. Quicksilver is found in the black mud at the hot pools at Ohaeawai, which has been liberated from a lode containing cinnabar, alongside these pools: the heat of the ground, together with the alkali it contains, being sufficient to distil the quicksilver from the ore.

Scheelite.

In some parts of the Middle Island there are quantities of scheelite, which, at the present price offered,—namely, 10s. per unit, delivered on shipboard at either London or Liverpool,—ought to pay for its production. Scheelite is found at Buckleburn, Waipori, Hendon, and other places in Otago, and at Wakamarina in Marlborough. Inquiries have been made by Messrs. Blackwood and Company, of Liverpool and London, regarding this mineral, and they offer to take about 200 tons per annum at the price stated.

Kauri-gum.

Notwithstanding the many years that have elapsed since kauri-gum-digging became an industry capable of supporting a large population, the amount raised every year shows that there is still a considerable quantity to be obtained. Last year 8,317 tons were exported, having a market value of £510,775, whereas in the former year there were exported 8,705 tons, valued at £517,678. In addition to this there is a certain quantity used in the colony for making varnish, and also in gasworks. The price of gum as shown by the Customs returns gives, however, but a poor idea of what the gum-digger actually obtains from the store-keeper. The price varies in accordance with the quality of the gum. The local price for low quality of gum, washed nuts, is from £10 to £15 per ton. For unpacked ordinary well-scraped gum, of which there are two qualities—namely, ordinary dark gum, £25 to £30 per ton; and for good, hard black gum, from £35 to £45 per ton. The best gum (rescaped) brings £80 per ton, and in some cases it is said that special samples have realised as much as £140 per ton. What is known as tree-gum—that is, gum lodged in the forks of trees, and exudations—is worth about £20 per ton in its native state, but when rescaped it brings from £45 to £50 per ton. Before shipping to the Home-market all the gum is re-sorted and classified; and, although the prices paid for some samples are very small, when the gum comes to be classified, the average value of the product for last year was £61 8s. 3d. per ton, which includes the price of boxes, freight, and commission.

It is difficult to arrive at the number of men engaged in this industry so as to estimate their average earnings, but from what can be learned in the gum-digging districts the earnings do not exceed those of the gold-miners. The gum-digger has, however, one great advantage over the gold-miner in that he requires no expensive outfit to enable him to carry on his operations, a spade, spear, haversack, and jack-knife being all that he requires.

This industry affords a means of livelihood to a large number, both of the European and Native population. From what is known respecting the earnings of the gum-digger, there must be at least seven thousand people employed in this industry, as it is maintained that their average wage would not amount to £1 10s. per week. Wherever there is land in the North suitable for settlement the settlers can always earn a little money by gum-digging when not engaged in cultivating the soil, thus affording them a means of getting ready money to purchase any necessities they require beyond what they produce. The gum industry, therefore, forms a very important element in the prosperity of the northern portion of the colony.

ROADS AND TRACKS.

I now come to the question of roads and tracks, which are essential for opening up the lands of the colony, and nowhere more so than in the gold-mining districts. The rugged, broken, and precipitous nature of the country where quartz-mining operations are carried on renders roads and tracks necessary in every direction, for without them it is impossible to get machinery or supplies on to the ground. Already large sums have been expended in the construction of works of this character, but the extension of mining operations demands a further expenditure on roads and tracks to give ordinary facilities for prospecting the country, and supplying the wants of those engaged in the development of our mineral resources; also to enable machinery to be placed on the ground where auriferous deposits of a payable character have been found. In many instances these roads tend not only to open up new mines, but they also give great facilities for people taking up small plots of land to make homes for themselves and to dispose of their produce amongst the mining community. Although the land may not be of very good quality, any small flats are eagerly sought after by the miners, who, in addition to their ordinary avocations, are quite prepared to take them up and do a little cultivation in their spare time, and thus become permanent settlers.

The cost of roads and tracks authorised last year was £23,958, and the actual expenditure £18,275. Of this amount, £15,506 was expended by direct grants, £2,719 by subsidies to local bodies. The liabilities on works of this character on the 31st March last were £18,590. During the last twelve years that the Minister of Mines has had control of this vote the expenditure has amounted to £215,516. Of this amount, £140,502 was in direct grants, and £75,014 by subsidies, the local bodies during the same period having contributed £49,620.

From the nature of the country in which mining is generally carried on, the cost of constructing roads and tracks to enable machinery to be brought on to the ground, and give facility for the mines being opened up, is far beyond the amount that could be raised by local bodies in mining districts by the present system of rating, which has now reached the highest limit allowed by law. Since the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act has been dispensed with, even the present high rates are inadequate to maintain the present roads and tracks. It has, therefore, become absolutely necessary for the Mines Department to come to the assistance of the local bodies.

The following are the rates levied in the pound in the different goldfields counties: Coromandel, 1½d.; Thames, 1½d.; Ohinemuri, 1½d.; Piako, ½d.; Marlborough, no rate levied by the county, but there are six Road Boards in this county which levied different rates; Collingwood, ½d.; Road Boards in Collingwood County, ½d.; Buller, 1½d. general rate and ½d. special rate; Inangahua, 1½d.; Grey, 1½d.; Westland, 1½d.; Tuapeka, ½d.; Vincent, ½d.; Lake, 1d.; Maniototo, ½d.; Southland, ½d. general rate and ½d. special rate. It will thus be seen from the foregoing that the goldfields counties in the North Island and on the west coast of the Middle Island are rated up to the fullest extent the law permits.

WATER-RACES.

The most essential adjunct to mining, especially in systematically working auriferous drifts, is a good supply of water; and it behoves us in granting water-rights to take care that the whole of the water comprised in these rights is properly utilised, inasmuch as the number of men who can be profitably employed on our goldfields depends in a great measure on the quantity of water that can be brought to command the ground. When one comes to see the extensive areas of auriferous drifts on the West Coast, and also on the goldfields of Otago, the impression is that were there a larger supply of water there would be a considerably increased population earning a competent livelihood.

The returns furnished by the Wardens show the value of the water-races on the goldfields, exclusive of those constructed by the Government, to be £821,020, while the value of tail-races, dams, and reservoirs amounts to £379,634. In addition to this, the value of water-races constructed by the Government in the Middle Island is £346,687. Two of these—namely, the Waimea-Kumara and the Mount Ida Water-races—are controlled by the department. The total expenditure on these two water-races has been £241,290; and the net profit, including the duty on the gold obtained from claims worked with water from water-races controlled by the department before the gold duty was abolished, has been £79,357 9s. 6d. The Waimea-Kumara Water-race cost £171,655; and the total value of the sales of water, since its construction about sixteen years ago, has been £182,820, while the total expenditure during this period has been £80,545. This leaves a net profit, exclusive of the duty on gold before its abolition, of £52,275. The net profit last year was £3,574. The demand for water from the Waimea portion of the race is gradually getting less, but a new branch is being constructed, and when this is completed it will enable the miners to work an extensive area of land on which auriferous drifts are known to exist, but which could not be profitably worked without a large supply of water. The expenditure on this branch up to the 31st March last was £1,908, and another £2,400 will have to be spent before it can be brought to a profitable issue.

The Kumara portion of the water-race has in the past given a large percentage on the cost of construction, but it will require extension to open up fresh ground so that the whole supply of water can be fully utilised. Although the net profits on the working have been large, the other expenditure in connection with subsidising the construction of tail-races to allow the ground to be worked has absorbed a considerable portion of the profits, and this expenditure will have to be continued in the future as the working of the claims is extended. One tail-race is now in course of construction, which has been subsidised to the extent of £1,500, and another will have to be made to allow the ground to be worked lower down the flat, which will require to be subsidised to a similar amount. The sales of water last year amounted to £5,582, while the expenditure on maintenance was £1,917, leaving a net profit on the working of £3,665.

Mr. Cadman

The Mount Ida Water-race, which was formerly managed by a Trust, showed up to the beginning of last year a net loss on the working of £3,595. The Trust was abolished at the end of 1892; and since then sales of water have amounted to £1,422, while the expenditure on maintenance has been £1,013, showing a net profit on the working of £409. When the Government took over the race it was in very bad repair, and an expenditure of £2,837 had to be incurred before sufficient revenue to maintain it could be expected. This water-race is a valuable asset to the colony, for if the water could not be sold for mining purposes it could be used for irrigating the Maniototo Plains, and thus convert a large area into good agricultural land.

The water-race which was purchased from the Official Assignee in the estate of R. Johnston at the same time as the Government took over the Mount Ida Race cost £1,000. The net profit on working these two water-races last year was £104. A small expenditure will have to be made on these races next spring for clearing them out, so that a larger supply of water can be sent down to miners working in the vicinity of Blackstone Hill.

The Nelson Creek Water-race was previously leased, but the lease expired in August last, and fresh tenders were called for leasing it for another term. However, after the lease had been accepted, one of the principal bridges came down, and as all the bridges are greatly decayed the lease was given up. It would cost about £25,000 to renew the bridges, and the Government do not consider it advisable to expend any money in this direction. They will, however, be quite prepared to entertain proposals from responsible persons either to renew the bridges and flumes or to reconstruct a portion of the race so as to do away with them, and to supply water to the miners in the district at a rate to be agreed upon.

PROSPECTING.

There are large areas both in the North and Middle Islands where scarcely any prospecting has yet been done. In order to get systematic prospecting operations established it will be necessary for the Government to grant assistance not only towards opening up new fields, but also to test the ground at greater depths than have hitherto been worked. The latter remark applies, of course, to quartz lodes only. It is well known in the colony, and also in other gold-bearing countries, that auriferous quartz found in lodes is in shoots and ledges. These generally occur in certain belts of country having barren places between them. At the same time, when rich auriferous quartz has been worked profitably on the upper levels, and the same formation continues to go down, gold-bearing stone is likely to be again found at a lower level. None of the lodes in the colony has yet been worked to any great depth. The deepest shaft—that of the Queen of Beauty at the Thames—is only about 748ft., and gold-bearing stone was got in the lowest level from this shaft. The Kapanga Mine, at Coromandel, has been worked for the last sixteen years by an English company, which has been re-formed. This company has expended a large capital in opening up and developing the mine without being rewarded for the outlay. In order to test the deep levels in the mine the main shaft has been continued, and it is now down to a depth of 720ft., a small lode containing auriferous stone having been cut. The workings in the Keep It Dark Mine have also been carried down to a depth of over 700ft., and gold has been found in the lode, although not of a payable character for working. A payable lode has, however, recently been cut in the Larnach Tunnel, at the Lyell, which has been carried into a range at a low level for a distance of about 3,200ft. This indicates that there is a fair probability of gold being struck at much lower levels than have yet been reached. In support of testing auriferous lodes at deep levels, I would call the attention of honourable members to the experience gained on the gold-fields of Victoria, where, in some instances, when the lodes gave out at a depth of 750ft., new lodes were discovered at a depth of 1,500ft., having a blank between those depths at which no lode was found. This occurred in Mr. Landsell's No. 180 Mine at Bendigo, and where payable returns were got at a depth of nearly 2,000ft. If it is found that the lodes in this colony can be proved to be payable for working to great depths it will give a new lease of life to quartz-mines. The large number of men employed in this class of mining, and those depending on them, deserve every encouragement, and some assistance should be granted to test the deep levels. If the test proves successful a new era will be opened up in the history of mining in the colony, and profitable employment will be afforded for a much larger population.

With the view of obtaining all information regarding the likelihood of finding gold-bearing quartz at greater depths than have hitherto been worked, an arrangement was made with the Government of Victoria to send a mining geologist to visit this colony to make an examination of our auriferous lodes in the different mining districts. A report by Mr. R. A. F. Murray, F.G.S., of the Mines Department of Victoria, on this subject has been laid on the table.

Encouragement should also be given to mining associations and local bodies to enable them to prospect the back-country. It is not to be assumed that every party will meet with success, but a great deal of useful work has been done in the past in this direction by prospecting associations. In particular, I may mention the Rimu Prospecting Association on the West Coast, which has carried on operations in a systematic and economical manner for several years, and has recently opened up a new field between the branches of the Kanieri River. The extent of this is not yet known, but sufficient gold has been got to warrant mining operations being carried on.

It may also be noted that it was with Government assistance that the lode now being worked by the Waihi Gold-mining Company, at Waihi, from which excellent returns are being obtained, was first discovered. There is yet plenty of country comparatively unexplored, or where, at least, no prospecting has been done, which is likely to contain a vast amount of mineral wealth, and the large number of people employed in mining are entitled to some recognition of the benefits the colony has derived from their labours in the past, by granting them some assistance towards developing the industry in the future.

The total amount expended in subsidies for prospecting during the past twelve years has been £15,713, the amount expended last year being £1,592.

GEOLOGICAL EXPLORATION.

During the past year, Mr. A. McKay, the Mining Geologist, was engaged in exploring and tracing the auriferous quartz drifts in Otago, and the result of his explorations is likely to be the opening-up of new ground in this locality. Wherever these old quartz drifts occur they are found to be gold-bearing, and to contain layers or bands which are extremely rich. This has been the case at Mount Buster, St. Bathans, Tinker's, and elsewhere.

It is intended to get the whole of the gold-fields of the colony carefully examined, and a geological map prepared showing the different formations, their sequence and major faults or displacements, as far as can be gathered from an examination of the country, so that in time we may have a reliable map which will be a great guide to those who carry on prospecting operations in search of gold or other minerals. A map of the Otago goldfield east of Lake Wakatipu, explored last year, has been published with departmental reports.

I would also call the attention of honourable members to a geological report and map prepared by Mr. James Park, who has been employed as Instructor and Lecturer at the Thames School of Mines for the last five years. The information was obtained in the prosecution of his duties, and while exploring the field with his students. The lodes with their displacements and breaks are shown on the map, and can be seen by any one at a glance.

MINING MACHINERY.

In order to give all the latest information with regard to mining machinery and appliances for the reduction and treatment of metalliferous ores, I have directed that full publicity be given in the departmental reports to any system brought under the notice of the department which would be likely to prove of interest to persons connected with mining. It is only by new appliances and improvements in mining machinery that we can hope to arrive at a more perfect and economical method for the recovery of metals so as to make our numerous low-grade ores pay for working. In the Inspecting Engineer's Report on Goldfields, pages 125 to 150, will be found several descriptions and plans of mining machinery and processes for the treatment of auriferous ores.

SCHOOLS OF MINES.

The progress made by the students attending the Schools of Mines has induced the Government to grant a scholarship for a term of three years at the Otago University to one student from each of the schools at the Thames, Reefton, and Dunedin, on their getting the number of marks prescribed by the regulations. The subjects for examination are: Mining, Pumping and Winding, Ventilation of Mines, the Composition and Use of Explosives, Mining and Land-surveying, Geology, and Drawing. To be able to pass in some of these subjects students will require to have a good knowledge of mathematics, and therefore this subject was not made compulsory. These scholarships are offered as an incentive to young men to continue their studies at these schools.

It is gratifying to know that most of the students who have attended the Thames School, and passed through a three-years course, have readily obtained employment—some as assayers to mining companies, others being employed by the Cassel Company in carrying on leaching operations with cyanide of potassium. A number of middle-aged men have also attended the evening classes, which enabled them to pass their examinations and obtain certificates as mine-managers.

The average number of students attending the Thames School during the last year was ninety-one: of this number, forty were regular students, and fifty-one attended Saturday lectures only. Thirteen parcels of ore were treated with the experimental plant, amounting in the aggregate to 21,610lb. All appliances necessary to treat pulverised ore by the cyanide process have been added to the experimental plant, so that any one can now have small parcels of ore tested by the most modern methods at a reasonable cost.

The progress made at the Reefton School during the past year has not been so good as formerly: this is due to the conductor having to give more of his time to outlying schools on the West Coast. It is found that unless continuous teaching is adhered to a good attendance cannot be secured, neither can satisfactory progress be made.

There was a good attendance at the School of Mines at Dunedin last year. The course of lectures at this school occupies a term of six months in the year, during the vacation many of the students going to work in the mines; so that, as far as technical teaching is concerned, the students at the Thames School pursue their studies for a longer space of time in a three-years course than the Dunedin students do in four years.

The total expenditure on Schools of Mines since their inauguration, exclusive of the amounts contributed towards the School of

Mr. Cadman

Mines connected with the Otago University, has been £12,896: of this amount, £1,604 has been expended on buildings, £948 on chemicals and school requisites, and £10,349 on salaries of instructors. Last year the expenditure amounted to £1,056. The total contribution given towards the School of Mines at the Otago University, including £500 paid last year, amounts to £4,250.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURE ON WORKS.

The total value of works authorised since votes were placed under the control of the Minister of Mines has been £499,325. Of this amount, £323,561 was paid by Government, and £94,246 by local bodies, prospecting associations, and mining companies. These works consist of subsidised roads and tracks, £130,220; roads constructed by direct grants, £153,580; water-races, £56,847; drainage-channels, £21,401; prospecting-works, £53,153; wharves, £436; diamond and other drills, assistance given towards the treatment of ores, and artesian-well boring, £6,590; Schools of Mines, inclusive of the amount paid towards the school in connection with Otago University, £17,145: making a total of £499,325. Of this amount, the Government has paid £323,561, and the liabilities on the works in progress on the 31st March last amounted to £21,518. A detailed statement of the cost and expenditure on these works will be found in the tables annexed to the report of the Inspecting Engineer, pages 238 to 246.

MINING LEGISLATION.

I have deemed it desirable to have a consolidation of the Mining Companies Act, and a Bill has been prepared accordingly. The only alteration proposed is in regard to the transfer of shares, it being intended to make more stringent provisions to enforce registration. It is also proposed to enforce the winding-up of mining companies which cease to hold three consecutive meetings of shareholders, and to make the Official Assignee liquidator of such companies. This is found necessary, as there are companies in existence which do not hold any mining property, but are, nevertheless, required to make yearly returns, and some of these companies have held no meetings for years, the directors taking no interest in the matter. The date of publishing returns, from the month of January to the month of March, will also be altered, so as to give time to get the necessary information from companies whose head offices are not in the colony.

It is also proposed to ask Parliament to vote a considerable sum of money this session in order to meet the growing demands which necessarily arise in the mining districts—

- (1.) For aid to further develop the lower levels in quartz-reefing districts;
- (2.) For the construction of water-races and storage reservoirs;
- (3.) For compensation arising from the proclamation of rivers, streams, and creeks as watercourses into which tailings and other débris can be deposited;

- (4.) For the payment of compensation for the resumption of land held under occupation licenses and residence sites.

As a very large amount will be required for some years to come, it is to be hoped that Parliament will see its way to give the necessary assistance by annual appropriations, in order to allay the feeling which seems to be gaining ground in our mining centres that the encouragement Parliament always seems willing to afford the farming, dairying, and other industries of the colony is gradually being withheld from the mining industry.

Provision will also be made for battery superintendents to have full control of and be responsible for all the machinery and appliances for the reduction and treatment of ore where cyanide of potassium and other chemicals are used. Further provision will also be made for carrying on dredging operations on foreshores.

CLAIMS FOR REWARDS.

As a large number of petitions are presented to the House every year claiming rewards for the early discoveries of many of the goldfields, I think it would be desirable for the House to express some general opinion on this question. Rewards for the discoveries of future goldfields are provided for in the existing regulations.

CONCLUSION.

In concluding my remarks, I would point out that the mining industry has formed a large factor in the advancement of the colony. From 1861 to 1866 emigration poured in from all parts of the world, and a large number of people found profitable employment on our goldfields. Many of these made considerable sums of money in following up a digger's life, which they invested in the purchase and cultivation of land. Many people from the Australian Colonies were also attracted here by the discovery of gold, bringing considerable sums of money with them, and making homes for themselves in the colony, which possesses an invigorating climate, a great extent of rich arable and pastoral land, large areas containing auriferous drifts, metalliferous and mineral lodes, and a quality of gold which cannot be surpassed, together with an almost unlimited water-supply, which can be utilised as a motive-power to drive machinery. New Zealand is pre-eminently a country suitable for mining, for the establishment of industries, and for the investment of capital. The mining industry opens up a field for the employment of the working-classes whereby they can earn an independent livelihood; but, in order to give greater facilities for the extension of this industry, a further expenditure is required in opening up the country by roads and tracks, and in granting assistance towards the development of our mineral wealth. By so doing we shall open up new fields, where our surplus labour can be profitably utilised; and, if men cannot make large wages, they will at least earn a fair livelihood. The proposed legislation to give a good tenure to small plots of land on the goldfields will give the miners an incentive to remain on the land, and to employ their spare labour in the cultivation of the soil.

I trust my lengthened remarks on mining have not wearied honourable members. The importance of the question demands considerable attention; and, as we have a large extent of hilly country which is only suitable for pastoral and mining pursuits, it is our duty to utilise this to the best advantage, and furnish a means of enabling the working-classes to find profitable employment.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

Mr. REEVES brought up the following reasons for dissenting from the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill, and moved, That the reasons be agreed to, and transmitted to the Council:—

“The amendment made by the Legislative Council in clause 2, by which all shops in which hired labour is not employed are exempted from the operation of the Act, is not desirable, for the following reasons:—

“Under the existing law all persons employed in shops, whether paid or simply maintained, are entitled to a weekly half-holiday. But under this Act, as amended by the Council, unpaid assistants will cease to be entitled to any holiday. An unpaid shop-assistant, however, is at least as deserving of a half-holiday as a paid assistant, if anything rather more so.

“It is believed that the amendment will not be just to those shopkeepers who pay their assistants, seeing that to punish a shopkeeper by loss of business because he pays the labour he employs, and to reward with increase of business the shopkeeper who manages to employ labour without paying it, is not in accord with any principle of equity. Again, the amendment would appear to permit a shopkeeper, the father of a family, to refuse to his own children the half-holiday which he would have to grant to a hired labourer.

“If the amendment before mentioned was put in with any intention of preventing interference with shops worked by the co-operation of families, then it must be pointed out that it has far overshot the mark, for one of the largest classes of shopkeepers exempted by it will be the Chinese, amongst whom in New Zealand family life notoriously does not exist.

“Moreover, it is submitted that shopkeepers, who now employ one or more assistants, who are boys or girls, at a small weekly wage, will be able to evade the Act by merely giving these persons board, or board and lodging, in lieu of money payment. It is surely not desirable to put on the statute-book an enactment which thus leaves open an easy way to wholesale evasion. Further, it is submitted that, though it may be just to exempt certain trades wholly from the operation of this Bill, it cannot be just to exempt some of the shopkeepers in a trade while at the same time leaving the rest of the shopkeepers in that very trade subject to the Act.

“It is submitted that most of the small shopkeepers are willing and anxious to close on a half-holiday, provided all have to close together. For instance, it cannot be irrelevant to this issue to draw attention to the support to general compulsory closing given in the House of Representatives by nearly all the members representing the ten or twelve largest towns and their suburbs. It is in these constituencies that the smaller shopkeepers are most numerous, and where the voting-powers of their families, themselves, and their friends would be most conspicuously shown. It is undoubted that they form there a very powerful class numerically, and one keenly alive to its own interests. Nor can there be any suggestion that this point has not been clearly laid before the smaller shopkeepers. It is a matter of public knowledge that they have been emphatically and repeatedly warned that general closing would injure and ruin them. The question has been debated in Parliament, on the platform, and in the newspapers for years. The verdict of the last general election may therefore be assumed to have been given deliberately, and with a full knowledge of all aspects of the case.

“It is also desirable to draw the Council's attention to the repeated affirmations of the principle of this Bill by the House of Representatives. This is the fourth successive year in which a Government Bill containing a provision for the general compulsory closing of shops on a half-holiday has been passed by the elective branch of the Legislature.

“Between the third and the fourth year a general election intervened, the result of which was not in any way to diminish the large majority in favour of the Bill.

“While the Bill was passing through the Committee of the House of Representatives an amendment was given notice of similar to that subsequently made by the Council. The Minister in charge at once stated that the Government considered such an amendment would affect the Bill so vitally that if it were passed the Bill must be dropped. The importance therefore now attached to the Council's amendment is not in any way an afterthought.

“Finally, it is submitted, as regards this amendment, that the number of small shopkeepers who depend for any considerable portion of their trade upon keeping open on a half-holiday must be exceedingly small. It is true that such a shopkeeper, if questioned, will often say that his or her livelihood depends upon the ability to keep the shop open when larger shops are closed. But in most cases that refers to the question of what is known as ‘early closing’ as distinguished from ‘half-holiday closing.’ It is admitted that very strong objection was taken to the Early Closing Bill of 1891; but that was not this Bill. This Bill only stops the evening trading on one day a week.

“Passing to clause 3, there appears no valid reason why hairdressers should not close on some afternoon in the week, though possibly not on the general half-holiday. They might be put in the same class with butchers and photographers. But it is submitted that the power to fix a special day for special trades should not be confined to these three trades, but should be left in the hands of the local bodies.

Mr. Cadman

"In new clause 9 the second and third paragraphs do not appear to be so worded as to exactly express the meaning sought to be conveyed by them.

"As to new clause numbered 16A, it is suggested that it was possibly not the intention of the Council to enact by statute that cashiers and bookkeepers must remain in offices after 5 p.m. to balance, but rather to permit them to do so. It is suggested also that further provision should be made for overtime at the half-yearly balances and on mail-days."

Motion agreed to.

NEW PLYMOUTH HARBOUR.

Mr. McGUIRE asked the Colonial Treasurer, Will the Government give a day in order to discuss the New Plymouth Harbour question, with respect to the endowments of the Board, the bondholders, ratepayers, and the financial aspect generally, as a day spent in this way will be to the best interests of New Zealand, particularly at the present time; and will also give an opportunity to new members to make themselves thoroughly acquainted with the question, which is so little understood by the House? The action of the Government in respect of this matter was being closely watched at Home, and if they did not act straightforwardly, honestly, and honourably in the matter he was afraid they would seriously injure the credit of the colony. The question was therefore very important not only to the ratepayers affected, but to the colony. It was the duty of the Treasurer to look at the question from many aspects—from the bondholders' aspect, from the ratepayers' aspect, and from a colonial and financial aspect. If attention was not given to the latter aspect, the Government might find themselves boycotted on the London money-market. He therefore trusted the Colonial Treasurer would give him a favourable answer, and allow a day to be set aside for the consideration of this important matter. It would be desirable to afford the young members an opportunity of making themselves fully acquainted with this important question.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—Oh!

Mr. McGUIRE said he did not know that the honourable member for Invercargill understood anything about the matter, which was really a very important question. He trusted the Treasurer would reply that he was willing it should be considered in all its aspects, as the question asked by him (Mr. McGuire) was one seriously affecting the honour of the Government and of the House.

3.0. Mr. WARD said his honourable friend had asked when an opportunity would be given to enable honourable members to make themselves thoroughly acquainted with this question. He had heard the honourable member for Egmont himself, on more than one occasion, hold forth for a considerable time on this subject, as a reference to Hansard would show. He was perfectly sure that, as a reasonable man, his honourable friend would recognise that there was still very important business to be considered this session, and it was therefore highly improbable that a day could be set aside for the purpose of discussing this matter. Of course, if the business could be proceeded with in such a way as to enable this to be done, it would be very gratifying to the Government to give the honourable gentleman the opportunity he asked for.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Government, Whether, as the colony is committed up to the present to the extent of £2,000,000 by way of guarantee for the Bank of New Zealand's stability, it is the intention that the colony continue the risk of the bank's carrying on business in Australia and other places outside of New Zealand and not subject to the control of the Parliament of this colony? As the future of this colony was very much concerned in the question he had on the Order Paper, he hoped that the Colonial Treasurer would rise to the occasion, and give the House full information as to the Government's intentions in relation to this very important matter.

Mr. WARD said the Government hoped in the next few days to be able to announce the appointment of a President to this institution, and he thought the honourable gentleman would see that the Government could scarcely deal with the matter under the present condition of affairs, or until they had appointed the President.

WAITEKAURI TELEPHONE.

Mr. W. KELLY asked the Postmaster-General, If he will authorise telephone communication to be established at Waitekauri, Thames Goldfield?

Mr. WARD said it had been found that there would be a deficit of £14 a year if this line was constructed; but if a local subsidy to the extent of £56 was subscribed the line would be proceeded with.

TE AUTE COLLEGE.

Mr. PARATA asked the Native Minister, Whether the Government will set aside a sum out of the Civil List to pay for medical attendance at Te Aute College, Hawke's Bay? His reason for asking this question was that of late years Native and half-caste children had been affected by illness at the Te Aute College. The parents of those children were unable to be there when the children were ill, and consequently in many cases they died, owing principally to the fact that most of the parents were not in a position to pay for medical attendance.

Mr. SEDDON said inquiries would be made into this matter. When in the North at the beginning of the present year his attention was called to the same question by a number of Natives, who said they feared to send their children to this institution for the same reason as stated by the honourable gentleman. He would see what could be done.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Government, Whether, in the interests of the colony, early action will be taken to insist upon a separation of the Estates Company from the Bank of New Zealand, so as to simplify and to lessen the risk of the colony in connection with its guarantee to the Bank of New Zealand?

Mr. WARD said the Government would wait for the guidance of the President who was shortly to be appointed to this institution, before taking any action.

NEW ZEALAND LOAN AND MERCANTILE AGENCY COMPANY.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Government, Whether steps will be taken immediately to ascertain, for the information of this House, to what extent, if any, the New Zealand Loan and Mercantile Agency Company—either the old company, the new, or both—is in any way concerned in its financial relations with the Bank of New Zealand; and, if either company or bank is indebted to the other, to what extent, and how long has any such debt existed? He hoped the Treasurer, in answering this question, would indicate to the House what the Government's intentions were in reference to the duties of the two officers that were to be appointed in respect to the bank and this company, and at what times they would perform their respective duties.

Mr. WARD said the President of this institution would be required to devote his services exclusively to the business of the institution, and his duties would be entirely under the control of the colony, and would be of such a character as to safeguard the interests of the colony generally. The question which the honourable gentleman put was one the answer to which would require a statement of details that, in the ordinary course of business, could not be furnished for publicity. He might say, in connection with this important matter, that the President of the institution would require to ascertain for himself what the position was, and, if it was an unsatisfactory position, he would be required to report to the Treasurer of the day.

LOCAL RATING.

Mr. WILSON asked the Colonial Treasurer, If the Commissioner of Taxes has had any replies from the various local bodies of the colony to his circular re valuation for rating purposes? If so, what is the nature of the replies, and if they are against his proposal,—that the local bodies should pay all cost of valuation, and supply a copy for the mere cost of copying,—will the Government pay a fair share of the cost of such valuation?

Mr. WARD might state that the Commissioner of Taxes had received replies from the various local bodies. The circular containing the proposal was sent to sixty-four counties, and to thirty-nine Road Boards in which the Counties Act was not in operation. Two-thirds of these bodies had replied, twenty-eight accepting the proposal and eight declining. Twenty-four forwarded a copy of a resolution apparently sent round by the Taranaki County Council. Three answers were vague, and one offered to pay for the valuation if the department would make it. Those who forwarded the Taranaki resolution did not, apparently, consider the proposal on its merits. The valuations, which the department would probably have asked for copies of, would have been those of land-tax-paying estates only—an average of perhaps one in ten of the properties on some rolls and one in fifty on others. He might state that after this year subsidies would be payable on rolls which had not been prepared in the Land- and Income-tax Office. If there was any further information required by the honourable gentleman he would be happy to furnish it to him by correspondence.

Mr. Seddon

LOCAL BODIES' "THIRDS" AND "FOURTHS."

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Colonial Treasurer, Where, on the 31st March last, was the sum of £28,799 8s. 10d., referred to in Return No. 183 as the total which, on the date mentioned, was to the credit of the various local bodies in respect of "thirds" and "fourths"? Some days ago he had asked the Colonial Treasurer in which of the several accounts attached to the Financial Statement this sum of £28,799 8s. 10d., referred to in Return No. 183 as the total of the debt mentioned to the various local bodies, appeared. The reply was, In none. He had been led to suppose that the tables attached to the Financial Statement contained information concerning all moneys connected with the public accounts. He would now like to know where that sum of £28,799 8s. 10d. was to be found.

Mr. WARD said that the amount referred to could be found in the Deposit Accounts of the various Receivers of Land Revenue throughout the colony.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Then, it does not appear in the tables attached to the Financial Statement?

Mr. WARD.—No.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Premier, Will the Government, in accordance with the report of the Committee appointed by this House to consider the question of old-age pensions, appoint a Royal Commission to inquire fully into, and take evidence upon, the matter during the recess, so that Parliament may be fully prepared to legislate in this direction early next session? A considerable amount of interest was taken in this question by a large number of people in the colony, and he hoped to receive a favourable answer.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable member was quite correct in saying that there was a very large number of people who desired that an old-age-pension scheme should be established. The matter had been referred to a Committee of the House, and that Committee had reported. He thought he was speaking the mind of every member of that Committee when he said that, although it looked a somewhat small question when they commenced their investigation, yet before they had gone into the subject very far they found it most complicated and difficult to deal with. He did not think, himself, that a Commission would solve this problem. He thought it would take the united brains of those who represented the people in this country to deal effectively with this very difficult matter. This problem should not be left to two or three persons to solve.

BUSH-BURNING.

Mr. WILSON asked the Minister of Lands, If he will during the recess make such inquiries as will enable him to bring in a Bill relating to the burning of bush? A Bill had been introduced in Parliament to deal with the question of bush-burning some years ago, but nothing had been done since. Every now and then a case cropped up, and there was no law to deal with it. There was a case in his district which entailed a serious loss to a man, which had there been an Act would not have occurred. He hoped the Minister would be able to give answer to his question in the affirmative.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said no special representations had been made to the Government in connection with the matter, and he was afraid it would be a very difficult matter to legislate upon. There, however, could be no harm in requesting the department to make inquiries from the various officers in the land districts, so as to obtain necessary information in the event of legislation to deal with the question next session.

CHEVIOT SCHOOLS.

Mr. MEREDITH asked the Minister of Education, As so many families are now resident on Cheviot, with the prospect of several additional families settling there within the next few months, what provision does the Government intend making to place in the hands of the Education Board of the district sufficient funds to provide five schools, now urgently required — namely, at McKenzie, Waiau, Froghall, Domett, and Port Robinson? He would point out the necessity for special provision being made for the education of these children. It was now eleven months since a portion of the Cheviot Estate was disposed of, so that some of the families had been there about ten months. From the latest information in his possession he found that in the places he had named in his question there were the following numbers of children between the ages of five and twelve years: McKenzie, 45; Waiau, 29; Froghall, 26; Domett, 24; and Port Robinson, 33. He might say that he had placed this question on the Order Paper in consequence of receiving from a lady on Cheviot the following letter, dated "Port Robinson, 24th September, 1894":—

"DEAR SIR,—I have been requested by the mothers of this district, at a meeting held at Port Robinson, on Wednesday, the 19th instant, to communicate with you on the subject of getting a school for our children as soon as possible. I have enclosed a list of parents and the number of the children each of us have ready for school. I have also written at their desire to the Hon. W. P. Reeves on the same subject. We hope, Mr. Meredith, you will use your influence on our behalf, as a school is a boon we mothers will know how to appreciate, after the long holiday our olive-branches have enjoyed.—Yours respectfully, —"

Now, such an appeal as that the Minister of Education could not possibly resist; and it would be exceedingly gratifying to the mothers on the estate, and also to the male portion of the population, if the Minister of Education placed a special sum on the estimates to provide schools for these people. To supply five schools was more than the Education Board of the district could do out of the ordinary vote which they received. Therefore he appealed to the Government for consideration in this matter.

Mr. REEVES said he should be delighted to please the mothers, and to please the honourable gentleman who so ably represented them. When the honourable member last asked this question he told him that the special requirements of the district would be taken into consideration when the school-buildings vote was distributed. He really could not add anything to that, nor did he wish to take anything away from it. It was not unusual in outlying parts of the country for settlement to go on so rapidly that special provision had to be made for it. The department always did its best to take such cases fairly into consideration when the vote was being distributed. That was an unusual circumstance in their part of the country he was sorry to say, and therefore the honourable gentleman was not aware of the practice of the department in that respect. That had been the practice, and he hoped that what the department would do would satisfy the honourable gentleman.

OTARA BLOCK.

Mr. McNAB asked the Minister of Lands, When he proposes to place the Otara Block, adjoining the Township of Waikawa, in the market?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said it was proposed to open this land for selection under the Land Act as soon as possible.

ACETIC ACID.

Mr. J. W. KELLY asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he will offer a bonus for the manufacture of acetic acid within the colony? He had been requested by a correspondent to put this question, as he was very anxious about it, and was prepared to go in for the manufacture.

of this article if encouragement were given to him.

Mr. WARD was sorry he could not give the honourable gentleman a favourable answer.

DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK'S VISIT.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON asked the Premier, If there is any truth in the rumour that the Government has joined with one or more of the Australian Governments in inviting the Duke and Duchess of York to visit Australasia?

Mr. SEDDON said that some months ago the Premier of Victoria, Sir James Patterson, communicated with the New Zealand Government, and with the other Australasian Governments, asking them to co-operate in inviting His Royal Highness and the Duchess of York to visit the colonies, and he believed that in joining in that invitation the Government were doing that which Her Majesty's subjects in this colony would heartily indorse.

"ARAB" AND "SHAH" TEAS.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Justice, Is not the mode of business set forth in the following advertisement an infringement of the Gaming and Lotteries Act; and, if so, should not means be taken to prevent such illegitimate trading: "'Arab' and 'Shah' Teas.—Look out for the cash presents enclosed with tea. As these famous teas have now gained such a thorough hold on the public taste, the proprietors have decided to discontinue a great portion of their advertising, and to give their customers the benefit of the money thus saved. To effect this, a large number of cash orders for 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s. each will, after 1st June, be enclosed in many of the packets and tins containing the tea. These cash orders (printed on pink paper) will be payable through the storekeeper from whom the tea has been procured, or from the wholesale (N.Z.) agents"? An advertisement of this description had appeared in a Christchurch newspaper. The name of the advertiser was not given, because it did not appear; but he would like to get the opinion of the Government regarding it. It seemed to him to be a very objectionable mode of trading, and was not what could be called honest and fair trade. Mr. Newnes, the proprietor of Tit-Bits,—who, by the way, was a member of the British Parliament,—was interdicted from a course of action which, by payments to those who correctly solved literary puzzles, had resulted in an immense circulation being obtained for his newspaper. That practice was stopped very summarily by process of law, as it was considered to be leading to a certain amount of gambling. If that was the law in England, and if such objectionable practices were resorted to in this colony as were set forth in this question, then it was desirable that they should know what our law was in that respect.

Mr. REEVES said the department would make inquiries into the matter, and, if it should appear there was any infringement of the law, action would be taken.

Mr. J. W. Kelly

FLAX.

Mr. WILSON asked the Minister of Agriculture, When the reports of the Committee of experts appointed to inquire into the applications for the flax-bonus will be laid on the table of this House?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE was sorry he could not give a date when this report would be ready. The Committee appointed for the purpose of making this inquiry were at work at the present time, and had a number of machines to examine before they could report. Consequently he was not in a position to state when that report would be ready, but as soon as it was ready he would lay it on the table.

NORTH ISLAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. LAWRY asked the Minister for Public Works,—(1.) If he is aware that the business now before the Railways Committee will occupy the whole time the Committee will have during the present session, and for this reason they will be unable effectively to deal with the question of deciding the best route for the North Island Main Trunk Railway line? (2.) Will he, during the recess, set up a Royal Commission for the purpose of making an exhaustive inquiry into the whole question relative to the North Island Main Trunk Railway line, with a view of finally settling the best route for the before-mentioned line? He thought it was quite time that the subject contained in this question should be decided one way or another. It would be in the recollection of honourable members that last year an important Committee was set up by the House, which went very exhaustively into the whole question, taking evidence on oath, and their report was now one of the State documents of the colony. He was very well aware that the Premier stated, in reply to the honourable member for Eden, that he would refer the whole question to the Railway Committee that had been set up this session. But he (Mr. Lawry), as a member of that Committee, knew the work that Committee had to do, and it would only be a sham to refer it to that Committee, because the Committee had neither the time nor the opportunity to take it in hand. This was a matter of great importance to the whole of the North Island. He was aware that the railway could not be made without money, any more than the Egyptians of old could make bricks without straw; but that did not prevent an agitation of the whole question as to the route, and he hoped the Premier would give a favourable reply to this question, and would set up an independent Royal Commission to report next session, so that the question of route might be settled once and for ever.

Mr. SEDDON said that if the question could be settled once and for ever probably there would be no objection to the course indicated; but he undertook to say, whatever way the Commission reported, the part of the colony reported against would bring it up next session, and would want another Royal Commission. He had little doubt that would be the result. What was wanted more than a Commission was an indication to the Government as to where the means to construct the railway were to come from. The money at the present time available was less than £80,000; consequently it should not exercise the minds of members very much as to where that money would be expended. Without forestalling the Public Works Statement, he might say that there would be a very fair division of what was left, and it would be so expended as to give the greatest amount of benefit derivable from such expenditure.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—You are shuffling now.

Mr. SEDDON said he admitted that circumstances were altered, and for this reason: that the honourable member had asked that the line be taken through viâ Waitara, and the report received was of such a damning nature that they had to leave the Waitara route, the same being impracticable. Probably another and better route might be discovered.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Where?

Mr. SEDDON could not say where. The question was as to whether there should be a Royal Commission. They had a Railways Committee set up now, and he did not see, himself, the slightest difficulty in the way of that Committee taking Mr. Reynolds's report, Mr. Donkin's report, and Mr. Holmes's report, and bringing down a report to the House which would place the matter fairly before the House and the country. He had gone through these reports carefully, and, after a careful perusal of them, as far as he could see, something more would have to be done if there was to be any change whatever. That was so far as these reports were concerned. Mr. Reynolds's report clearly showed that an expenditure of £50,000 would alter the gradients between Wanganui and Stratford so as to make it a fast-travelling line, and allow of the carriage of goods at reasonable rates. On the other hand, as to the proposed deviation of the central route, the explorations of Mr. Holmes proved that it was almost impossible to deviate the line in that country. That meant that they must adhere, so far as the central route was concerned, to the old route. The explorations had not placed the matter one jot further ahead. He thought, if the Railways Committee went through these reports, the Committee would be able to report this session. He did not think a Royal Commission would help the matter. When more money was available, this question might be further agitated, but the Government did not see their way clear to go to the expense of a Royal Commission.

Mr. LAWHY asked if the Premier did not think the money belonging to this loan that had been spent in the purchase of Native land was an asset.

Mr. SEDDON said there was no doubt Native lands had been purchased by money out of the North Island Trunk Railway Loan, but it was done by direction of Parliament. There was no doubt the funds had been expended for that purpose, but at the same time it was not a liquid asset, and would not, without legislation, be available for further works.

OLD SOLDIERS' PENSIONS.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Minister of Defence, If he will make arrangements that colonial pensions to old soldiers be paid in the same way as English pensions in Auckland? It had been pointed out to him that old soldiers who had shifted to Auckland were put to great inconvenience and delay in receiving their pensions. He had therefore put the question in the hope that the Premier might see his way to having these pensions paid through the Defence Department there in the same way as the Imperial pensioners were paid. Such a system would put an end to considerable inconvenience and delay, and would be much appreciated by those interested in the matter.

3.30. Mr. SEDDON did not exactly understand the question as put. The system of paying colonial pensions was very nearly identical with the method adopted in paying Imperial pensions. If anything, the difference was in favour of the system of paying colonial pensions. If further improvement could be made he would be only too glad to make it. He would confer with the honourable gentleman, and if the honourable member was able to render the Government any assistance in this respect he would be glad.

WANGANUI PRISONERS.

Mr. WILLIS asked the Minister of Justice, Whether he will make inquiries into the statement made by the Wanganui Herald that thirteen prisoners awaiting trial were crowded into two blackholes beneath the Supreme Court last Monday, seven being in one cell and six in another, where there are not sufficient cubic feet of air for more than two persons in each cell? The grounds were very strong indeed for some change being made in the way prisoners awaiting trial were treated at Wanganui. He knew that the facts were as stated by the Herald, that thirteen people were put into these small cells: in fact, the proper name to apply to them would be dungeons. These cells were so dark that it was almost impossible for one person to see another; and when the prisoners were taken out the air was so poisonous that people who came in contact with it felt sick. He himself had visited the place, and he could certify to the truth of the statements made by the Herald.

Mr. REEVES said the Government were inquiring into the matter; and, in spite of what the honourable gentleman had said, they had some reason to think that inquiry would show that instead of there being two cells there was only one. But, in case the honourable gentleman's view of the matter turned out to be correct, he could assure the honourable member that he would do his best to prevent such a state of things from continuing any longer, because it certainly would not be at all proper.

SYRIAN HAWKERS.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Premier, If he proposes to bring in legislation this session to prevent the influx of Syrian hawkers, male and female? As the number of Syrian hawkers had largely increased, and as the Hawkers and Pedlars Bill had not come up, he would like to ask the Government if they would introduce a short Bill of two or three clauses, like the New South Wales Act, to stop any further influx of these people.

Mr. REEVES thought the Bill was in the pigeon-holes now: at any rate, it would be there within an hour.

CAVERSHAM TELEPHONE.

Mr. MORRISON asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he will take into consideration the petition of Mr. Hatton and others, to provide the petitioners with a telephone service to Caversham at a rate based on the exact mileage from Dunedin, and without requiring a five-years guarantee?

Mr. WARD said the request of the petitioners had already been granted. Caversham subscribers to the Dunedin Exchange would be charged for the distance measured by the Main South Road, and if this measurement brought intending subscribers within two miles of the Exchange a five-years guarantee would not be required. Beyond two miles the usual bond to keep the connection for five years must be given.

COLONIAL BANK.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Colonial Treasurer, If there is any foundation for the statement that negotiations are on foot for giving the Colonial Bank the whole or a share of the Public Account?

Mr. WARD might say that some short time ago the Colonial Bank applied for a third of the Government account. The matter had not then been considered. It was now under consideration.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. O'REGAN asked the Government, If they will explain, for the information of this House, what are the defined and respective duties of the President and Auditor of the Bank of New Zealand, after the appointments have been made, in relationship between the bank and the Government, as the chairman of the Bank of New Zealand meeting yesterday is reported to have said, "The Government will know nothing more about the confidential affairs of the bank in the future than it has known in the past"; and, if that is the case, of what avail will be the appointment of these high officials?

Mr. WARD said that the duty of the President was to conserve the interests of the colony—to protect the colony so far as its guarantee of two millions to that institution was concerned, and to see that no improper business was conducted, and generally to exercise a supervision over the conduct of the affairs of the institution in the interests of the State, which had given the guarantee. The duties of the Auditor were to audit and check the transactions in connection with the institution.

Dr. Newman

Mr. O'REGAN.—What about Mr. Murray's statement?

Mr. WARD presumed the honourable member did not wish that the ordinary private affairs of the customers of the bank were to be communicated to the Government. He might inform the honourable member that the practice would not be so. What would be done would be that the President, as representing the colony, would of course be fully cognisant of everything that was done, and if anything improper was done it would then be his duty to communicate with the Government.

E. S. W. BUTLER.

Major STEWARD asked the Government, Whether they will give effect to the report of the A to L Petitions Committee upon the petition of E. S. W. Butler? The petitioner in this case set forth that he had been put to expense, inconvenience, and disgrace through the conduct of the Deputy Assignee in Bankruptcy at Oamaru. He prayed for redress. The Committee reported on the case as follows:—

"That as the Deputy Assignee entered into an agreement with petitioner to the effect that, in event of petitioner signing a certain deed, his discharge in bankruptcy would not be opposed, and as the Assignee now opposes the said discharge on the ground that the petitioner has since appealed to Parliament, the Committee are of opinion that the Government should cause an inquiry to be made into the case."

The petitioner had been waiting in Wellington for some days. He (Major Steward) had been asked to postpone this question until that day, and he hoped the Government would now be able to give an answer of a favourable nature.

Mr. REEVES said the matter was sub judice. The District Judge had been appointed to inquire into the application. It was therefore quite clear that the petitioner should bring the conduct of the Assignee, if he objected to it, before the Court. The Assignee was an officer of the Court, and was therefore amenable to it. It was scarcely the place of the Government to interfere with the litigation.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND GLOBO ASSETS.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Colonial Treasurer,—(1.) If the Government propose to allow the Bank of New Zealand to pay off the debentures of the Globo Assets out of the guaranteed loan? (2.) If not, to what other purpose is the £1,000,000 to be devoted which is under the control of the Treasurer? As the session was drawing to a close it was only right that the House and the country should have an answer to this question. He asked the question some time ago, and now repeated it.

Mr. WARD might inform the honourable member that the Government would consider what was the best course to follow when the money to which the honourable member referred had been paid into the institution. As a matter of fact, the greater portion of the two millions subscribed would not be paid in until the 26th of this month.

Dr. NEWMAN.—Surely the honourable gentleman knows what is going to be done with it.

Mr. WARD said the honourable member must recognise that this was a very difficult and a very important matter. It was a matter upon which a light answer ought not to be called for from the Treasurer. There might be many things which would influence the final decision of the Government. The Government as a whole would require to deal with an important matter such as that was. He might say, for the information of the honourable gentleman, that nothing had yet been done in the matter. If an investment in the Globo Assets debentures was found to be desirable in the interests of the country, that might be a suitable investment for a portion of the money to be made in. But he might inform the honourable gentleman that no decision had been arrived at yet, inasmuch as the money had not yet been subscribed. As the honourable gentleman knew, this was an important matter, and he was sure the honourable gentleman did not want the Government to hastily decide in regard to the investment of such a large sum of money. The Government would require to give great care and attention to the matter, and he need only add that if he had been in a position to give the honourable gentleman an answer he would readily have done so.

Dr. NEWMAN asked if the honourable gentleman would give an answer before the session terminated.

Mr. WARD would not undertake to do that. The responsibility must fall upon the Government, and the House must be prepared to leave the Government the responsibility of dealing with this matter. If the investment was made before the session was over he would be only too happy to inform the House accordingly. The matter, as he had said, was one of considerable importance, and it would receive most careful attention from the Government.

GUARANTEED BANKS AMALGAMATION PROHIBITION BILL.

Mr. BELL asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether he will, on behalf of the Government, take charge of the Guaranteed Banks Amalgamation Prohibition Bill introduced by the member for Wellington City; or will he himself introduce a measure to effect the objects proposed by that Bill?

Mr. WARD said the Government would not take up the honourable gentleman's Bill upon the question to which he referred, and he might add that the Government were of opinion that, under proper safeguards, in the interests of the colony, the amalgamation referred to would have been very desirable; and it was still so.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. McGUIRE begged leave to move the adjournment of the House. He was compelled to do so on account of the very unsatisfactory answer which he had received from the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer to a question he had asked. The New Plymouth Harbour question was an important one, affecting a very large number of settlers, who had his sincerest and most heartfelt sympathy. The question affected the character of the Government for honour and honesty, and also the character of the members of the House, in the Mother Country. The question, if not given consideration to, might also seriously embarrass the Government on the London money-market, and therefore should not be treated lightly as heretofore. To show what was felt about this matter, he would read an extract from a letter which he had received by last mail from the vice-president of the bondholders, Mr. Busby. That gentleman said,—

“Our newspapers here publish periodical reports of cablegrams from New Zealand pointing out the satisfactory financial condition of the colony and its ability to meet all its engagements. I must, however, remind you that the Government of New Zealand has violated the conditions under which the harbour loan was raised, without offering any redress to the bondholders; and I beg to assure you that, should the Government seek to issue any new Government loan upon this market, the Committee of Bondholders will take active and immediate steps to oppose such issue until the Government has done justice to the bondholders. The resolution to adopt this course was communicated to the Premier of your House—the late Hon. Mr. Ballance—and the committee are resolved to carry it into effect should the opportunity arise.”

The letter from which he had made the extract was dated “London, 25th July, 1894.” What was the reason the bondholders took such strong measures against the Government in this matter? It was simply because the bondholders and the people in the harbour rating district had been robbed of a considerable portion of their endowments. In 1874 an Act was passed granting 25 per cent. of the whole of the lands disposed of in the Provincial District of Taranaki by sale or otherwise as an endowment to the harbour. Although that was granted to the harbour in 1874, and also in 1876 by the Financial Arrangement Acts, and still again when the land revenue was consolidated after the abolition of the provinces, the Government in 1879 and 1880 took away from the New Plymouth Harbour Board out of the rating-area 200,000 acres of land. That land was valued by the Property-tax Commissioner at £400,000. Therefore the House had robbed that harbour of £100,000. This surely was sufficient reason for the bondholders taking the action of which the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Bondholders, the Right Hon. Sir John Lubbock, gave notice to the Premier. Had not that land been taken away £100,000 would have been lying to the credit of the Sinking Fund Commissioners, and the settlers whom he (Mr. McGuire) had the honour to represent would not have been compelled to suffer an unjust imposition. This was why he had brought up this matter before the House on so many occasions, and why a Committee was set up during last Parliament to inquire into the merits of the case. That Committee had brought up a report which he had continually pressed the Government to carry out. That report was satisfactory in every way; but, in place of carrying out that report, they used their servile majority in the Public Accounts Committee, and on the floor of the House, for the purpose of reversing the decision of the New Plymouth Harbour Committee. The report in question showed clearly that the settlers and the bondholders had been robbed of their endowments,—that a great outrage had been committed, which it was the duty of the House to redress. Their endowment was taken away not in the interests of the taxpayers interested, or of the bondholders who had lent their money, but in the interest of the whole colony. Now, if it was absolutely necessary to take away that land in the interests of the colony, it was also absolutely necessary, in the interest of justice, that restitution should be made of the value of the land so taken. But not only had the Government evaded the report brought down by the Committee, but they had in every way in their power prevented the House from doing justice to the New Plymouth Harbour. Only the other day the Chairman of the Board came down to the House and asked the Government to consider the financial position of his Board, with a view of reducing the interest from 6 to 4 per cent.; and yet, although they had robbed the district of its endowments, disregarding Acts of Parliament made for the protection of the rights of the people, and on the strength of which they allowed the Harbour Board to borrow £200,000, they would not in the smallest degree assist the settlers nor make restitution for the great injustice inflicted upon them. What could be more outrageous than such conduct? And even their own supporter—the honourable member for New Plymouth—who stuck to them through thick and thin, through right and wrong, could get no assistance from the Government for the unfortunate settlers whom the honourable member represented, who were so unjustly oppressed. No such outrageous injustice had ever been committed in this or any other country. He (Mr. McGuire) had asked that this question should be relegated to a Judge of the Supreme Court, to decide on the lines of honesty, justice, and good conscience, and he was willing to stand or fall by an inquiry on the grounds indicated. This was a most complex and difficult question. Many Acts of Parliament were connected with it. It therefore required a Judge, or some one in that capacity, independent of the Government, one who would have no wire-pulling behind him, and who would act justly and fairly in the interests of the Government, the bondholders, and the settlers, to thoroughly investigate it. But the Government was not prepared to adopt his (Mr. McGuire's) suggestion. Why were they not prepared to adopt it? Because they feared the result of an independent investigation. The bondholders saw all along how unjustly they had been treated, and they would therefore, he believed, take the action they had given notice of. The moment the Government put a loan on the London market, that moment the bondholders would boycott them; and he thought it would be a good thing for the country if it would only have the effect of making the Government have more regard for honest and honourable dealings in the future. Here was a district—perhaps one of the most important in the colony—where many of the settlers had rendered great service to the Government during the war, and the compensation they received for their gallant conduct was to be robbed in the most outrageous and barefaced way by the Government; and yet the same Government a month or so ago cheerfully backed a bill for the Bank of New Zealand to the tune of two millions, but they would not move a foot to assist their own settlers, although they led the people to believe they were working in the true interests of the small and struggling people on the land. Here were eighteen hundred small settlers coming to them for assistance and redress; they could not even spend a day in making inquiries, or go into the matter, which so seriously affected them, and see if justice had been done. The endowment in question had been taken in the interests of the colony, and it was taken by a Royal Commission appointed in order to settle the peace of the country, and to save the credit of the country, because if a shot had been fired at that time our credit would have gone. For, it would be remembered, we had at the time the endowment was taken a five-million loan on the market. It was clear this had been done in the interests of the colony; and now justice demanded that the lands should be valued, and one-fourth of their value placed to the credit of the Sinking Fund Commissioners. Had this been done justice would have been done to the district, and he would not have been there advocating the cause of these unfortunate settlers, who were honestly and honourably struggling against many difficulties to pay their way. He trusted the House would take the matter up, in the interest of the honour of the colony, and compel the gentlemen who temporarily occupied the Treasury benches to act on the lines of justice and honour. If there was any other harbour in New Zealand that had a claim such as they had, in God's name let the Government meet it, and act fairly and justly. But from the day the honourable gentleman became Premier to the present he had never assisted the honourable member for New Plymouth, although that honourable gentleman followed him wherever he might lead. The Hon. the Premier ought to act fairly while he had yet time. He was endeavouring to mislead the people; but the mist in their eyes was clearing away, and they were beginning to see him in his true light as the greatest political deceiver that ever sat on the Treasury benches. The Colonial Treasurer said that the letter he (Mr. McGuire) wrote to the late Colonial Treas-suror was most unjust to the bondholders. If it would not be taking up too much time, he would read that communication to the late Premier and Colonial Treasurer, which would completely dispose of the honourable gentleman's unfounded assertion; and if the proposal he made had been carried out and acted upon the trouble would have been removed and justice done to all parties. The Government of that day acted most unjustly, and he now challenged the Premier to place the question before an independent tribunal. The people in his district were willing to submit it to a Judge of the Supreme Court, who would be independent of the Government, and, whatever decision the Judge arrived at, the settlers were willing to abide by that decision; and he again challenged the Premier, and he hoped the honourable gentleman would take up the challenge and have the question relegated to a Judge of the Supreme Court, and let the report of the Judge's finding be brought up next session. He would now conclude, and reserve any further remarks for his reply.

Mr. McGuire

Mr. E. M. SMITH had no desire to join in the debate, but the honourable member for Egmont had dragged him into it, and he must defend his position. He had on every occasion done his best, both in the last and in the present Parliament, to get redress for the harbour grievance; but after it had been investigated by a Committee, and brought up before the House again and again, he could see plainly they were only wasting the time of the House and the country in dealing with it again that session, as it was evident the Government and the House would do nothing to help the rate-payers. Had they not tested the House over and over again? A deputation from the Harbour Board had waited on the Government and laid their financial position before the Government, and they had replied that they could not accept the responsibility of taking over the harbour debts of the colony, amounting to five millions. He did not wish the honourable member for Egmont to put him in a false position by putting it in Hansard that he (Mr. Smith) had not rendered every assistance in his power to get the case thoroughly investigated. It was well known to honourable members that he had done his best in that way; but he was not going to waste his time and the time of the country by ding-donging at the question in and out of session, when the House would not listen to them, and no vote was to be taken. When the honourable gentleman said the Government had not done anything for the district in harbour matters, he might tell the honourable gentleman that but for the Government coming to the assistance of the harbour the expenditure of £250,000 would have been a sheer waste of money. The harbour would have been spoiled, and the sand would have accumulated, so that the harbour would have now been a thing of the past. But by the Government and the House making provision for dredging the harbour they had saved it, and now the "Takapuna" and the coasting-boats could enter it as well as enter the Wellington Harbour; and the Government should not be slated because they did not see their way to accede to the request of the deputation from the Harbour Board to convert the harbour loan. He did not, however, rise to speak on this question. He rose to speak on an important question not only affecting his own district, but Auckland and other parts of the colony. This was in reference to the North Island Main Trunk Railway. The Premier had stated, in answer to a question, that there would be no necessity to set up a Royal Commission in the matter; and he quite agreed with him. All they wanted was that the Government should faithfully and honestly carry out the recommendations of the House. A Committee had been set up, which, after investigation, had reported, and the result was that their recommendation had been carried into effect. Surveyors had been sent out to explore. But what he did dispute was the information that had been conveyed to the Premier by his officers. Why should a public officer give such information to the head of his department as would override a direct recommendation of a Select Committee and distinct instructions from the House itself? Let anybody read the report, and he would undertake to say the evidence of Mr. Hales, the Engineer-in-Chief, and that of the Survey Engineer, were quite opposed to each other. He wanted to put the House and the country and the Premier in possession of these facts. The Premier had stated that if he had been guided by his officers he would never have sent the survey party out. What did that mean? Then, he said he had withdrawn the survey party at the recommendation of his officers. And why? Had the officer been over the ground? He (Mr. Smith) said, No. Had he devoted sufficient of his time to investigate the case, and make himself acquainted with the facts? He

4.0. went out to Urenui from the hotel after having his lunch, and yet was back in time for his supper. He saw only a short distance of the railway route from the hill-side at Urenui, and yet he came back and told them he was going to withdraw his party. Was that an investigation? No; it was a sheer waste of public money to send a party out, providing they did not carry their survey right through to Taumaranui. They should have evidence brought down and a report submitted to the House this session. From the Sentry Hill Junction to the Upper Waitara Valley there was only a distance of sixteen or seventeen miles, and the country was such that they could make a railway easily. The road was all made, and there was no difficulty in the way; and, in fact, until they got to the dividing-range the only obstacle on the route would be a tunnel of 60 or 65 chains in length. Let them call witnesses and put them on oath as to this survey, and they would find that the statement of the Engineer was incorrect. There was no obstacle in the route to making a railway from the Sentry Hill Junction to Taumaranui, a distance of only sixty-five miles, and, as he had said, there would be only one tunnel in the whole length. The line would run through the Upper Waitara Valley, and there was magnificent land fit for settlement all the way along. Then, once they were over the dividing range to the Teaneraki Valley, they came across the first deposits of coal. There was enough coal there, and the coal was so easily accessible that, with railway communication, for 4s. a ton they could supply the Government with all they required. He defied the Government to dispute the statement he was making. If they were to set up Committees to investigate this matter, and then withdraw the survey party on the slender pretext that the Engineer was going to investigate the case, he had no hesitation in saying it was a waste of public money and a waste also of the time of the country. If the Government had no confidence in Mr. Donkin's survey, let them send a party of their own through, and they would be satisfied with the result. He was glad, at any rate, of the opportunity of putting this in the records of Hansard, in order that the country might see how this Engineer had dealt with the question. He should have gone and camped out in the country through which the line of survey was being carried, and have made himself conversant with the whole thing. He (Mr. Smith) did not interfere with the question of the railway between Wellington and the North, but what he did maintain was this: that they had been promised from the early days of the public-works policy that they should have railway connection between Taranaki and Auckland: and he defied the Government and their Engineers to controvert the statement which he was making, that there was a practicable route to connect Taranaki and Auckland, running up to the Mimi, and for some distance along the coast-line. Then, they had the statement in one of the papers that Mr. Wilson Hursthouse, one of the Government Engineers, had recently gone from the Upper Mokau Railway-station to the Awakino Valley, and that he had reported that there was a splendid route for the proposed railway, with a gradient of 1 in 250. Yet they were going to shelve the question, and all because the Government Engineer made an unfavourable report, when he had not done his work properly. He (Mr. Smith) had always held this officer in high esteem, and had always been on friendly terms with him, and he wished to deal fairly with every officer in the Government service; but when they found such an officer leading the Government astray by making a report that could not be substantiated, it was his (Mr. Smith's) duty, as the representative of an important constituency, and in the interests of both Taranaki and Auckland, to have the matter set right. And, in this connection, he was very sorry to see that the members who had formed a deputation to wait upon the Government in reference to this matter in the early part of the session—he meant the representatives of Auckland—were not in their places now. He wanted the Railway League in Auckland to know that the only members from their district who were in their places in the House while this matter was being ventilated were the honourable member for Parnell and the honourable member for Eden. The others were all absent from the Chamber. He hoped the Premier would, before the session closed, bring him (Mr. Smith) face to face with this Engineer, and would allow the evidence that was now available to be adduced in connection with this matter. Of course, if he could not substantiate what he had stated he would admit that the Engineer was right, and he would not ask for the matter to go further. But he would insist upon exposing, and would do his "level best" to expose, such reports as these, no matter if they were from the Chief Engineer of the colony. He pointed to the fact that a track had been cut from Urenui across to Taumaranui, and the Government had spent only £150 in having that track cut. Then they sent out a surveyor, and he reported that he had been over the track; and then they started this survey headed by Mr. Donkin. If they had lost confidence in that Engineer, they should change him; but, because the Government had no confidence in him, were they to lose this route? They had any amount of people on this line prepared to take up land. They knew it would be one of the best-paying railways in New Zealand. And they would not cease to agitate the matter until a line had been made to connect Taranaki with Auckland. There were nine million acres of land there awaiting development by railways and roads. He knew the Government were doing well in the making of roads in his district, and they were settling the land; but they could not develop the resources of the mineral lands until a railway was made between Taranaki and Auckland. He was prepared to bring evidence which would prove that there was no difficulty whatever in connecting Taranaki with Auckland by railway, and this evidence meant that the information which Mr. Hales had could not be substantiated. There could be no reliance placed upon it, for he did not go over the track and did not sufficiently investigate the case to warrant him in going before the Government and giving them such information as to lead them to withdraw that survey party. He hoped the Minister, if he did not hear this speech, would at least read it in Hansard, and that then he would give him (Mr. Smith) the assurance that he would carry out the recommendation of the Committee and would have the railway route properly surveyed. If that report went against the people of his district, and the Minister then said it was not practicable to make this railway owing to the engineering difficulties, they would bow to that decision and cease to agitate. But until then they would continue to agitate, no matter whether the present Government was in power or any other Government. It was their duty to represent the interests of the people in a right and proper manner, and not to be coerced by any action of any Government.

Mr. E. M. Smith

Mr. DUTHIE said the honourable gentleman blamed the Government for withdrawing these surveyors. He thought the Government were only to blame for yielding to the pressure brought by the honourable gentleman and a few others and taking away money belonging to the North Island Trunk Railway Fund to be expended upon useless surveys in a part of the country that the Premier must know was unsuitable for a railway, and against the advice of his officers. There was no question but that they should get on with the Makohine Gorge Viaduct, and in delaying this work they were not dealing with the money available for this railway as they ought to do. It might be that the balance of money still lying to the credit of the North Island Trunk Railway was very low, but there was no reason that he knew of why that line should not partake of a share of the money transferred from the Consolidated Fund. It was as well entitled to it as any work in the colony; especially as for years past the funds borrowed for this trunk line had been diverted to road-making, to purchase of Native lands, snagging a river, and for the payment of a steamer's subsidy. Money was received as they sold or otherwise disposed of the Native lands purchased along the route of this North Island Trunk Railway, and some part of this money should be made available for completing this part of the railway. It was not creditable to the honourable gentleman's Administration that twelve or thirteen miles of the completed line beyond the Gorge should be lying idle and unavailable, with the roads on the other side in an impassable state, and traffic stopped with the interior. There was no need for the colony to spend large sums of money in making that road when they were making a railway alongside it. The fair thing would be that money should be found this session to put that work in hand. He hoped that the honourable gentleman would, in a spirit of fair-play, looking to the importance of the work, see his way to make provision for the completion of this viaduct.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON wished to revert to the subject of the Taranaki Harbour endowments, which had been so ably and earnestly brought before the attention of the House by the honourable member for Egmont. In connection with that subject, he thought it was very unfortunate that the honourable member for New Plymouth should have been so easily satisfied with the explanation of the Government. He held that if the honourable member had taken a more determined stand better terms would have been obtained for the district. If the honourable member for New Plymouth had backed up his colleague the honourable member for Egmont more determinedly in connection with the endowments, the settlers might have expected some measure of relief to follow. The honourable member had indicated that he was satisfied with the answer given by the Government on the subject of the endowments. He (Mr. Hutchison) thought it was matter for grave dissatisfaction; but, as long as honourable members delivered themselves, practically, into the hands of the Ministry of the day, they need expect nothing but dissatisfaction. There was before them just now an illustration of the attitude of the Government on the subject. There was the Premier asleep. He did not even give the remarks of his follower, the honourable member for New Plymouth, either on the subject of the endowments or on the subject of the railway, the least attention. Unless the members for the district stood together and determined to take every opportunity of ventilating their grievances they might expect Taranaki grievances to be continually put off by the Ministry, for the Government knew they held the vote of the honourable member for New Plymouth quite safe; and consequently, the representation of Taranaki being divided on the subject of the New Plymouth Harbour endowment, they could expect nothing satisfactory. As it happened, the golden opportunity had been lost through the indifference of the Government. Time was when the bondholders would have been content, and were even anxious, to accept a compromise, if he might call it so; but the Government were quite careless, or worse. Now, through the delay which had occurred, the favourable opportunity had probably been lost, chiefly, as he thought, through the dissension among the members from that part of the colony.

Mr. E. M. SMITH would like to make a personal explanation. He had never disagreed with the other members from his district on this subject. They had always worked on the one platform.

Mr. MITCHELSON would like to say a word or two in reply to a statement made by the Premier in regard to the North Island Main Trunk Railway between Wellington and Auckland. He must confess he was somewhat disappointed at the answer given to his question by the Premier. He had hoped that the honourable gentleman would take up a better and more reasonable position than he had taken. It was quite time that this question of routes was settled, as it had been hanging over sufficiently long. He would impress upon the Government the necessity for settling the matter at rest once and for all. He quite agreed with the honourable member for Parnell that it would be absolutely useless to send the matter to the Railways Committee, as that Committee had at the present time more work than could be completed this session, so that it would be quite incompetent to undertake such a question as this. The honourable gentleman stated that a large portion of this loan had been used for the purpose of acquiring lands, and that those lands were acquired under the authority of an Act of this House. That was quite true; but the circumstances had altered considerably since the Act was passed. At the time the Act was passed the mode of disposing of the Crown lands of the colony was somewhat different from the mode in vogue at the present time; and, if the railway had to wait until the funds were available from the proceeds of the sale of lands, then the progress made with the construction of this line would be very poor indeed. Then, there was another question. These lands were disposed of, under the existing Land Act, under the lease-in-perpetuity and other systems, and a considerable amount of money had to be paid over to local bodies by way of "thirds" and "fourths," such as was never contemplated at the time of the passing of the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act. There was a large portion of this loan taken for the purpose of making surveys, roads, bridges, snagging the Wanganui River, et cetera. The Minister of Lands had admitted that the sum of £80,000 had been spent on one road alone—the road between Pipiriki and Karioi—and honourable members must admit that the Government could find ways and means to obtain money for other purposes of far less importance than the construction of this railway between Wellington and Auckland. The answer they gave in this respect was most unsatisfactory to himself, and he was sure it could not be satisfactory to honourable members who came from the district he had the honour to represent. Money was found for the continuation of railways in various parts of the colony of much less importance, and he thought it was the duty of the Government to make some provision in addition to that which the Premier stated would be available under Part I. of the Public Works Fund. If that were not done, then it would be a question as to when this railway would be completed. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) had raised the question of the construction of the viaduct near Ohingaiti, and, as settlement was progressing at a very rapid rate in that part of the colony, he thought the Government should commence this work, and render aid to those people who were about taking up land in the Awarua Block, which was at the present time being opened up by the Crown. He hoped the Government would do something this session to legislate, first, for the further and more rapid progress of the line, and something to determine which route the line should take.

Mr. SEDDON thought it must be patent to honourable members that the Government were considerably hampered in respect of questions, owing to the fact that there were so many motions for adjournment moved. He should have thought, at that period of the session, that members would wish to get through the work and go home, and that those members who might not feel exactly satisfied with answers they received to questions would show some forbearance. The Government naturally wished to avoid these adjournments by, in their replies, avoiding, as far as possible, saying anything that would provoke debate. The honourable member knew very well that the Public Works Statement would be down very shortly, and in that Statement the Government would say what they intended to do in reference to this North Island Trunk Railway. As regards the route, the honourable member told the House that £70,000 was available for the work. What could they do with that money? It would take more than that for the Makohine Viaduct, and the completion of this line, say, to the tunnel at the northern end of the Mokau would take about half the money; and, when it was done, what use would it be? What use was there to trouble about the question of routes until such time as there were moneys available for the completion of the work? He said unhesitatingly—and speaking very plainly—that to make railways before settlement could possibly take place was a mistake, more particularly when there were lands already taken up with no roads yet made to them. If he were a representative of the Auckland District, notwithstanding all that had been said as regarded the immediate necessity for finishing this North Island Main Trunk Railway, he would say that to make a road from below the tunnel to connect Taranaki directly with the Waikato and Auckland would be far more important to the Auckland District. It would tend to promote settlement, and would give far greater advantages to the settlers than would the construction of this railway. That was the view he held upon the point. Now, as regarded the viaduct, he admitted that settlement beyond that point was going on very rapidly. There was a large amount of work done on the other side of the line, and any moneys spent in that direction, where the line was completed, were moneys well spent. As regarded the expenditure of money so as to complete the line to a point below the tunnel, that was money well spent. Then, coming to the next question, that of finding money to complete the Makohine Viaduct: if they came down with a proposal to borrow money for that purpose the honourable member would be the first to assail the Government. Honourable members on that side of the House would immediately make it a pretext for an attack upon the Government. They asked questions with a view of getting the Government to give answers, and on those answers they attacked the Government. The Government were quite right to evade as far as possible any attack being made in regard to those questions.

Mr. Mitchelson

Mr. MITCHELSON.—What about the Land Fund?

Mr. SEDDON asked, what did the honourable member say when they asked that the Land Fund should be applied for the construction of the Otago Central Railway? That was the very point upon which the Government were attacked. If it was done in one case it would have to be done all round. They might as well apply the whole of the Land Fund to the construction of the Otago Central Railway; but, if that was proposed, they would at once have honourable members on that side of the House objecting to the moneys being used for that purpose. Then, as regarded the land that had been purchased: it was not quite settled yet. There had been no opportunity of turning it into cash. The honourable gentleman had asked the question whether it would require legislation to do so. The Government were doing their best, and when the Public Works Statement came down he felt sure the Government would be congratulated by honourable members on the course they had taken. As to the statement in reference to New Plymouth Harbour, if the honourable member for Egmont thought for a moment that he was promoting the welfare of that Harbour Board by taking up four or five afternoons during the session to bring the question before the House, and thus wasting the time and placing an additional burden on the taxpayers, he was making a great mistake. Parliament was not prepared to take over these harbour loans and saddle them on the shoulders of the taxpayers of the colony. There was no doubt that a mistake was made as regarded the New Plymouth Harbour, but when that large expenditure was entered upon the people no doubt had their eyes open as to what it would involve. The bondholders had a right to be paid. The moneys must be raised locally for the purpose, and any attempt made to force this on the taxpayers of the colony would be resisted to the utmost.

Mr. McGUIRE.—What about the endowments?

Mr. SEDDON said there had been no material change in that respect. The honourable member's new-born zeal in the interests of the bondholders of the New Plymouth Harbour was somewhat amusing, because he and the honourable member both knew of the existence of a communication the honourable member sent to the late Premier, in which he pointed out that then was the time—then was the opportunity. If they let it stand over until June, the Board itself would be able to pay its interest; but if they collared the bonds then, the bondholders would not know if the interest would be met in June. He said, "Strike the iron while it is hot. Let the colony take it over, and then there is an end to the matter." If the honourable gentleman had a good memory he would remember that. But the Government could not see their way to do anything that was dishonourable, and they would be no party to a questionable transaction. If this matter was to be brought up time after time, thereby causing a great waste of time every afternoon, all he had to say was that it proved the honourable member to be unreasonable. The honourable member for New Plymouth was an out-and-out supporter of the Government. He had brought this question before the House time after time, and urged the Government reasonably; but they had had to resist him, just as they had to resist the honourable gentleman opposite. The Government were desirous of rendering every assistance possible to any part of the colony, but it would be a very bad thing for the colony if they were to attempt to saddle the country with all these Harbour Board loans. He hoped they would hear no more about this during the session, and, instead of wasting the time of the House, he hoped honourable members would get on with the business of the country.

Sir R. STOUT agreed with the Premier that it was a mistake to move the adjournment of the House continually at this period of the session. There was only one point he wished to touch upon, and that was in reference to the North Island Trunk Railway. He thought 4.30. the first consideration of the Public Works Department should be to complete the viaduct that had been mentioned. If that were done it would tend to open up good land and would be an immense benefit to the colony. He submitted that, as some of the North Island Trunk Loan money had been spent in road-making and in the purchase of Native lands, both those portions of the loan should be returned to it. That was only fair and honest: in fact, it would be dishonest not to do so. As to the amount which had been spent in the purchase of Native lands, that ought to be kept in a separate account, and, so soon as the land was disposed of, the income from that land should be specially set aside for that loan. In asking that no person was asking anything unfair. As to the route, the Auckland people, by desiring the line to go via Taranaki, had delayed this matter very considerably. The central route was the proper route. He had always held that opinion, and had never varied in regard to it. It was settled by a Committee of that House, which was almost unanimous. There was only one member—the Hon. Mr. Montgomery, of the Legislative Council—who was opposed to the central route. All the other members of the Committee came to the decision that the central route was the route, and this spending of money on surveys of routes was a waste of money. The central route would open up a large quantity of land. Eight or nine years ago he made the same statement. He would not take up any further time, but he hoped the Public Works Statement would soon be brought down, and that the lines he had indicated would be followed in connection with this railway. No doubt all these discussions about routes, railways, and everything else arose from the Public Works Statement not being down. This was the longest time in the colony's history that the Public Works Statement had been delayed.

Mr. SEDDON.—What have New Plymouth bonds to do with the Public Works Statement?

Sir R. STOUT said they had nothing to do with it, but the other question, about the North Island Main Trunk line, had led to half the discussion this time. It was utterly wrong to keep back the Public Works Statement. Last year he urged the Premier to bring down the Public Works Statement promptly. It was contrary to the proper carrying-on of all business to have it delayed.

Mr. SEDDON.—Yes, I admit that.

Sir R. STOUT said there had never been such delay as this year.

Mr. SEDDON.—We have not got the money yet.

Sir R. STOUT said the honourable gentleman did not need the money to bring down the Public Works Statement. In England the custom was to fix on the works they were going to undertake, and then to bring down the Statement.

Mr. SEDDON said if such a system were pursued here it would land the colony in financial difficulty.

Mr. BUTTON could not allow the debate to pass without saying a few words in reference to it. The money that was taken from the vote passed by the House for the main line between Wellington and Auckland had been expended in the purchase of Native land, no doubt; and, that having been diverted, provision should be made, in all fairness, that the fund should be recouped again. When the land was sold the proceeds should be set apart in order that they might be applied towards the repayment of this money. They must not forget that they would not be able, out of that fund, to recoup the whole amount, because the conditions connected with the selling of land had changed. Since the money was taken to purchase land the local bodies had received one-third of the price of the land sold. At that time it was sold for cash. Now there were deferred payments, and all sorts of arrangements, and the local bodies received the "thirds." Connecting Auckland with Taranaki and Wellington by rail was a very important matter. He quite agreed with the Premier that, if the railway was not available or practicable at present for want of funds, then they should have a good road that could be used for driving stock. It would be of considerable advantage to have a road by which stock could be driven to the Waikato district. That would be a great benefit to the Waikato, and also to Auckland. With regard to borrowing money for the purpose of a railway, he was still consistent with the remarks he had made already on that subject. Even if it was for the purpose of making this railway, he should be opposed to borrowing until the country had had an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon this question of borrowing. It was a burning question at the last election whether or not money was to be borrowed, and whether the colony should go further into debt. All-round pledges were extorted from the candidates that no further borrowing should take place. If the country had changed its mind, the electors should be consulted on this matter. He was rather disposed to think that for road and railway purposes, perhaps, the country, or some of the districts of the country, might have changed their minds; but until that was referred to them he should be opposed to borrowing even for the purpose of constructing the railroad. He hoped the House would consider the claims that Auckland, Taranaki, and Waikato had upon that House in connection with this matter. The moneys that were voted by that House had been diverted, and consequently no road had been made; and he pressed the claims of these districts upon the House; and perhaps before long some way would be devised by which some measure of justice might be done to these districts.

Mr. CROWTHER said that as he had not been in the House during the whole of this debate he was more or less at a disadvantage, but since being elected he had tried to make himself acquainted with the requirements and the condition of things in relation to this business as far as he had been able. He quite agreed with the statement just made by the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) in one respect, that of all things necessary that viaduct seemed to him to be one of the greatest importance at this end, because already there was a very large number of settlers beyond it. The railway was already made—that was, the formation—and if this crossing were clear it would necessitate comparatively little outlay to have the trains running to an important township that already existed. There was a large population there. There were two bakers' shops, two or three butchers' shops, and three publichouses.

Sir R. Stout

Mr. SEDDON.—You would not say Sir Robert Stout advocated it on that account?

Mr. CROWTHER said Sir Robert Stout had learned to know that he was not all the world, nor even all New Zealand. He had learned to know that, like the rest of the members, and had to go with the tide, and it was a very uphill business to go against it. On the other hand, he thought the honourable member was right in saying that Parliament would have very much greater pleasure in voting the sums if the Government would first show them what their estimates were. The Premier shook his head at that. It seemed to him to be a wrong way of doing business to ask the House to vote so many thousands, and then for the Government to suggest to the House in what way the money should be spent. The expenditure should first be suggested, and then the House should be asked for a lump sum. Then honourable members could satisfy themselves whether a lesser amount would suffice. It would enable members to pass their own opinions as to the fairness or otherwise of the allocation. If, as it seemed was the course adopted last session, this part of the business was not laid before the House until two days before the House rose, he was quite sure the matter could not be gone properly into in such a time. It was his duty also to say a few words as to what the senior member for Wellington City said about these surveys. He (Mr. Crowther) gave the Government credit for having granted those survey expeditions with a view of finding the best route. The best route could not be fixed until the surveys were made. He thought that every month they had been acquiring information that would hereafter be useful to them. The surveys made seemed to have cost a certain amount of money, but he could not believe the money had been wasted. It seemed to him the expenditure was absolutely necessary, in order that they might acquire the necessary knowledge to determine the most judicious way of expending the money. Such being the case, he did not think the money had been thrown away. They knew the Wellington people had all along favoured the central route. If it transpired that that was the best route in the interest of the colony as a whole, he did not think there would be strong opposition to that decision. The honourable member for New Plymouth, and all other members who had a strong desire to have a connection between Auckland and Taranaki, would not fight against circumstances which they could not possibly control, if it were quite clearly shown to them that the central route was the best one in the interests of the country. He was in hopes that this system would be followed, because since he had made himself acquainted with the requirements of the Wellington end he was more strongly in favour of it than he could have been before. There was beautiful land here. There was timber. People were getting their houses up and forming townships in a place where two years ago he was sure no one could have believed that it was possible to form a township at all. These places were continuously growing, and the settlers were extremely anxious to make homes for themselves. This township which he referred to was twelve or fifteen miles from Hunterville, and the road-formation, and all the surroundings, were extremely expensive in the way of getting the necessities of life from the place where the train stopped running at present. If the Government would follow this matter to a finish, and allow these surveys to go on, so as to allow some finality to be arrived at, the matter could be pressed forward at a greater speed than had hitherto been the case. So far as he was individually concerned, he was determined, as far as his efforts would allow him, to assist in carrying on this work, and nothing would keep him back. He should make himself thoroughly acquainted with the route and the expense, and what facilities the railroad would afford to the community. He ought also to say that, with regard to getting the work pushed on at the other end—the Auckland end—there seemed to be no obstacle in the way now. It was simply the want of money. The most difficult part of the works was partly done. The deep cutting had been completed, and ere long he supposed the railway would be opened right up to the North End Tunnel. That being easy country to travel over, it would not take a large sum of money to get the railway pushed on. The most to be done now—and he could say it was being done at this end—was to get the necessary plate-laying done, stations built, and other conveniences, which of necessity must follow the formation of the line, attended to. He hoped the Government would see their way in the near future to press on this business. He did not know what the difficulties were in converting the money back again, but supposed that was the great difficulty—the want of money. But, since honourable members had recently been in the habit of talking of millions in a very lavish way, he thought it was very possible that when they met again they might be able to devise some means of finding the money.

Mr. MASSEY said this was a matter of the greatest possible importance to the district he and other northern members represented: in fact, it was of great importance to every part of the Auckland Province. Such being the case, he would like to refer very briefly to one or two statements made by the Premier. The honourable gentleman told the House, in speaking of the Main Trunk Railway, that it was a mistake to make railways ahead of settlement. But he forgot that this railway was to connect large centres—Auckland and other parts of the colony, and Auckland and New Plymouth. So that it could not be said that this railway was being made in one sense ahead of settlement. The honourable gentleman said that there was no money available. He apparently had forgotten that a sum of money was borrowed to construct this railway, and out of that money half a million had been spent in buying Native land and in constructing roads and bridges. Money should be available for the purpose of completing our railway system in the North Island. If no money was available for making railways, how could money be found for connecting the west coast of the South Island with Canterbury—the line running over a snow-clad range, where no settlement could take place? Seeing that this matter was so important to the Province of Auckland, he thought the people of Auckland had been wonderfully patient about it. So far as communication with the rest of the colony was concerned, they might as well have been on an island. He did not think the people of Otago would have allowed themselves to be put off in that way—to have had an immense area of their land locked up from settlement, as had been done in the case of the Province of Auckland. From communications which he had noticed in the Auckland papers lately he had come to the conclusion that the people of Auckland were beginning to realise that this was a question of very much more importance to them than as to who occupied the Ministerial benches, or whether, for instance, the liquor traffic should be controlled by a three-fifths majority, or whether there should be the direct veto, or as to many other questions about which the country and that House occasionally got excited. The honourable member for Wellington City had referred to the question of the route. So far as he was personally concerned, he could express no opinion as to which was the best route, but he agreed with the honourable gentleman that the difference of opinion in this respect in Auckland had hindered the construction of the railway. The people, however, were rapidly coming to the conclusion that the railway must be made, and they would very soon demand that on this question their representatives must be united, or, if not, out they would go on the very first opportunity. They were only asking that justice should be done to Auckland, and he thought it was the duty of whatever Ministry occupied the Government benches to see that money was found for the construction of this railway.

Mr. LAWRY entirely deprecated the action of the Premier when a question of this nature was brought before the House. To the north part of this Island this was a question of very large importance. It was of far greater importance than many of the Bills which were brought before the House. To those members representing the northern districts this was a question of vital importance; and, indeed, it was a matter of vital importance to the colony itself. He was very desirous, as he had indicated by questions which he had placed on the Order Paper, to have this question of the route settled once and for ever. If it could be shown to him that the central route was the best route in the interests of the colony he would be quite prepared to accept the decision of an independent jury that might come to such a conclusion, and he would loyally support any Government, or House in which he might be a member, in carrying that railway into practical effect. He might say that he knew more about this question than any other layman in New Zealand, and for this reason: He had been over the whole three tracks which had been under the consideration of the House that afternoon. He did not know very much about engineering matters, but he did know what the quality of land was. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), like other Wellington members, and like the Premier himself, he was sorry to say, was absolutely in favour of the central route, without having any practical information himself as to the nature of the country or the engineering difficulties.

Mr. SEDDON said the Premier had expressed no opinion at all.

Mr. LAWRY said, when the honourable gentleman was in Auckland he distinctly expressed an opinion in favour of the central route; and he (Mr. Lawry), being an Auckland member, and being in favour of the Stratford route, was almost insulted by the Premier for expressing such an opinion on the matter. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) said he was in favour of the central route. Why, if the honourable gentleman had not been in favour of that route he would never have been elected for Wellington. The honourable gentleman, like the Premier and others, advocated the central route without knowing anything about the matter. As to the Committee's report which had been referred to, had any other report been brought up the Atkinson Government would have gone out of office. What did they do? They sent evidence to the Auckland Chamber of Commerce, and said, "You must support the central route or no route at all."

Mr. MITCHELSON.—The Atkinson Government were not in office. It was the Stout-Vogel Government.

Mr. LAWRY.—Not when the question of route was decided.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—Yes.

Mr. LAWRY said the question of the route was decided when the honourable member for Patea was fighting the late member for Egmont for the Egmont seat. The honourable gentleman opposite was then Minister for Public Works, and he decided on the route without seeing it at all. If the honourable gentleman had not then reported in favour of the central route the then Premier might have lost his seat, and the Government would have gone out of office. That was the time when the question of the route was decided, and it was decided before any evidence was taken on the question.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—It never was decided.

Mr. LAWRY said it was decided on the honourable gentleman's report, and he reported on a route which he had never seen at all. The honourable member for Wellington City said that the whole of the evidence was in favour of the central route, and that that route would open up a large amount of land. He would ask the honourable gentleman to confine his expressions of opinion to legal questions. The honourable gentleman knew nothing about land. What was the land on the central route?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Pumice.

Mr. LAWRY said it was nothing but pumice, except a little bit of land around Ohakuru and Pipiriki. From there up to the Auckland Province it was a region of pumice. He would ask those honourable members who believed in the settlement of the country if they would advocate the construction of a railway through a region of pumice. Then, the engineering difficulties, in his opinion, were practically insurmountable. When he went over these three railway routes he had with him one of the most practical engineers in the colony. On consulting their aneroids when travelling from the bed of the Wanganui River to the Waimarino Bush till they struck the open plains around the base of Ruapehu, in a distance of about eight miles, they rose 2,800ft. He would ask any man who was not an engineer even, but whose knowledge was based on what he had read, if he thought a practical railway route could be found over such country as that. Then, as to the Stratford route: They travelled down from that divergence at Kawakawa; they crossed over from the pumice-land and right through to the Ngaire, and the bulk of that land was as good as the land around the slopes of Mount Egmont and the district of Hawera, being fit for immediate and profitable settlement. Then, when he came through the central route the first time, he made a divergence from Karioi to Taupo Lake, and struck the Wanganui River at Taumaranui. They did this with the view of seeing the Puketapu Bush. What did they find? They found that the land right through to the river was principally pumice-land, and totally unfit for settlement. When they returned to Auckland, what did the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs say? He said that they had diverged from the central route, because they did not go and see the Waimarino Bush.

Dr. NEWMAN.—Hear, hear. You did not see it.

Mr. LAWRY said that was just on a par with other statements which the honourable gentleman made in that House. He admitted that Mr. Cadman did not see it. When he (Mr. Lawry) went back to Auckland and saw the statement of the honourable gentleman and others in Wellington, he made another start in company with an engineer. They went right through the Waimarino Bush.

Mr. Lawry

Dr. NEWMAN.—Is not that good?

Mr. LAWRY said it was good country for trees, but, when you took the trees off, the soil would float away into mid-air.

Mr. WILSON.—It is under grass now right away down to Pipiriki.

Mr. LAWRY said the honourable gentleman should talk about the district in which he lived. He (Mr. Lawry) knew something about the Waimarino Bush, having travelled through it. At first he was favourably impressed with the country. He saw most magnificent totara-trees—hundreds and hundreds of splendid trees—but where they were exposed to the wind they were bowled over like ninepins.

5.0. They were just standing on the pumice, and any practical man knew whether land of that nature was likely to grow grass. The honourable member for New Plymouth and himself were slightly at variance. He (Mr. Lawry) believed in the Stratford route; the honourable gentleman believed in the Mimi route. He had seen that route also, and believed there was a practical route there; and it was the duty of the Government to open it up by a road, to enable people to drive their cattle from Taranaki to the Wai-kato, and vice versa. His own impression was, having seen all three routes, and thus having an advantage over other members, that for settlement purposes and railway purposes, and considering the absence of engineering difficulties, the one route was that via Stratford. He advised the Auckland members not to be hoodwinked by the Wellington members, but to vote in favour of giving Auckland a fair share,—though this was a very narrow phase of the question. He knew, taking Hawera as the centre of the Taranaki District, if you made the central railway to connect at Marton, and go through from that point to Auckland, Wellington must necessarily secure the whole trade of the coast. This was as clear as the electric light. He did not take the same narrow view of the question as the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs, but he would point out to the Auckland members that if, from a commercial point of view, they wanted Auckland to secure a fair share of the trade they must by every effort at their command oppose the construction of the central line through that region of pumice.

Dr. NEWMAN said the speech made by the honourable gentleman was perfectly astounding, particularly in his description of the Ohura Valley. And if they read the account of that valley in the papers, as given by the honourable gentleman, Mr. Jackson Palmer, and Mr. Cadman, they would imagine it to be an oasis in a desert of very large extent—a magnificent fertile valley, on which you could put all the unemployed and all the people who wanted to settle on the land. Would it be believed, when the surveyors went there they found it about 6 chains wide for half its length? And the honourable gentleman talked about the wide-spreading valley! It contained the worst of the pumice in Auckland Province in its upper reaches. When the honourable gentleman went to Mr. Grace's place on Lake Taupo, which was in the Auckland Province, the whole of the country north of that was pumice country, and it was largely drained by the Stratford route. Then the honourable gentleman talked about another valley. What was that? About fifteen miles in length, and in many parts not 20 chains wide. Then, he sneered at the totara-forest in Waimarino. He challenged the honourable gentleman to say whether there was a forest anywhere else in New Zealand to compare with it for magnificence of the trees and for general splendour. He never saw anything equal to it. For miles there was nothing but solid walls of totara. And the honourable gentleman said, because there was a little pumice here and there, that it was worth nothing. In one thing he agreed with the honourable gentleman. The Premier had said he was not in favour of the central route. He had before him a speech of the Premier in which he said that the new surveys settled the question against the Stratford route. And the Colonial Treasurer said, speaking at Auckland, to Mr. MacMillan, then President of the Chamber of Commerce, on the 8th December, that the question of route would be settled this session. These two gentlemen said the matter should be fixed up, and, of course, they had done nothing of the kind—which was nothing at all unusual. He agreed with the honourable gentleman who last spoke that if they could settle the question once for all it would be a great deal better. He hoped the Auckland members would now see how unwise it was for the Auckland and Wellington members to be always opposing one another. If they agreed they could have the railway made in three or four years. He was quite satisfied with the railway going on at the Wellington end, and the further the railway was extended from Hunteville the better he was pleased. He was very glad to hear the Premier had not decided to set up a Commission. All the Commissions had been set up in the most ludicrous fashion, and their decisions would not settle the matter. He was glad to hear the Premier had decided to go on with the route at this end, and to spend money equally at each end. He would like to remind the honourable gentleman who last spoke that, when talking of pumice, he forgot that for sixty miles north from Marton there was the most splendid country in New Zealand. He must admit that Awarua and inland Patea would all bear settlement. And though he took a disparaging view of the Waimarino, he (Dr. Newman) had been through it again recently; it was some 440,000 acres of Crown land in extent, and the greater portion of it was one of the few still remaining good blocks. The Government had settled 38,000 acres recently in small settlements, and they would not have done that if it had not been satisfactory land. And, as for its being pumice-land, further up there was a large amount in the Retaruke country which was fine grass land, and which was going to be cut up shortly as grazing-land. He hoped the Auckland members would agree to shake hands with Wellington, and they could get the line through. It was grievous to him to see Canterbury and Westland uniting to get a railway across icy peaks, while Auckland and Wellington would not unite to get one through the finest country in New Zealand. If they would shake hands they could get it through in three years. What a gain it would be to Auckland, which was in reality as isolated as an island—almost a foreign country—and scarcely a part of themselves! He took it there was no work which would repay the colony so well as finishing the railway by the central route.

Mr. LANG said the question was one of considerable importance to his district, and he wished to add his protest against the action of the Government in not pressing on with the construction of the line connecting these two important cities. He thought the route, having been made a question of dispute, was kept so by the Government in order to delay the construction of the line. It would be a good thing if the members interested would give way to one another and unite to bring pressure to have the line pushed on at once. So much had been said on the question that he did not wish to delay the House, but he considered it a disgrace that the Cities of Auckland and Wellington should remain so long separated. There was one thing, however, that he thought of more importance even than the railway, and that was a track suitable for driving stock between Waikato and Taranaki. This road would not only be of benefit to the districts named, but also to the whole of the province, as it would enable settlers in the far north to dispose of their store cattle to better advantage. He hoped that the Government would see their way to open this road at once, so that it might be used this summer.

Mr. WILSON said that year after year the quarrel about the route went on, with the result that they never got anything at all. The Government found members disagreeing as to routes, and naturally did not wish to spend money, and said, "Oh! very well; as soon as the route is decided we will spend the money"; and while other districts were getting railways theirs was stopped by a squabble over the route. He thought the Government should decide the route. They had every information on the subject. He was satisfied, if the Government did their duty, they would decide before next session what route the railway should take, and he did hope they would have no more of this squabbling. He was not himself wedded to the central route, but thought it was the best; but he would be quite satisfied one way or the other so long as the matter was settled.

Major HARRIS said that, seeing honourable members interested in the matter were of opinion that it was of so little importance to Wellington but of so much interest to Auckland, the matter might be left to Auckland to settle.

Instead of shaking hands with the Wellington members, as the member for Wellington Suburbs said, he thought the Auckland members should shake hands with themselves, and unite with Taranaki and try to get a line in that direction. In Auckland they wished to have a line to Taranaki. As the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs stated, Auckland was almost an island, and had no communication with other parts of the colony, so that in that case they had little community of interest with Wellington, but they must have a common interest with Taranaki. He suggested that the Wellington members should think no more about the matter, but leave it to Auckland and Taranaki.

Mr. BELL had a word to say, not in regard to the central line, but in regard to the answer to his question about the banks. He was told by the Colonial Treasurer some weeks ago that amalgamation could not be carried out without the consent of Parliament. He thought it had been demonstrated that the banks would do it, if they thought fit, without that consent. Now the Treasurer changed his ground, and said that he would not take charge of his Bill. The Colonial Treasurer had changed his ground to-day altogether. The honourable gentleman had said some time ago that the reason why he did not take up that Bill, or introduce another Bill to the same effect, was not that the Bill was not necessary to prevent the amalgamation from taking place without the consent of Parliament, but because the Government considered the amalgamation would have been advisable, and that they still considered such an amalgamation to be advisable. What the Colonial Treasurer stated to-day was a complete justification of his (Mr. Bell's) action in bringing in his measure. It also showed that it was improper that that measure should have been discharged from the Order Paper and that Parliament should not have had the opportunity of determining whether it should not be the governing body in this matter. Furthermore, the Colonial Treasurer, in his statement, told the House first of all that he considered it would be a good thing that the banks should amalgamate; and, secondly, that it was a matter for the Government to determine, and not for Parliament,—having first informed the House, weeks ago, that it was a matter which could not be done without the concurrence of Parliament. He protested against the course which the Government had taken in this matter.

Mr. THOMPSON did not wish to prevent the honourable member for Egmont from exercising his right of reply. He just wished to say that he was not going to enter into this discussion as to the particular route the North Island Main Trunk Railway should take; and he would say that the people of the City of Auckland, through their own squabbling over this matter, had been the cause of the whole delay. He thought the whole responsibility rested with the people of the City of Auckland, and it was well the country should know it. Until the people of Auckland had made up their minds what route they wanted there was very little prospect of getting the railway extended, and he hoped this squabbling over the railway route would not prevent the Government, at any rate, from opening a road from the Waikato to Taranaki: he meant an ordinary bush-road, to enable the settlers to drive their stock from one part of the colony to the other. It need not be expensive, and he trusted the Government would provide money on the estimates this session for carrying that road through, so as to connect these two districts. This work could be done this summer: indeed, it could have been done last summer. He hoped this year's estimates would contain a sufficient amount of money to make this road: he could assure honourable members that the money spent in opening this road would be of the greatest service to the settlers of both provinces—Taranaki and Auckland. Then the question of the rival routes for this railway could wait until the Auckland people had agreed which one they wanted. So long as they squabbled amongst themselves he would not interfere with the question at all.

Mr. COLLINS like to express his sense of dissatisfaction and disappointment at the reply given to his question by the Premier that afternoon. It had reference to the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the subject of old-age pensions. In his reply the Premier stated that the matter was surrounded with such difficulties that it would require the whole united wisdom of the House to deal with it, and that he thought the appointment of a Royal Commission would be of little utility so far as this matter was concerned. Well, it might be presumption on his part, but he held quite a contrary opinion. He thought, if the matter was one that was surrounded with such insurmountable difficulties as the Premier seemed to think, that was the very reason, at any rate, why a Commission of inquiry should have been set up to collect all the information it could, and obtain evidence during the recess. That Commission would have been enabled to collect such information as would very largely assist the wisdom of the House in coming to a just decision on the matter. It was too bad that the country should have been misled in this matter. Previous to the general election and during that election the country was led distinctly to understand that this matter of old-age pensions would be dealt with by the present Parliament. The first session of this Parliament had now nearly gone by, and nothing had been done, and from the tone of the Premier's reply he feared that nothing was intended to be done. He again expressed his sense of dissatisfaction at the Premier's reply, because he considered the matter of too important a nature to be disposed of in this way. They found men on every side—men who had tried what they could to make the country what it was—men who had given forty or fifty years of labour to the enrichment of the colony—now dependent on the miserable dole dealt out to them by the Charitable Aid Boards. They found men who had worked hard, steadfastly, and courageously for forty years now dependent in their old age upon charitable aid, and receiving miserable sums of 1s. 9d. or 2s. a week. It was really a monstrous thing that there should be any further delay in dealing with a matter like this.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why did they not save money?

Mr. COLLINS said the honourable gentleman asked him why these people did not save money. He knew very well that many of them were not in a position to save money, and if the honourable gentleman knew that which many men were aware of he must know that multitudes of working-men could not do justice to themselves and their families and at the same time save money. The money they earned had been required to feed, and clothe, and educate, and give shelter to their families. The honourable gentleman must know that, if he knew anything at all of the lives of the workers. Very few of the workers could save a sufficiency to keep themselves in their old age. Very few had been able to do so in the past. How could they save a sufficiency to keep themselves in any degree of comfort in their old age? It was a monstrous thing that people who were suffering now through no fault of their own should be charged with thriftlessness, and with having neglected golden opportunities. Some had done so, no doubt; but there were thousands in the colony who had not been thriftless, and who, through no lack of desire to do the best for themselves and their families, were now dependent upon charity. They had not the opportunity which the honourable gentleman was, perhaps, fortunate to have, of having any surplus from which they could save sufficient to aid themselves in their old age; and he trusted members would not allow this session of Parliament to roll by without forcing the Government to take some action in the matter. The country looked for it, the people desired it, and, above everything else, the multitudes of those who had lived a life of hardship in enriching the country deserved now, in consideration of that hardship, to receive some attention. More than that, they had the question of the unemployed coming up for solution. If only those who were to-day still working when they ought to be relieved from the necessity of work—and there were hundreds in this colony who were past sixty years of age, and some over seventy years of age, still working, who, if they could see that a small sum of money was secured to them in the way of an old-age pension, if they only knew that they were free from the risk of starvation and actual want, would be willing to lay down their tools to-morrow—could take the rest which, by years of labour, they had justly earned, their withdrawal from labour would enable their places to be taken by younger men, who would do the work in a better manner, and who would thereby be provided with the means that might prevent them from falling into similar circumstances in their old age. He thought the matter was one of such profound importance that, in spite of the difficulties which the Premier said surrounded the matter,—and, if there were difficulties, it was all the more reason the matter should be taken in hand at once,—a Commission should be set up to consider the matter. They had been told by the Premier that such a Commission must be set up by a vote of the House. He thought they should find some means whereby the Government would be forced to deal with a matter which the Government themselves promised to the country should be dealt with. They had led the country to anticipate they would deal with the matter, and now he feared the matter was being neglected because there were difficulties in the way. Naturally there would be difficulties, but that was all the more reason why the House should endeavour to overcome those difficulties, and he could not imagine any way by which these difficulties would be more readily overcome than by setting up a Commission armed with full powers to obtain information—to gather the fullest possible evidence, so as to lead the House to a wise and just decision on this important matter.

Mr. McGUIRE had only wanted, in his reply, to show that what the Premier had said was incorrect; but, as the hour for adjournment had now arrived, he would not detain the House.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

8.30. Mr. MITCHELSON.—I wish to make a few remarks on the Bill now under consideration; but before commencing my remarks I must congratulate the Premier upon the fact that he appears to have taken some considerable trouble to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the subject now before the House. The honourable gentleman stated, in moving the second reading of the Bill, that it was with extreme diffidence he undertook the position of Native Minister, and that at the outset he determined to visit each Native district throughout the country before he arrived at any conclusion as to what he might consider necessary in the way of amended legislation on the Native-land question. The honourable gentleman told us that the found in the various districts which he visited that the Natives in each of those districts expressed different opinions, and that the policy required by one section of the Native people, or the people of one district, was not that which was required by the Natives in another district. He stated that the Natives between Taumararui and Otorohanga desired to be allowed to deal with their own land in any way they thought fit; they did not express an opinion as to the necessity for the resumption of the pre-emptive right by the Crown, and while making this statement to him they highly approved of the Native Land Purchase Bill of last year. There is no doubt that they certainly should approve of that Bill,

Mr. Collins

inasmuch as it gave to them the power to obtain a much larger price for their land than had hitherto been paid to them by the Crown, owing to the provisions contained in it for the setting-up of a Valuation Board; and that is the reason why they so heartily approved of that Bill. But, during his visit to the Natives in various parts of the country, at no settlement did he receive from the Natives any advice as to the resumption of the pre-emptive right by the Crown. The honourable gentleman concluded his introductory remarks by saying that, having visited the whole of the Native districts, he now had a pretty good idea as to the requirements of the Natives throughout the whole of the colony; and in the Bill which he has introduced to Parliament he had given the Legislature an opportunity of passing into law an Act that would prevent further litigation in the future, and also prevent further discord between the Europeans and the Native people. Well, Sir, I think that by his own words he has proved to the House that the views of the Native people are not embodied in the Bill. In the Waikato he had an opportunity of making himself acquainted with the King movement, and with the Natives who considered the late Tawhiao to be their leader and King, and one of the things which he stated was the cause of this movement being still in existence was that a very large number of the Native people were entirely without land, and he said that if land could be provided for these people the King movement would cease. I do not know whether the honourable gentleman is aware that the King movement was really in existence long before the Waikato lands were confiscated, and, in fact, some three or four years prior to the commencement of the war. I think the honourable gentleman must have been somewhat misinformed when he told the House that these Natives were entirely without land, for at the conclusion of the Waikato war, although some twelve hundred thousand acres of land belonging to the Waikato people were confiscated, the Government of the day considered it only right to reserve a considerable portion of these lands to be returned to those Natives who had been in rebellion; and in a return laid before the House in 1871 he will find that 278,891 acres were set apart for this purpose—that is to say, for the purpose of being returned to those Natives who had taken part in the rebellion, and also to those Natives whose lands had been confiscated but who had remained friendly. The words of the return are these: "Quantity of land in each district given, agreed to be given, or reserved for Natives, whether friendly or not." There is no doubt that great injustice was done to the Ngatimahuta and Waikato Tribes by the confiscation of the whole of their territory, while the Ngatimaniapoto Tribe were allowed to retain the whole of the country south of the Puniu River, seeing that the Ngatimaniapoto people were just as much responsible for the war as the Ngatimahuta and Waikato Tribes were. And yet, as I say, they were allowed to retain the whole of their vast and valuable possessions, while at the same time the Waikatos were deprived of the whole of their territory. I think it is the duty of the Premier to make an exhaustive inquiry into this matter, so as to ascertain what has become of this large area of land, which was set apart for the Natives in the year I have mentioned. He will find the return in C-4, Volume 1, of the Appendices of 1871. There were several Acts of Parliament passed extending the time under which these lands could be set apart and proclaimed for the various tribes and Natives who were found entitled to sections. I think the last Act was passed in 1884, extending that time for another period of two years. I am rather inclined to think that the repeated changes of Government that have taken place since 1884 have led to this large question escaping that notice which ought to have been given to it; otherwise there is no doubt there would not be so many Natives now without land as appears from the statement of the Premier. If he will look at the Gazette of 1879, pages 1481 and 1498, he will there find that a considerable area of land was set apart by Proclamation for various tribes and individuals, amounting to 68,098 acres. So far as Tawhiao and his immediate followers are concerned, they are not so badly off for land as the Premier led the House to believe, for during the time I was Native Minister I returned to Tawhiao and his people a considerable area—in fact, some of the finest land surrounding the Mangare Mountain, two miles from the Borough of Onehunga, which at the present time is returning the Natives a considerable revenue in the shape of rents. Then, there is the Pukapuka Reserve, in the Remuera district—rich volcanic land, and large enough to produce food sufficient for the whole of the Waikato people. This Pukapuka Reserve was in the very early days of the colony set apart as a special reserve for several Natives; but somehow or other, although a Crown grant was made out, it was never issued, and during the time I was Native Minister I requested the Governor to cancel the Crown grant and have the land taken before the Native Land Court and again adjudicated upon, in order that it might be returned to the original grantees or to their descendants, Tawhiao and his people, but in such a manner that they should have no power to sell or dispose of the land except on lease, as was the original intention. I trust that the Premier will make inquiries as to the position in which these Natives are at the present time, and, if any section of them are found to be without land, that he will take steps to see they are amply provided for. The Pukekawa Settlement, the block near the Waikato River, where Tawhiao and his people have been recently residing, is a block of some five or seven thousand acres; but they have no real title to it. Although the large area of land I have before mentioned was set apart for the Waikato people, I do not think that any titles have actually been issued in respect of it. Coming to another question raised by the Premier in his speech—namely, that in regard to the Opuatia Block—I may say that it contains some forty-five thousand acres, and that there has been a considerable dispute between the Government and the Natives in connection with this block. Some of the Native owners, I believe, are at the present time incarcerated in Mount Eden Prison on account of their offering obstruction to the survey and road parties sent out by the Government, the Europeans in the Auckland District having got up a considerable amount of agitation, and having sent a request to the Government to acquire this land for settlement purposes: and there is no doubt it is conveniently situated and is well adapted for settlement. It is of very good quality, and a number of Europeans are desirous of acquiring sections in this particular block; but, while I admit that it is desirable that the Crown should purchase this land for settlement, I think the Premier should take steps to see that a sufficient area of the block is specially reserved for the use and occupation of the present owners and their children. I regret very much that the Native Minister during his visit to the Waikato district did not meet Tawhiao. Various Native Ministers—in fact, I may say almost all the Native Ministers who have occupied the position since the time of the war—made repeated attempts to bring Tawhiao and his people more into accord with the Europeans and their customs, and as Tawhiao became older year by year he was getting into that frame of mind which would have induced him to accept any reasonable suggestion that was made in the proper direction by the Premier. Tawhiao himself was always amenable to reason, but unfortunately he had some unwise counsellors, who badly advised him. I think it is to be regretted that the Premier did not go out of his way to meet him. It appears to me from what I read in the newspapers that the reason why the Premier did not visit him was that the country was not large enough to hold two kings. The Premier appeared to allow his pride to get the advantage of his better feelings, and passed on without seeing one who, whatever his faults may have been, was a great and noble chief, and one who was thoroughly believed in by his own people and by a great majority of the Native people throughout the colony, as was proved the other day by the enormous number that attended his funeral. Passing on to the North of Auckland, we find that the Premier visited a good many districts in that part of the colony, and even there he did not find any section of the Natives requesting him to bring in the resumption of the pre-emptive right. He found the Natives in that part of the colony very much against selling their land either to the Crown or to Europeans. Their idea was to lease their land, and not to sell it; and this, too, is my experience of the Natives there. They own a considerable tract of country still, and some of it is exceedingly valuable; and, while the Premier states now that he has a thorough grasp of the requirements of the Native people, it does not appear to me that the views expressed by the Natives during his visits to the various districts are embodied in the Bill before the House for discussion, more especially of the Natives in the northern district. He told us also that on the East Coast there was no expression from the Natives favouring the right of pre-emption by the Crown. On the East Coast he found the Natives expressed themselves desirous of managing all their affairs through different committees. When he paid a visit to the Urewera country he was met, I believe, in a very friendly manner by the chief Kereru and his people, and when Kereru was giving the usual welcome to the Premier he expressed regret that Mr. Cadman, the ex-Native Minister, did not also accompany him, as the previous year Mr. Cadman had visited him. I think that was the first occasion when a Native Minister had gone into the interior of the Urewera country to meet the Native people in their own settlements. When the Premier found that Kereru was rather disappointed at the absence of Mr. Cadman, he expressed himself in this way to the old chief: that when Mr. Cadman was in the Urewera country the Native people had only an opportunity of receiving the Native Minister, but in him they had the greatest rangatira in the colony, the Premier, and therefore they should be very highly honoured by his having visited them instead of the ex-Native Minister. The Premier also told us that the country was of a rugged character, and he did not think it was advisable for the Crown to acquire any of it at the present time for the purpose of settlement. I have never visited that country myself, but this is in thorough accord with the description I have received of it at various times. The country is, I believe, excessively broken; but there are some very fertile valleys through it. The Premier also told us that he thought it would be necessary to erect three schools—one at Ruatoki, another at Ruatahuna, and one other. But I hope the honourable gentleman will not only think it necessary to do so, but will give instructions to do it; for now that he has been in the country and finds the Natives there, who have lived in a semi-barbarous state for so many years, are willing to forego their former habits and allow schools to be erected, he should at once give instructions for the erection of the schools, and also the aid to make the road which he mentioned through the country. The Premier stated that he considered that if the present Bill was allowed to pass it would end litigation and settle all the difficulties previously experienced regarding Native legislation. I hope the anticipations of the Premier will be borne out, but I am not at all so sanguine as he is, for every year since I have been in Parliament—or almost every year—we have had Native Bills brought down amending those previously passed, and each was thought to be the last that would be required; so that, if the Premier can succeed in passing a Bill through Parliament that will at once and for ever set the question of Native legislation at rest, he will be accomplishing a thing I consider almost impossible. As regards the Bill before the House, the Native Affairs Committee took a great deal of care with it. I think it was before the Committee for nearly three weeks, and all its provisions were very fully discussed. The Committee divided the Bill into two parts. The first part, which I believe the Premier intends to pass through Committee to-night, is one I think the House ought, with various slight amendments, to thoroughly agree with. There are several amendments that will be required to be made in the Bill while it is passing through Committee, but they will not cause a very large amount of discussion; and, so far as I know, the Premier has agreed that the second part—namely, Division II.—shall not be proceeded with for some two or three days, in order to see if some compromise may not be arrived at. I quite agree with the first part—namely, Division I.—and I think it is a very great improvement upon the present law relating to our Native Land Court and its administration, and that it will, as he says, enable lands to pass through the Court with greater facility, and lessen the expense not only to the Natives, but also to the Europeans. I think both Natives and Europeans will accept that part of the Bill without much opposition. It is quite plain, I think, to honourable members that the Bill as a whole cannot be so acceptable to members as the Premier has endeavoured to lead us to believe, inasmuch as we have three, if not four, Native members in the House opposing the second part of the Bill—that is, Division II.—that is to say, the part of the Bill which refers to the right of pre-emption. And, in addition to the Native members in this House who oppose Division II. of the Bill, we have had a very large number of petitions that were presented to this House considered before the Native Affairs Committee, sent both by Europeans who reside on the East Coast and by Natives, and we have also had several Native chiefs before the Committee protesting and making powerful speeches against the passing of that particular part of the Bill. I myself entirely disagree with the proposals of the Government in this respect. While the right of pre-emption may be a very good thing in its way, I do not consider that we have any right at the present time to prevent the Natives from dealing with their lands in any way they think fit, so long as they obey the law, and dispose of the land in such a way as will be in accord with our own Land Acts. The Government have at the present time upon the statute-book an Act which enables them to expend £50,000 per annum for the purchase of Native land, and this session we have passed another Act giving power to expend a quarter of a million further in the acquisition of Native land; and I think, with these two Acts upon the statute-book, that should be quite sufficient for the Government at the present time, more especially taking into consideration that under the Native Land Purchase Act passed last year the Government have the power to proclaim any Native land that it may be desirous to purchase in the interest of settlement in any part of the country, so that any blocks of land which they may consider desirable for the purposes of settlement they can easily proclaim, and so prevent Europeans from getting hold of such land. While they have that provision already upon the statute-book, I fail to see that any sufficient or just reason has been adduced to warrant the House in passing such a drastic policy as that contained in Division II. of this Bill. I think it would be advisable for the Premier to postpone this part of the Bill, at all events for another year, so as to see how he will get on with the large amount of money the House has placed at his disposal for the purchase of Native land. If he finds that it is necessary to resume the pre-emptive right next year, it will be soon enough then for him to ask the House to agree with the proposal. I quite agree with the honourable member for Hawke's Bay that the only true solution of the difficulty surrounding the Native-land question is the individualisation of titles. I believe that is the first and, in fact, the only cure—that is to say, individualisation in all cases where such is possible. The honourable member for Waiapu stated that he did not agree with individualisation, and he instanced an extreme case where such would be almost impossible. It was, however, an isolated case. There are probably several other blocks subject to similar conditions, but I do not think it is fair to the House to instance such a case as that against the question of individualisation. Whatever may be the policy of the Government as regards the acquisition of Native lands, I sincerely hope that, wherever land is acquired in large blocks, they will take every precaution to see that reserves sufficiently large are set apart in every Native district for the use and occupation of the Natives. If he does not do this he will find that the Natives, who are, unfortunately, too eager to sell their land in order to obtain money, will be left in a great many instances utterly without land. I myself should like to see all the lands purchased from the Natives paid for in some form of debenture not transferable, and bearing a reasonable rate of interest, for it is quite clear to those who know anything at all about how the Natives parted with their land before, how in many cases their money was squandered, and how a few months after they had sold their land they were left entirely without means, that if they can be prevented from parting with the moneys paid to them for their land a very good thing will be accomplished. I do not think sufficient care in this respect has been exercised in the past, and the Premier, I think, will do well to see in the future that such a policy as I have indicated shall be carried out. So far as I am concerned I shall endeavour by every means possible to assist the Government in making the Bill now before the House a workable Bill so far as Division I. is concerned, but, so far as Division II. is concerned, I shall use every effort to prevent its passing this session.

Mr. Mitchelson

Mr. CARROLL.—I wish to correct the honourable gentleman. I understand him to say that I was against the individualisation of titles. I did not say so. I said, where it was possible, that it would be a good thing.

Mr. BELL.—Sir, I wonder how many persons there are in this House who understand in the least the measure that is now before it. I do not profess to understand it, though I have had far greater opportunities than the majority of members of studying the particular series of Acts of which this is one. A Bill of this kind ought not to be brought down to us late in the session. We ought not to be considering it at the fag-end of the session at all. It comes so recently from the Native Affairs Committee—

Mr. SEDDON.—It has been down six weeks.

Mr. BELL.—From the Native Affairs Committee? Sir, nothing of the kind—one week at most. What is the use of our studying the Bill before it comes from the Native Affairs Committee? If honourable gentlemen will only look at the Bill they will see how it has been altered in that Committee. Members have a great deal to do, and it is quite hopeless, if Bills are going to Select Committees, for honourable members to attempt to study their language before they come back from the Committees. Now, what has been the history of this Native legislation which the Premier has referred to? It has been a history of disaster caused by these Acts being brought down and considered and passed late in the session. There have been three series of Acts. There were the Acts preceding the Act of 1873. Then, the Act of 1873 stood until the Act of 1886, which repealed the Act of 1873 and the intermediate Acts; and the Act of 1886 is to be abolished by this Act. Then, Sir, there were the amendments. The Act of 1886 was not amended in 1887, because of the dissolution. In the year 1888 Parliament repealed one of the Acts of 1886, and made such a mess of the other that no one has been able to understand it since. In the year 1889 Parliament passed an Amendment Act; in the year 1890 Parliament amended that Act, and again in 1892. I think there was none last year; but there have been perpetual and consecutive amendments. If honourable members look at the Acts they will see some of the sections—a section, for instance, of the Act of 1888 occupies a whole page—amending section after 9.0. section and word after word of the Act of 1886. I am able to point out to the honourable gentleman several passages in the Bill which, if passed in their present form, will do injury both to Maori and European. With regard to Division I., I am altogether at a loss to understand the meaning of the praise which has been given to the Premier for having brought it down. It may be that it does, and I trust it does, contain better-framed provisions than the existing Acts. Practically it is a consolidation and redraft of clauses which are to be found in all our Native-land Acts since 1865, and in our present series of Acts, which commenced in 1886, and I trust it is nothing else; but do not let honourable members be led away by the suggestion that there is something novel in this part of the Bill. The Premier told us that there was something new about surveys, and I asked if it was in this Bill. He told me it was; but even after a microscopical examination I have been unable to find it. Then, the honourable gentleman told us that there was a provision in this Bill for preventing the making of fraudulent wills, as has been done all over the country by Maoris; but I cannot find that provision. One salutary provision, however, is made; that is, in the case of persons entitled to succeed, whether the wills are or are not genuine, the Court may award the land to the successor. There is nothing further that I am able to find, and I hope the honourable gentleman when replying will be able to show me that I am wrong. The honourable member will no doubt point to the provisions relating to appeal, and say, "Here is something new"; but honourable gentlemen will be very much surprised to find that the Appellate Court is neither more nor less than the old Court of rehearing, consisting of the same number of Judges and having exactly the same constitution. In reference to this part of the Bill the honourable member states that there have been complaints about the number of rehearings, but I may inform him that under the present law the Court of rehearing is final. Under the present system a rehearing can only be granted by the Chief Judge giving his consent if he find that there is a prima facie case, as in the case of Europeans in a European Court, where you cannot get a new trial unless the Judge says there is a prima facie case. That is the existing law. That limits the opportunity to obtain a rehearing. But under this Bill every Native will be entitled to a rehearing, although the case has previously taken nine months, as the Awarua case did. The Minister representing the Native race will tell the House that the Natives are always ready to find money to continue litigation when defeated; and, whereas under the present law they are expected to prove the necessity for rehearing, under this proposed Bill there will be no need to show a prima facie case, and in every single case there will be a new trial before two Judges. The honourable gentleman had better abolish his Court of first instance altogether, since the Court of second instance will have to sit on every case. Then, I think the honourable gentleman said that, under this Bill, the Appellate Court would determine all such cases upon written evidence; but there is nothing of that kind. The Court of Appeal will have to determine each case on oral evidence, just the same as the Court of first instance. The honourable member for Eden does not seem to have seen the point, and I think the honourable gentleman, if he will consider the matter, will see in this provision a door for endless litigation; and I do trust the House will not affirm that principle. The Hon. the Minister representing the Native race knows that what I am saying upon this matter is entirely correct. With regard to the first part of the Bill, I would ask the Premier if he would oblige me by looking at subsection (11) of clause 15. I do not intend to trouble the House with examples, but I ask the honourable gentleman to look at that clause. Up to the present the Court has always had the power to apportion rents amongst the Native lessors. There is a provision that the Court may apportion the rent; and the honourable member has added, in reference to this apportioning, this provision: that the Court may "negative, modify, or apportion any of the express or implied provisions of any such lease as aforesaid as to any parcel or parcels, or as to the whole, of such land." That is to say, we give the Court the power to negative the title in the case of a European holding a genuine lease from a Maori. I am quite sure that the honourable member did not intend that; and I say that any honourable member can thus see that in passing a codifying law in a hurry we may cause irrevocable injury. Let me give the House an instance of the injury that was done by the House in 1886, and if honourable members will give me their attention I will explain the gravity of the matter, and why I am urging that this Bill should stand over until next session.

Mr. Bell

Mr. SEDDON.—The usual taihoa.

Mr. BELL.—I am giving reasons to the House, and if honourable members will give me their attention they will be able to judge between me and the honourable member, who says that my reply means taihoa. I do not think that I am inclined to go slower than the honourable member in most matters. This is what happened in 1886: Mr. Ballance was then Native Minister. One Act of 1886 prohibited all future dealings with Native land. The other was the Native Land Court Act, which provided for the ascertainment of titles. In the Native Land Administration Act the greatest care was taken by the Government to provide against the danger of interference with inchoate titles. There were special provisions inserted in that Act providing that titles which were in course of completion should be allowed to be completed. I am not now discussing the question of whether that was right or wrong. The House, however, intended to pass that legislation, and in the Act of 1888 the House again reiterated its expression of intention; but, unfortunately, neither Act was sufficient for the purpose, and the result was that a number of titles which the House had rightly or wrongly intended to allow to be confirmed were rendered invalid by that legislation. My honourable friend the Minister representing the Native race and the Premier introduced last year the Validation Act for the sole purpose of remedying the wrong that was done unintentionally by this House in 1886. The honourable gentleman cannot say that what I have mentioned is not true, and I confess the honourable gentleman did well to remedy the wrong that was done in 1886. The wrong was done in 1886 by the House; and, in considering what was then done, let us consider the language which was then used.

Mr. SEDDON.—Bad drafting again.

Mr. BELL.—The honourable gentleman will never have perfect Bill-drafting. I am sure that the honourable gentleman is as anxious as myself to be correct on matters of detail. He and I may differ upon questions of principle, but we cannot differ upon the desirability of expressing our meaning in clear language. What happened was this, and I want to draw the attention of the House to it: The Act of 1873 made it unlawful to acquire less than the whole of the shares of the Natives in a block. It is quite evident, and it was always admitted by the Courts, that the process of acquiring the whole involved the necessity of purchasing shares by share. The Act of 1886, making it illegal to acquire any land, and repealing the Act of 1873, left people who had purchased individual shares without anything at all. The result of the present measure may be the same, and I do not think that is the intention of the honourable gentleman. The Premier spoke of putting the sponge over the past: and it is most desirable that the sponge should be put over the past. I give him and his colleague every credit for what was done last year by the Validation Act, but the sponge cannot be placed over the past by attempting to prevent people from completing the purchases or leases which they have commenced to acquire. I do not agree with many of my honourable friends sitting near me who think that there should be free-trade in Native land. When the House is dealing with interests so large as these,—dealing with these large areas of country, and dealing with the titles of so many people, altering the law which has created and which affects them,—the House is invited by the Government to proceed with a light heart to finish the Bill and get it through in one evening. And this is a Bill which affects more people, I should say, than any other Bill you could pass. The Factories Act affected a large number, but not so large a number as this. You are dealing with a Bill which affects the race whose interests we are most nearly pledged to protect. You are dealing with a number of people who are settled upon land in this Island. I only protest, for my part, that I am unable to do my duty as a member of this House. I say that for myself; and I feel sure that, of all those who are now doing me the honour to listen to me, and those who remain in the Chamber and pay no attention, there are not half a dozen members who have read the Bill and understand it.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—Oh!

Mr. BELL.—The honourable member for Riccarton may have read it, but I do not think he is an authority on this particular class of legislation.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—I hope you do not intend to put that in Hansard.

Mr. BELL.—I admit that my honourable friend is an authority on nearly every subject under the sun, but not on this. If I make that admission, I am sure he will not take objection to the exception. I have said so much with regard to Division I., and with regard to part of Division II. With regard to that part of Division II. which provides for incorporation, there is no class of legislation which deserves higher commendation. But it has not been devised by the present Government. It was devised by some settlers at Gisborne, who, last year or the year before, drew up a private Act which incorporated a tribe in the possession of land there. I have no doubt that that form of ownership must be successful, and I am heartily glad to see it in a Native Bill. My honourable friend the member for the Bay of Islands has seen these Bills in the past, and I appeal to him, Is it not a fact that the House has been occupied year after year, between the years 1865 and 1873, between 1873 and 1886, and again between the years 1886 and 1894, with amendment after amendment? If the honourable gentleman is going to grapple with this subject, it is only right that he should bring something more than the supervision of the Native Affairs Committee to bear on this Bill. The members of that Committee have not time to attend to matters of detail, and I submit that the Bill should not only go to the Native Affairs Committee, but to a special Committee also. It ought to be considered from the point of view as it affects the Natives, and also from the point of its details, and this could best be done by referring it to a special Committee. It ought to be so considered, so that there should be no possibility of wrong being done such as has been done in the past by dealing with the question in that careless way in which it has been treated from the year 1865 to the present time. I should like to see this Parliament turn over a new leaf in this matter, and postpone this Bill until next session, so as to give us an opportunity of considering it in the meantime; and, also, that those people in the country who are so largely interested in the question should have an opportunity of considering it, and informing the honourable gentleman of their views upon it. The result of that would be that he would pass an Act that would be a credit to him. If he passes this Act it will not be a credit to him, because he may be the cause of serious misfortune, for which he will in the future be heartily ashamed. Perhaps he believes that he will not command so large a majority next year; but I tell him that if he brings down a well-considered measure next year he will find that he will have the assistance of members on both sides of the House to pass it in such a way that it will be a credit to him—if not in the first year, at any rate the second year. I have not, Sir, been able to refer at greater length to the details of the measure, because had I done so I should not have been able to say what I wished upon the necessity for delay; and I therefore have been obliged to abstain from doing so. I know it would be of very little use to bring the matter before the honourable gentleman in Committee, because it is hopeless to expect him to reconsider matters which he professes to have considered already. But I do appeal to him to let it go among other Bills which have been dropped, to be dealt with in due course when it has been submitted to the House and the country for real and detailed examination and review.

Mr. HOUSTON.—Sir, I should like to make a few observations on this Bill before it goes to Committee. I think the Premier deserves a considerable amount of credit for the pains he has taken to bring the measure before the House, and to meet the feelings and views of the Natives with regard to this important matter. I do not, however, say that this is a perfect measure. Far from it. There are some grave defects in the Bill, which I hope to see removed before it passes into law. I can scarcely agree with the honourable member who has last spoken in what he said about the measure. There are many things, however, which he said in which I entirely agree with him. With regard to the consideration of this Bill by the Native Affairs Committee, I can say that it occupied the attention of that Committee fully three weeks, and I think the honourable members who composed that Committee were gentlemen who have considerable knowledge of Native matters. We had there the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), also the honourable member for Eden, both of whom, I think, are authorities in these matters. We had also the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, whom I consider the best authority on Native matters in this House. I consider that the views held by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay are better than those of any other member I have heard speak on the Bill in this House. We had also the assistance of the Hon. the Premier, who attended the Committee, as also did the Hon. Mr. Carroll. We had also the services of the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court. No doubt there are several matters of detail which have been mentioned by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) to-night, amendment as to which would have improved some of the clauses of the Bill; and, while I agree with many of the clauses of the Bill, I, on the other hand, object to a good many of the clauses. The Bill, as the House will see, has been divided into two parts, and I think this was a very wise course adopted by the Committee. The first part deals with the Native Land Act, and the other with the pre-emptive right. I think the Bill simplifies the conduct of the Native Land Court very considerably compared with what it has been in the past. I think it will be necessary for the Government to appoint more Judges than there are at present in the Native Land Courts, and I would suggest that the Stipendiary Magistrates should be made also Native Land Court Judges. I do not agree with the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) in what he says about the Appellate Court, for in my opinion this will bring about finality. Rehearings will not be as numerous in the future as they have been in the past. There is one other important feature in the Bill which has not been in any other Native Land Court Bill, and that is the power given to the Natives to exchange land with each other. This is a subject which has exercised the minds of the Natives in the northern part of the colony for a considerable time, and I am glad to see that the Government has recognised the necessity for giving this power, and has provided for it in this Bill. Many of these Natives will have the power conferred upon them by this Bill of exchanging small sections for others which it will suit them better to have. There are other clauses in the Bill which I attempted to have expunged from it. I consider that the keeping of clause 20 in the Bill is a great blot upon this measure. I have no doubt my views on that subject will not coincide with those of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell)—that is, with regard to the admission of lawyers to the Native Land Court. I consider that a great deal of the evil which has arisen in connection with the Native Land Court has arisen through lawyers being admitted to practise in that Court. I consider the Judges of Native Land Courts should decide all matters according to Native custom, and not upon legal technicalities. I believe the system of allowing solicitors to appear in cases going through these Native Land Courts has been the cause of great expense and loss to the Natives, and things have taken place that would not bear the light of day. The Patetere case is one that might be cited as an example. Such a thing should not be allowed to be enacted, and I consider it would be better for the Natives if solicitors were excluded from the Native Land Courts altogether. I wish now to refer to the Second Division of the Bill. The Premier knows that I am entirely opposed to the Government having the pre-emptive right over all Native lands. I believe that the Government should have the power of purchasing any large blocks of land that they may require for settlement purposes; but they should be prepared to go on with the purchase and with the settlement of the Native title, and with the settlement of the land so taken; and, if they are not prepared to do that, then, I contend, the Natives should have power to dispose of their land as they think fit. I believe the exercise of the pre-emptive right in the northern part of the colony will have a very injurious effect. The Natives there are not in favour of the Government having the pre-emptive right. I have a letter from a Native there. He says that this power should not be given to the Government. My correspondent wishes the Natives to have the power to buy and sell as they wish; that, in fact, Native lands should be brought under the same laws as European lands. I would call the attention of the House to clause 69 of the Second Division of the Bill. I hope this clause will not be passed by this House. The Bill would be a disgrace to any statute-book if such a clause as that remains in it. I will read the clause, and call the attention of the House to what it means:—

Mr. Bell

"Any person who, either on his own behalf or as trustee or agent for any other person, shall procure, take, or accept any conveyance, lease, transfer, gift, or other assurance from any Native of any Native land, or (excepting under Part XII. hereof) of any customary land, or land the Native owners of which shall hereafter be determined on investigation of title, or of any interest therein, or of any timber, gum, minerals, flax, or other natural product thereof respectively, or shall be a party to any negotiation, agreement, contract, or promise therefor respectively, shall forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding five hundred pounds, and in addition thereto shall be liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three calendar months, and upon any forfeiture or conviction hereunder the estate or interest in land so unlawfully acquired shall vest in the Crown. Proceedings for the recovery of any penalty imposed under this section may be taken by any person authorised by the Minister in that behalf.

"No creditor of any Native shall have any remedy against the interest of such Native in any customary land, or any land the title to which shall hereafter be investigated, and no such land or interest shall vest in any Official Assignee in Bankruptcy."

That clause has been struck out by the Native Affairs Committee, but I understand it is to be reinserted here. Now, Sir, I think that is a very objectionable clause, both to Europeans and Natives. I know that in my district on the West Coast there are a number of sections held which have not been passed through the Court. The Europeans have been accustomed, when requiring to build a house, to apply to the Natives for the timber. It is very difficult to get timber in that part of the country, and the Maoris fix a price; but no single Maori can sell a tree without consulting the others. The price is then fixed, and the European agrees to pay the price stipulated; but the tree may remain on the ground for a couple of years after the bargain has been completed. Now, I say, with regard to a transaction of that kind, which is perfectly fair and reasonable, to make a European liable to a penalty of £500 or three months' imprisonment is monstrous, and such a clause as that would be a disgrace to any statute-book in the world.

Mr. SEDDON.—It is only a repetition of the previous law.

Mr. HOUSTON.—I am very sorry such a clause should be in the Bill. There are other parts of the Bill which I agree with, and others which I disagree with; but, as regards the first part of the Bill, it is a very great improvement upon the present law. There are some exceptions, which I shall endeavour to have amended in Committee. I desire to compliment the Premier on his endeavour to pass a Bill which is an improvement upon those which are now on the statute-book. I do not consider this Bill perfect. No doubt the Premier has attempted to do his best in the matter. He has made a very fair attempt to simplify the law, and I shall endeavour to lend him all the assistance I can to make it as perfect a measure as possible: but I shall also do everything in my power to prevent the passing of that clause 69.

Mr. BUTTON.—Sir, I have given this Bill, as one member of the Native Affairs Committee, a great deal of consideration and attention, and I think I can claim some little kudos for trying to assist the Minister in putting it into workable shape. But, notwithstanding all the labour spent upon it, I quite think many of the remarks made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) are very applicable to the Bill. As to the Minister, I quite agree with what has been said respecting him—that he is to be congratulated upon his attempt to meet a very great difficulty. Well, notwithstanding he has brought the Bill down, and that in many respects I think it is an improvement upon the old law, yet it is a matter that is very difficult to deal with, and, as the provisions of this Bill are of such a nature that, unless they are very carefully considered, they may lead to a great deal of trouble, I think he would do well to accept the suggestion that has been made, and leave the Bill over, after having introduced it to the House and having had this debate upon it, for the consideration of himself and his Advisers during the recess, and bring it down again early next session. If he does that he may depend upon it he will have the support of honourable members on this side of the House as well as on his own side; and, if he brings the Bill into the House in a good shape next year, we will help him to pass it through the House. Now, while I speak of many of the clauses being an improvement, and while I say that the Minister is to be congratulated on his attempt to grapple with a very serious and difficult matter, I would just call attention to some points on which I differ from the honourable member. Nevertheless, I do not think our difference is very great. I think there is a mode of reconciliation on this subject. I refer to the provision he has put into this Bill giving the Crown the sole pre-emptive right. I believe the Minister, in introducing this, has tried to meet a very great difficulty, and a scandal that has existed for a long time, on account of private purchasers getting into contact, through persons who are not of the highest principle, with the Natives, and effecting contracts with the Natives which are very disastrous to the Natives, and by no means just in themselves. I think all the benefits aimed at can be accomplished by a very slight alteration of this Act, and yet obviate the necessity for the resumption of the pre-emptive right on behalf of the Crown. I know the Natives very strongly object to this, and to-day I have just had a few memoranda made from the petitions presented against this part of the Bill. I find that nine petitions have been presented against this part of the Bill, having 5,953 Native signatures; and then, in addition to that, there have been petitions presented in favour of Mr. Pere's Bill containing principles I am about to refer to, and which, I think, would meet the difficulty. It would mean a considerable modification of this Bill, but one which I consider the Premier might agree to. There are four petitions, bearing 4,981 Native signatures, in favour of Mr. Pere's proposal; so that we have altogether upwards of ten thousand Native signatures against the pre-emptive right being taken by the Government. Now, what I propose, instead of the pre-emptive right being taken by the Government, is some such scheme as was introduced by the Act of 1886. Provision is there made for incorporating the Natives and appointing Committees by which these corporations may act. Under the Act of 1886 Committees were appointed, and it was only through these Committees that lands could be sold, the Government taking control of the matter. The Government themselves were not necessarily the purchasers, but all purchases were to be through the Government. Now, I have no objection to that. I think it would be a very great improvement on the present state of things if all purchases had to go through the Government. But the difficulty with this Bill as it now stands is that, while the owners of blocks are incorporated, and Committees are appointed to deal with the land, and to alienate the land too, I think they can only dispose of land to persons who are acting on behalf of the Government. If that were amended, and the Government gave up the pre-emptive right generally, I should not object, in particular cases, over areas where the Government have made Proclamations, to their retaining the pre-emption in such cases. The Premier will remove a great deal of irritation from the minds of the Natives if he will give up the Crown pre-emptive right, and will, instead of that, provide that sales and dispositions of Native land in the future should only be through Government channels, but that the Government themselves shall not necessarily be the purchasers. If some such principle as that can be accepted by the Minister in charge of the Bill, then he and I shall be in perfect accord in regard to the Bill itself. I differ from him in that one particular, and, if a reconciliation can be effected between us on that basis, I desire as earnestly as he does to make this Bill in every way a workable Bill. I quite recognise the fact that a measure of this kind is liable to do a great deal of mischief unless it is very carefully considered, and I think he would be wise in accepting the suggestion made by the honourable member for Wellington City and allowing the Bill to remain over till next session, so that it may be very carefully considered, and brought down at an early part of the session; and he may rest assured that I, for one, and, I believe, other members of this House, will give him a warm support in getting it through and making it a good measure.

Mr. STEVENS.—I feel that it is futile to attempt to offer any opinions respecting this measure which may have the effect of diverting legislation from that channel through which, I feel confident, the Native Minister desires it to go, for the reason that there are very few honourable members who have taken sufficient interest in, or who have had opportunities of knowing, the history of Native-land purchases in the past. The arguments used respecting the Bill and its pros and cons up to the present moment have been of a technical character. It has been pointed out how the machinery clauses of the Bill may be best amended.

Mr. BELL.—It is almost entirely a technical Bill.

Mr. STEVENS.—It is not entirely a technical Bill. I think it is one of the greatest policy measures which have ever been brought before Parliament respecting Native matters. Such being the case, I shall endeavour to explain, from the policy point of view, and not from the technical point of view, what, in my opinion, would have been a very great advantage to the colony had it been carried out, and what will, I believe, be a very considerable advantage in the future, if the Natives have an opportunity of dealing with their own lands. I feel a great deal of diffidence in expressing this opinion, inasmuch as it may be thought that, because I am a Native agent, I am speaking with some degree of selfishness in the matter. That does not actuate me in my remarks in the slightest degree. I am speaking because I have had a life's experience amongst the Natives, and I know their wants, I believe, as well as any man in New Zealand. I have had an opportunity of knowing what their wishes are respecting their business. I was extremely sorry to hear the honourable the senior member for Wellington City say, in his speech the other night, that he did not believe any good result could be brought about by the individualisation of title. I entirely disagree with him on that point. It is the hope and the wish of the Natives that they shall have their titles individualised. I know Natives in many parts of New Zealand who would be living comfortably and prosperously were they occupying the individual portions of land belonging to them under their ancestral rights. For honourable gentlemen to assume that the Natives occupy their land in common, and live almost in a state of communism, is not correct. That is only so with regard to their hunting-grounds. In their cultivations you will see that they have lines of division, each person owning his part of the cultivation. Such being the case, it does not in any degree divert the Native mind from that which it has been accustomed to from time immemorial if we, by our Native Land Court, and by our surveys, subdivide their land and give each person his own separate part for occupation. It was contended by the Native Minister that it was impossible to make subdivisions in some instances. These instances are very few indeed. In the large majority of cases it is quite possible to subdivide the Native land so that each individual may have his own section. That is for the individual benefit of the Natives. But the next phase of the question is that, if the Government wish to acquire land from the Natives, it is one of the greatest objections imaginable that the titles should be individualised. The larger the areas of land which can be passed through the Court the more expeditiously can the title be acquired by the Government.

Mr. Button

Where the Government wish to acquire land, and where the Native owners are willing to dispose of it, it is quite right to have the land passed through the Court without subdivision, as has been done in many instances. But when it is a question of the Natives wishing to occupy their land, or to sell a portion of it to individual Europeans, in such cases it would be manifestly unjust to the Natives were they not permitted to have their titles individualised. Had the Natives been permitted to sell their land during the last twenty years without restrictions being placed over them, had they been permitted to sell their land in moderate areas, such as those prescribed under our Crown-land laws, I am certain that in the district in which I reside, and away beyond that, we should have had many hundreds of settlers where there is not a settler now to be seen. Because twenty-five, thirty, or forty years ago large tracts of country were taken up by Europeans from the Natives at a positively inadequate price, there has been a hue-and-cry against any individual having anything to do with the purchase of Native land. I think that the resumption of the pre-emptive right to-day will be doing nothing more than locking the stable-door after the horse has gone. I feel confident that, if the Government were to adopt the suggestion made by many honourable gentlemen and surround the dealings of private individuals with every safeguard and caution, preventing anything in the shape of unfair dealing with the Native owners, private enterprise and cash would be expended to a very large extent, and we should have both Natives and Europeans much more satisfied than they will be if compelled to wait probably for two or three years before they can deal with the land. The position is this: The Government hold as much land now as, nay even more land than, can be disposed of during the next three or four years, and any Natives who wish to dispose of their land to the Government will have to go through all the routine and red-tapeism of the Native Department, the Lands Department, and the Survey Department; they will have to run the gauntlet of these departments, and wait month after month before their transactions can be completed. To my mind there can be nothing more easy than for a Native to bring his land before the Court and have his title granted to him. On the order of the presiding Judge, a direct certificate of title under the Land Transfer Act should issue. Multifarious titles have been issued by the Native Land Court since it was established. It has issued titles which have been of no use to Natives or Europeans. It has also been said in this House that enormous swindles take place in connection with the Native Land Court, and so forth. Honourable members do not consider, in saying that, what they are talking of. A Court sits for many months, and determines the interests of four or five hundred people to a block of three or four hundred thousand acres of land. That is done in the cheapest possible way. Let us take a European property of five or six hundred thousand acres of land and put that in Chancery, and see what the cost would be of determining the ownership of the land. I venture to say that the cost would be tenfold more than the cost of ascertaining the Maori ownership. The Natives should be able to bring their cases before the Court, and the Courts should be held, where possible, at the Native kaingas. The Natives should not be dragged into cities. Imagine Natives living up country being brought to Wellington to have their cases heard. Numbers of Natives living at Taupo and other places inland are brought down to Wanganui, where they dissipate everything they possess, for they are sometimes kept waiting months and months. Because of these delays, and their consequences, the Native Land Court, Native agents, and all who are connected with Native-land transactions are blamed. The wrong lies chiefly in the policy and its administration, which policy, in the way I have described, tends to pauperise the Natives. The pauperising of the Natives has not been owing to the fees charged. I may say that I could name one agent who received ten guineas per diem from each side, and I believe the same amount from the Government. But because one person has acted unfairly, is it reasonable that the whole community should suffer wrong for the purpose of rectifying the wrong which has been committed by that individual? Most certainly not. If the Native Minister will accept the suggestion of other members besides myself, and pass Division I. of the Bill, and allow the policy part of the measure to stand over till next session, I am quite sure he will then have had better opportunity of satisfying himself as to the general wishes both of the Natives and Europeans; because it must not be assumed that in passing this legislation we are passing it for the benefit of the Natives only, or for their detriment only. There is a very large section of Europeans concerned in this question, and the larger majority of the people concerned are those who have been the pioneers of the country, who have gone back into the bush for the purpose of making homes for themselves, and dealing fairly and honourably with the Natives; and I say it is unjust, unwise, and unfair if a Bill is to pass in the Legislature which will only be of very questionable good in some cases, but in most cases will do great and serious harm to the Natives. That should not be the object of our legislation. The object of our legislation in this respect ought to be to do what is just towards the Natives and also towards the Europeans. With respect to the acquisition of Native lands by the Government, I am sure there will not be the slightest difficulty in the Government acquiring all the lands they require, for they have all the machinery with which to do it without resuming the pre-emptive right. They have merely to issue a Proclamation in the Gazette to say that the land within a certain prescribed boundary is under negotiation for purchase by the Government, and no other person is permitted to deal with it. This gives them the right of pre-emption at once—that is, immediately the Natives receive any sum whatever in respect of the sale of it. But I am convinced that there are small blocks, small areas of land in various parts of this Island, where the Natives and Europeans both know each other, having lived together for years, and on friendly terms, and lived together as settlers, where both Natives and Europeans would like the opportunity of bringing about—or, rather, not to have broken up—that friendliness or kindness which has always existed between them. That being so, I do hope that at the present period of the Maori history of New Zealand nothing harsh, or which the Natives, together with a large number of persons who know something of the Native character and habits, would consider harsh, will be done. I hope the Government will not pass a measure which will, in the opinion of the Natives, appear to treat them harshly or unjustly. Under the Treaty of Waitangi the Natives had their lands reserved to their chiefs, to be controlled by their chiefs, and, up to the period of the coming into operation of “The Native Land Act, 1862,” the Government acquired land from the Natives in those days by what was called “cession.” A deed of cession was executed by all the reputed owners, but the land was never passed through the Native Land Court; and most of the valuable blocks of land that were acquired in those days was not required to be passed through the Native Land Court. Now they have not only to pass through that Court, but the Government are to fix on an arbitrary price. They are to say, “You must take that price or nothing.” This would be unfair and unjust. It may be good for the colony; it may be a benefit to the colony; but it is unjust to the Natives, who hold their lands in accordance with our Constitution. Our Constitution is given to us for the purpose of dealing fairly, honourably, and justly with the Natives, and I say if we violate the Treaty of Waitangi by resuming the pre-emptive right it will be a mistake. But if the word “pre-emptive” were interpreted as I believe the interpretation should be put upon it, and if you called it the first right and not the exclusive right, in that case it would be right, if we had that interpretation of the word in the Act when it became law, to say that the Government shall have the first right to acquire land, but, on the refusal of the Natives to accept the Government price, the Natives shall then be free to deal with whomsoever they choose. That would be fair and just; but I do not see the necessity for this, because under the existing law the Government can quite easily acquire the whole of their lands, and prevent private dealings by the issue of Proclamations. I do not think it will serve any good purpose if I waste any more of the time of the House, but I will appeal to the Native Minister and ask him to agree to the suggestions that have been made with respect to the Second Division of the Bill. If he agrees to the postponement of this until next session, I am quite sure he will be consulting his own best interests, and giving the greatest satisfaction to the Natives, and will be doing no injustice whatever to any section of the European community in New Zealand, because I fail to see any reason in the statement—I do not know why or where, or on what public platform, or at whose instance, or whether it emanated from the Minister himself, as it very probably did—“I am going to prevent any future injustice being done to the Native race; I am going to prevent anything in the shape of land-sharks in the future.” Why, the character of the country now will prevent anything in the shape of land-sharks swallowing up large tracts of good land, because we have between eight and ten millions of acres of land to be acquired, and many millions of that, I am quite sure, the Government ought to be glad for private enterprise to acquire; and it would relieve the Government of the responsibility of having to settle the land and put people on it, which people, if they purchased from the Government, would say in a year or two that they could not live on small areas of the class of land to which I refer; whereas if they purchased direct from the Natives the responsibility would be thrown on the purchasers. I will conclude by asking the Native Minister to weigh well and carefully consider—and seriously consider, as I am sure he will do—the desirability of accepting the advice tendered both by his friends and his adversaries. With respect to the other portion of the Bill, the machinery clauses, they are very necessary, and anything that could be done for the simplification of the Courts will be in the interests both of the Natives and of the Europeans who are concerned in the matter of Native-lands settlement.

Mr. Stevens

MR. E. M. SMITH.—Sir, I cannot let this important Bill pass without saying a word or two, as I represent a district with a large amount of Native lands and a large number of Natives, and I wish, in the interests of the Natives, to state what I know to be their wishes and desire. I listened to the Native Minister when he was explaining the Bill, and then when he had done and was followed by the leader of the Opposition and other honourable members on the opposite side I heard them give him very great credit for the grasp he had taken while he was Native Minister. As a Government supporter, I shall go a long way in supporting their Native measures, as I have done all their other policy Bills; but, without wishing to travel over the same ground as other honourable members, I cannot give the Government my support in those clauses which give the pre-emptive right to purchase all the Native lands in the colony. I am willing to support the Government in preventing large blocks of Native land from being acquired by the land-grabber and speculator, but there are thousands of acres of land, from two or three acres to four or five hundred acres, that it would be in the interests of settlement and of the Natives themselves were they allowed to deal with as they liked. They should be placed on the same footing as Europeans in regard to dealing with their land. The Natives of New Zealand have a great grievance against the Government of New Zealand, who are treating the Natives differently from the Europeans; they are treating them more like children than like grown-up men. Now, they should, as far as possible, individualise these titles, and should allow the Natives to deal with their lands as they may think proper. The Native Minister knows very well that I have brought cases under his notice of some of the most industrious and most straightforward settlers in my district, where the Natives have been agreed on the one part and the settlers have agreed on the other part; but we are always tinkering with the Native-land laws, and placing the lands in such a position that they cannot be dealt with. The Government cannot under any circumstances purchase all these lands; they have not the money with which to do so, and therefore if they claim the pre-emptive right, and get the Bill through the House, it will be the means of retarding settlement in the country. Why should the Natives not be taken into consideration? They are petitioning the House session after session to be allowed to deal with their lands as they think proper, and it is this treating the Natives differently from the Europeans that is causing the disagreement with the Natives. I maintain that the Government has now the power, as has been pointed out by the honourable gentleman who last spoke, by Proclamation, to prevent any person in the colony from acquiring large holdings; but I know cases where land has been set aside by the Native Land Court for families, and these families have got in some cases thirty and forty thousand acres of land; but yet the land set aside for them cannot be dealt with, because the Proclamation has been made to cover the district. There are many cases I could have brought under the notice of the Minister. The Natives have a grievance against the Government that they are placing their lands in the hand of the Public Trustee—he is administering the lands of the Natives. I am not saying that he is not backed up by the law, but I undertake to say if that law were forced on the Europeans it would lead to a civil war. There is one clause in the Bill in which the Minister wants to go back to last January. Why not make it up to the time the Bill is passed into law, and all transactions entered into by Europeans in good faith to be completed? I will back the Government up in preventing fraud and the acquisition of large blocks. But let the Native Minister come round to my district and spend a fortnight with me when the House closes, and I will show him some large areas lying there, in small blocks, that it would be better for the adjoining small settlers should be cut up and settled than lying as they are—idle, covered with furze, and a nuisance to everybody, filling the air with the seeds of weeds, and giving rise to the nuisance of small birds. Therefore, at this late period of the session, I may say that if there is a division called for which will be in the direction of endeavouring to insert clauses in the Bill giving the Government the right to stop the land-monopoly I shall support it, but I shall certainly vote against the Government having the pre-emptive right over all lands in the Colony of New Zealand.

Mr. W. KELLY.—A good deal has been said to-night on this Bill from both sides of the House. I listened with considerable attention to the honourable members who have spoken on the Bill. I may say that, as one of the members of the Native Affairs Committee, I took considerable interest in getting it through that Committee. I undoubtedly, with other honourable members, must compliment the Premier for bringing down this Bill, because there are many clauses in it which it is essentially necessary to pass in order to fix up matters that are of very great importance to the people resident in Native districts. The Bill that the honourable member has brought down repeals no less than nine existing Acts, and that, of itself, I think is a great consideration, and one that the House will receive with favour. That portion of the Bill having reference to the pre-emptive right I am most decidedly against. I understood that, when that Second Division of the Bill was disposed of in the Native Affairs Committee, the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill would not bring it before the House again. Now I understand he intends to take it through the House. The honourable gentleman has been recommended to postpone proceeding with this measure further this session. Well, I think, after all the trouble and work that has been done, this would not be a proper position for him to assume. I think he should go on at all events with the first portion of the Bill, and endeavour to get that through, accepting in Committee any amendments tending to make it more suitable than it may be at present. There is a clause here which I think, if passed, will do very great injury. That is the new clause 15A. That will lead to the opening-up of every Native title in the country. It goes back to the very commencement, and unless something is done with this clause when the Bill is in Committee, either by striking it out or amending it so that it shall only act in future, it will, in my opinion, make a mess of matters. Now, the honourable gentleman referred to his journey through the Urewera country, and what he had seen in that district. I was very glad to hear that he intends to establish schools in that locality, and also to have a road made through from Galatea to Te Ahikereru and on to Ruatuhuna and Maungapohatu. That, I say, was projected fifteen years ago. It was the intention of the Native Minister in the olden times—it was the intention of Sir Donald McLean to carry through that road, and in his days a portion of the road was constructed to Te Ahikereru; but that portion has gone into disuse, and needs reconstructing again. I was pleased to hear the intention expressed by the honourable gentleman to have that road commenced, but I regret to hear that he does not intend to do anything in the way of opening up the

Urewera country. He should, at all events, endeavour to have that country surveyed, and have the Native title extinguished in some way. That is one of the great things the Government of this country should do—endeavour to extinguish the Native title all over the country as fast as they possibly can. With regard to that portion of the Bill referring to putting the land through the Court, I think, Sir, there is power at present, under existing Acts, to put the land through as rapidly almost as it can be by this Bill. I am in harmony with other honourable gentlemen who have spoken as to the necessity for the individualisation of the title to Native lands. I think the Government, before they attempt to put the land through in blocks to enable the Natives to dispose of it, either to the Crown or to any private person, ought to see that the Natives are settled on the land, and that the land is individualised, so that each Native may know his own land before the Government attempts to purchase or establish a system of taking this land. The district I represent is very thickly populated with Natives, and in the immediate vicinity of where I live the Natives have been awarded their lands in hapus. Now, these hapus are continually quarrelling and fighting over the land. One member of a hapu will erect a fence on a portion of a block that is awarded to them, and another member will start and tear down the fence, and there is nothing but trouble and disturbance and litigation going on. I think the Government should attempt to individualise the land, and have the Natives placed on it, and afterwards put them in the position to dispose of the portion they do not require themselves either to the Government or to any private person. That seems to me to be the proper course for the Government to adopt. Now, with regard to this Bill, I do not think the honourable gentleman is carrying out what was the intention of his predecessor. When the Act of 1886 was before the House the late Mr. Ballance made use of these words:—

“I know what the honourable member for Geraldine (Mr. Rolleston) wants: He wants to return to pre-emption pure and simple,—and that is an intelligible principle; but he makes a mistake, and I think that he will admit that it is a mistake, for it would not be wise to establish a principle which would not be accepted by the general body of the Natives. And I can assure the honourable gentleman that the Natives are not prepared to go back to the provisions of the Treaty of Waitangi and to accept pre-emption pure and simple.”

Then he went on to discuss the question, and to show that the Natives would not accept that. Now, I should like to ask the honourable gentleman, is there a single Native member in this House who is in favour of the pre-emptive right being given to the Crown? I do not believe there is; and I do not believe the honourable gentleman can find ten Natives in the whole of the North Island who are anxious to see that system of legislation again. With regard to the Thermal Springs district, the Government have practically exercised their pre-emptive rights since 1881, and during that time they have done very little to advance that district. They have been advancing money, and getting from the Natives small portions of land, but the surveyors who surveyed the land have not been paid for it. The Natives are prevented from disposing of the land except to the Government, and they are unable to pay the surveyors, and the surveyors have got into difficulties in consequence of being unable to obtain payment for the work they have done. Now, Sir, I trust that when this Bill is going through—the first part of it—the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill will be prepared to see that some substantial arrangement is made in it so as to place these surveyors in a proper position, and enable them to get redress. I believe the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) is prepared to submit proposals to that effect, and I trust that honourable gentlemen will assist in seeing that justice is done to these surveyors and storekeepers who are suffering in consequence of what has taken place. I do not think it necessary to say much with regard to the Bill. It has been thoroughly discussed and beaten out. In Committee we shall have an opportunity of discussing it clause by clause, and I shall endeavour then, with other honourable gentlemen, to have some amendments made so as to make it a workable Bill. I may say that I shall be very happy to assist the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill to put it through with some few amendments. I have an amendment, Sir, to move in clause 15, and I have amendments for one or two other clauses which I hope will meet with the acceptance of the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill. With these few remarks, I shall support the second reading.

11.0. Mr. MASSEY.—Sir, I cannot claim to be an expert on this subject, but I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on the Bill, because the Hon. the Native Minister told us that it was a matter of the greatest importance to the whole colony, but particularly to the North Island. Now, Sir, there is a great deal in that Bill that I approve of, but, on the other hand, there are some things in it of which I disapprove. What I disapprove of most strongly is the proposal in the Bill to resume the pre-emptive right over the whole of the Native lands in the colony. At the present time the Government can by Proclamation exercise the pre-emptive right over those blocks which they wish to purchase, leaving the Natives to deal with the others in the best way they can. This plan does not appear to give satisfaction to the Natives, because they complain that the Government select the best blocks and allow them a mere fraction of the value in return—a mere fraction of the price which European settlers would be willing to pay for the land. In approaching this subject I think we ought to be guided on the one hand by a careful consideration for the interests of the colony, and on the other hand by an intention to do what is strictly just and right to the Natives themselves.

Mr. W. Kelly

Such being the case, the first thing we ought to do is to set apart a sufficient area of land for the Natives to live upon. That seems to me only an act of justice to the people who were the owners of the land—the lords of the soil—before our coming here. No tribe, hapu, or individual Native should be allowed to become landless. We have heard a great deal about placing Natives and Europeans on exactly the same footing, but the clause which professes to resume the pre-emptive right treats the Natives as if they were children, and ties their land up. We are told that by resuming the pre-emptive right we are carrying out the provision of the Treaty of Waitangi—namely, that Her Majesty or the Crown should hold the pre-emptive right over those lands which the Natives were willing to dispose of, at a price to be mutually agreed upon. This clause may be capable of that interpretation. If so, I do not think we ought to insist upon carrying out the strict letter of the law in this matter, because the Natives feel they are not being treated fairly. I think they have good grounds for their complaint, because we take their lands and allow them just what we like in return for the same. Some members who have spoken on this subject have suggested that we should lease the Native lands. Now, I do not approve of the proposal to lease Maori lands, because I do not think it is well to set up a class of Maori landlords. I do not think Maori landlords would be any less objectionable than European landlords. One honourable gentleman—I really do not know which one—made a suggestion, and used a rather peculiar argument. He said that the Native race was rapidly becoming extinct, and that, if we leased their lands, the Crown would be the heir, leaving it to be inferred that we should then get their lands for nothing. Well, it may be a very long time to wait before the Native race becomes extinct, and I do not think any of us are anxious to see the Natives die out, any more than that we are willing that they should become landlords. I think most of us, judging from the debate, are of opinion that the time has arrived when there should be only one law for both races—when both races should be put on exactly the same footing. I heard the Hon. the Minister who represents the Native race state that he was anxious to see the Maoris become full-blown British subjects. That, I think, was the expression. Now, I think they are capable of becoming very creditable British subjects if they are only given an opportunity of doing so. But we pretend to be afraid of land-speculators. The Hon. the Native Minister told us that the land-shark, the pakeha-Maori, and the land-speculator were on the track, and needed looking after. That is the only argument advanced in favour of exercising the pre-emptive right, and locking up some of the best lands in the colony. There is the Auckland Province, for instance, which, in regard to the matter of communication, might as well be an island on account of the Native lands lying between it and the other provinces. Then, with reference to the railway, we are told that the railway cannot be completed until the Native lands have been acquired. Well, Sir, we put a Bill through the other day giving the Government authority to raise a large sum of money—half a million, I think it was—for the purpose of purchasing Native lands. So I hope that this difficulty will be speedily got rid of. I am strongly of opinion that the quickest and most effective way of settling the Native difficulty would be to allow the Natives to treat for the sale of their lands with bonâ fide European settlers. Of course, the argument which is advanced against that is the one used by the Premier—that the Natives would be swindled, and the land be bought for speculative purposes. We manage to prevent land-speculation very effectively in the case of Crown lands, and I do not think there should be any difficulty in preventing it in the case of Native land. We might treat it in exactly the same way. The Native land should be bought subject to the same conditions as the Crown lands, and should be sold through the Waste Land Board, or a special Board might be appointed for the purpose. There would be no difficulty whatever if the titles were individualised; but, even where they are not, the committee system would get over the difficulty. A committee might be appointed for each tribe or hapu, as the case might be, to act for those interested. I am quite sure that the easiest way to settle the Native lands and the Native difficulty would be to wipe the Native Department right out of existence. If that were done, I believe that in three years most of the land in the King-country would be in the hands of Europeans, and in process of being settled. There would be no need to borrow money in order to buy Native land, because the settlers would buy direct from the Native owners, and at much better prices than the Government are able or willing to give; and I believe that in a very short time, if the King-country were settled, we should have the railway running almost from one end of the North Island to the other. When the Premier took the portfolio of Native Minister he told us he was going to settle the Native difficulty once and for all, but so far very little has been done; and I am afraid, with all due deference to the Minister, he is not going to do very much more than his predecessors have done, although he has very many fewer difficulties to contend with. The Natives were never so reasonable and so easy to deal with as they are at the present time. They are offering no obstruction; they are only asking for justice and fair-play, and to be allowed to manage their own affairs in the same way as other British subjects. I certainly think they should be given an opportunity of doing that. As I told the House, I have no serious objection to this Bill. The only objection I have to it is on account of the clauses dealing with the pre-emptive right, and I hope to see those clauses struck out in Committee. If that is done, I am of opinion we shall then have a workable and useful measure—a measure that will be beneficial to both races, to the Maoris and to the Europeans.

Mr. MILLS.—Sir, there is a kind of popular—I was going to say public—delusion that if a member does not belong to the North Island he need care very little about what occurs in regard to Native land. But that is not so. I would point out that the same law that governs a large block of ten or fifteen thousand acres of land will also apply to a smaller piece. I am at one on this question with all those with whom I have come in contact in my own district, and I think we are all agreed on one thing, and that is, that there ought to be a levelling upwards with regard to the Native race. That, I think, is the prevalent idea. And now, dealing with this question of Native legislation, I should like above all things to see that due provision is made for the Natives. There should be a certain amount of land allocated for their purposes, and made inalienable before any more of their land should be parted with either to the Crown or to individuals. The main reason why I rose to-night to speak was that I noticed that in Committee it is proposed to strike out certain parts of this Bill, which, to my mind, are essential and should be retained. At any rate, it would affect many small properties in a way that I think would be most unfair to those now interested. I intend to mention one or two instances. At the same time, before mentioning them, I desire to say I believe that after sufficient land has been settled on the Natives for their own purposes they should be encouraged to part with the remaining blocks, and to invest whatever money they receive, say, in colonial Consols. They would thereby be deriving a steady and settled income, and probably would not spend their money so freely as they do now. The senior member for Wellington City laughs at the idea of the Natives investing in Consols; but I should like to tell him you will find very few Natives now who will take nineteen shillings for a pound. They know perfectly well the value of money, though at the same time they very often waste it, and I think we should prevent their doing that as far as possible.

Mr. BELL.—Would you make them take Consols?

Mr. MILLS.—No, not make them; but at the same time I think they would be willing to take for their money something that was a safe investment, not liable to go through the Bankruptcy Court. I know of many instances in which they have lost heavily. There was one case not long since at Palmerston North, and it was a legal gentleman who had to do with it. The bill of costs amounted to £327, and in that there were charged four days at £10 a day attending the Native Land Court, in which he did nothing, and admitted he did nothing. I think in such cases Consols would be very much better for the Natives. I know other instances, but the case I allude to was the estate of a Maori woman; it had to be administered by her husband, as executor, who referred it to a legal gentleman to take out letters of administration, and the consequence was that the balance that he wanted to pay was about £7, but after investigation the sum the man paid to me for my client was £437. I think it is time some fair measure was passed in the House to prevent that kind of thing from going on in future.

An Hon. MEMBER.—This Bill does not touch it.

Mr. MILLS.—I think this Bill will effect a great deal of difference in the working of the Land Courts: as I read it it will, at any rate. To refer to one of the points I mentioned: one of the points is in clause 38, where it says, "All amendments necessary to remedy or correct any defects or errors in any proceedings or documents, or to give effect to or record any intended decision in any proceeding, may be made at any time by the Court." Now, that is one of the cases. I knew an instance where a Native sold a block of land, or rather, agreed to exchange it, and before this transaction could be dealt with in the ordinary way a large sawmill was built on some of the land. Then the Native altered his mind, and finally agreed to take £110 for what at first was worth £20. He received £60, and it was then stipulated that he should have that piece of land passed through the Court, and then, of course, transferred to the party who bought it, on payment of the balance; but when he went before the Land Court he got the land recorded in the names of his two nephews, and the consequence was that no one could touch that section: then the man who bought the land in the first instance had to pay altogether, with expenses, something like £300 before he got the proper transfer of the block. The honourable member for Wellington City may know something of the case I am speaking about.

Mr. BELL.—I do not know anything about it. What is the name of the block?

Mr. MILLS.—It has no name. The difficulty arose through getting a transfer from the trustee. I have another instance in my own district, where a man paid £25 for a small section of land fifteen years ago. The deed was signed by those persons who were supposed to be the owners of that piece of property, and registered.

Mr. BELL.—How much was it worth at that time?

Mr. MILLS.—About the same amount as he paid for it. It was only ten acres, and the amount mentioned was a fair value. Now, it appears that eighteen months or two years ago, when the Native Land Court sat in Nelson, the same block of land was transferred to two beneficiaries—mere youngsters of about three or four years of age—of course without their knowledge; and of course this case was no better than the first one. I am now informed by the Native Land Court that it is simply impossible to get this section of land. And if this Bill will not make it possible to correct a transaction of that kind, I am going to move in Committee to have some provision inserted to meet such cases, because I consider that, when a bona fide settler has taken up Native land either by purchase or lease, whether it was five or ten years ago, he is entitled to justice, whether he is white or brown.

Mr. LANG.—I intend to support the Bill in the form in which it was returned from the Native Affairs Committee; but I do not mean to say the Bill is perfect, and that no improvements can be made in it. One amendment mentioned by the honourable member for the Bay of Plenty I intend to support; but I do not wish to let the debate end without having made a protest against the second portion of the Bill, which was thrown out by the Native Affairs Committee by a very large majority. Only two members of that Committee voted in favour of it. I refer to that part of the Bill which gives the Government power to become the sole purchaser of Native lands. This system has been in force in respect to the King-country for ten years; and what is the result? During the whole of that time not a single settler has been placed on the land. But, if the Government had not followed this dog-in-the-manger policy, but had allowed the Natives to deal with their own lands, the greater portion of that country would have been settled long before this. The Native Affairs Committee have given considerable care and attention to this Bill; they have been considering it for weeks; and, as that Committee is composed of men for the most part very well informed on Native matters, and as it has had the assistance of two such able lawyers as the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) and the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button), I think the opinion of that Committee should bear some weight in the House. Petitions have also been presented to the House, signed by ten thousand Natives, praying for the right to deal with their lands; and the Native members in this House are unanimous, and also the Natives throughout the entire colony, perhaps without any exception, are of opinion that they should be allowed to deal with their land. I think it is generally admitted that the Natives and Europeans should be placed on the same footing; and I would ask honourable members whether Europeans would like to be treated in the same way as the Natives are treated, in being compelled to sell their land to the Government only, and having no voice in the valuation of their land, and in having to take the price the Government fixes. They naturally look upon this as very unjust. I notice in a paper a letter from a Native residing in the King-country, fully expressing their views. I will read a certain portion of it:—

“I am expressing the actual opinions of the Maori people when I state that they are willing to sell all their lands excepting what they actually require for their own use and occupation. Why do not the Government arrange with the Natives to at once fix their permanent reserves, and let them have a clear field and no favour in selling their lands to any person who will come to terms with them? If the Government are afraid of our selling very large blocks of land to private persons, they might limit the area which could be sold by us. The Maoris would willingly agree to this restriction.

Why should the Government spend thousands of pounds in buying lands back from Europeans they sold it to years ago, when all the Maori lands would be thrown open at once if they adopted a liberal policy towards us? Either our lands are our own or they are not. If they are ours, then why should the Government be guilty of the gross injustice of preventing us from doing what we please with our own property? They preach of one law for both the Maoris and the Europeans. If we break their laws, or commit any offence against them, we soon find there is but one law for the pakeha and the Maori in the Supreme Court. The Government dare not deal with Europeans about their lands in the same way as they treat us. We ask to have the same law with respect to our lands as the Europeans have with theirs. This would be a proof of the sincerity of the Government statement that there should be only one law for both races.”

I was very much surprised to hear the Premier trot out the old arguments about the shameful way in which the Natives would be treated if allowed to deal with their own land, and how they would be imposed upon by the pakeha-Maori and the land-shark. From my experience, I think the Natives are quite able to look after their own interests; and, even if not, are we to believe they will be better treated by the Government having the sole right to purchase their land? Where can we find a greater land-shark than the Government? It is evident, by many instances that have been given to us during this debate, that the Government have only given a few shillings for land which the Natives could easily have got pounds for. The Government, it seems to me, wish to have the pre-emptive right so that they can force the Natives to sell at a low price, and then sell to the settlers at a high price, thus making a large profit; but I scarcely think that this is in the interests of settlers, or will tend to promote the settlement of the land; and if the Government are sincere in what they say—namely, that they only want to protect the Natives—they can easily arrange that the Native land shall not be sold in large blocks, but that it shall be disposed of as Crown lands are disposed of—the Government acting as the Natives' agent—and that would protect them from land-sharks and pakeha-Maoris. I think the Government are much to be blamed for not pushing forward the work of the Native Land Court. Great dissatisfaction exists in the district I have the honour to represent in this respect. I hope the Premier will not make the Second Division of this Bill a party question, but that he will allow his followers to vote according to their conscience. It seems to me unfair that a measure such as this, which is supported by the Native Affairs Committee and by the Native members of this House, should be thrown on one side by the votes of honourable members who have not thought it worth while to sit and listen to this debate, and who themselves own that they do not understand the matter before the House. During the greater portion of the debate not more than twenty-five members have been present, and I think honourable members should either be present, so as to be able to fully understand the case before this House, or else they should not record their votes on the question.

Mr. TE AO.—Sir, honourable members are returned to this House to do what is just. That is the object in returning us to this House. On Friday night last I heard some good speeches delivered by honourable members—by the Hon. Captain Russell and Sir Robert Stout; and to-night also I have heard some good speeches by Mr. Mitchelson and Mr. Bell; and I say, let this Bill be fairly considered and made a good law. To the Maori mind the laws relating to Maori matters passed by this House in the past have all tended to oppress the Maori people. The Government have oppressed the Maori people, and have not yet made a good law for them. For that reason I ask this House to now make a good law for the Maori people. The Maori people, as honourable members know, are in an exceptional position, and should not be treated in the same way as Europeans. The Europeans are not the aboriginal people of New Zealand, and did not acquire their rights here in the same manner as the aboriginal people. When the Europeans arrived here laws were made for the Maori people, and then we had the Native Land Court established, and the Maori people have suffered at the hands of the Native Land Court and this House, and they have been oppressed ever since the Parliament was a Parliament. And that is why I say that the Maoris have suffered many wrongs at the hands of Parliament. The Native Land Court is one wrong. Rates are another wrong. These amongst other things are what the Maoris are suffering from; and that is why I repeat, let the House make a good law for the Maori people. During this year the Maori people framed a Bill; they framed two Bills, and they have been introduced into this House this session; the Native Rights Bill is one, and the Native Land Administration Bill is the other: but they did not receive the favour of the Government. Then the Maori people sent petitions to this House in favour of these Bills, and the Native Affairs Committee has reported upon them. The number of Maoris who signed those petitions is over ten thousand, and I should have liked those Bills to become law, to settle Maori-land matters. These are the Bills that the Maori people approve of; and I should like the Bill under consideration to-night to be allowed to stand over for another year. Most members of this House would 11.30. prefer that this Bill should be postponed for another year. The majority of the Maori people would not object to see this Bill become law, provided certain amendments are made in it, and I now ask the House to postpone the Bill until next year, so as to give time for amendments to be made. I am now speaking to the Minister in charge of the Bill. The Maori people have asked this House to allow them to frame a Bill for themselves, and that is what they are asking for now. I think the Natives will be able to administer their own lands, and if they did so there would be very little trouble. That is why I support the Bills introduced into this House by the Native members. This is a very important matter in the eyes of the Native people. Petitions have been sent to the House signed by more than ten thousand people in reference to the Native Bills; and I ask that the passing of this Bill be postponed until next year. I now wish to speak on the question of the pre-emptive right. The Government is now asking that the Crown should resume the pre-emptive right. Formerly, when the Crown had the right of pre-emption, the Maori people suffered under that law. A certain block of land called Wharepuhunga was adjudicated upon by the Native Land Court, and when it was subdivided and individualised they sold it for 2s. 6d. an acre, and the land thus went from the Native people. If that land had not been so subdivided they would not have sold it, but, as it was, the Maoris lost their land. There was another block adjoining it which was disposed of in the same way. This is why I say that the Native Land Court should no longer adjudicate on Native land. Let the Maoris deal with their lands in any way they like. I was returned here to support the views I have expressed to-night. With regard to the Public Trustee, the Maoris feel that he should no longer have the control and management of so large an area of their lands: I refer especially to the west coast of this Island, and in making these statements I may say I am supported by many petitions from the Natives themselves; I have also heard what the Maoris have to say about the Public Trustee, and they are very greatly discontented. These are the grievances of the Maori people which I have related to you to-night. I would rather that the pre-emptive right was not resumed by the Government, but that the Natives should sell their lands in any manner they may think most advantageous to themselves. If they suffered by selling their land they would have themselves to blame, and no one else—that is, if they made a bad bargain. Why should there be one law for the Maori and another for the European in this respect? I conclude by again asking the Government to postpone this Bill, and give the House and the Natives time to consider it.

Mr. PARATA.—Sir, as a member of the Native Affairs Committee, I wish to say a few words on this Bill. I approve of the first part of the Bill, which contains very useful provisions. The first part provides machinery for dealing with the different lands by the Court. I may state that I do not approve of the pre-emptive right. The first part of the Bill I support, and, when those who are better able to do so than myself have amended it, it will become a very useful measure. I approve of the Native Land Court, if it is conducted in a proper manner, with a good Judge and a good Assessor, and also with good interpreters. A good many mistakes have, however, been made in the past owing to cases not being conducted in a proper manner, and because the Judges have not taken so much pains as they might have taken. The decisions of the Judges sometimes are not given in accordance with the evidence before them. There is a clause here that I think will suit the Natives of the South Island very well—the clause allowing them to exchange their lands as between themselves. Suppose I had twenty or thirty acres of land at Waikouaiti or anywhere else, and some other man interested in the same reserve had a similar area, we could make an arrangement by valuing the two pieces of land, and, if there is a difference in the values of those two pieces of land, the difference is to be made up by a cash payment to be decided by the Court. This principle should be applied to every part of the colony. There is another clause which, however, I think does not go far enough—namely, the one referring to Native wills. I quite agree with the honourable member for Wellington City that it does not go far enough. There are several clauses in the first part of the Bill which are very useful, and which have never been inserted in previous Bills. It does not matter what Government or Minister brings in a Bill, it cannot settle this Native question. It is a big question. I thought, when the Native Land Administration Act was passed in 1886, that it was a very good Act, and I supported it, and I was sorry to see it repealed. A measure such as that should get a trial, just as other Acts do. When a Bill is brought down to the House we do not know how it is going to work, even though it was framed by the ablest men, and when it is tried it is sometimes found that it requires amendment. The Act I refer to established a Board and Native committees, and I regret that it has been repealed. There always seems to be some part of an Act that is not quite right, and it may be the same with this Bill. Why should the Native be tied down when he is competent to deal with his land privately, and so long as he can get the highest price for his land?

Mr. Lang

An Hon. MEMBER.—They cannot do it.

Mr. PARATA.—Some of them cannot do it, but many of them can. I have not altered my opinions, which I expressed on the Committee, with regard to the first part of this Bill. A deputation of Natives waited on me in Wairarapa on Saturday, stating that they did not agree with the second part of the Bill. I support the first part of it, but as to the second I shall vote against it, as I am not going to see an injustice done to the Natives, it matters not whether they are in this or in the South Island.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—With regard to the Bill now before the House, I should not be doing my duty if I did not say a few words before it goes into Committee, because I not only represent Europeans who are interested in Native lands through leasing them, but I also represent Natives who are interested in their own lands. As to the first part of the Bill, I have no doubt whatever that, with some amendments in Committee, it will be an improvement upon the law now existing, and I shall be very glad to give the Premier any assistance I can to make this part of the Bill as complete as possible. I do not claim to be an expert in Native matters, but, living as I have been for some time in the North Island, I necessarily know something about Native matters. With regard, however, to the Second Division of the Bill, I shall, as far as I am concerned, protest to the utmost extent of my power against its passing as it now stands. There can be no question that as regards some parts of the North Island the position is a very difficult one, and I certainly am of opinion that the Government should have the right of pre-emption over the extensive areas of Native land which are being benefited by Government expenditure, and which are not used to any extent by the Natives themselves. There are large areas which we are improving by the making of roads and railways, and we shall later on be called upon to pay an enhanced price for that land; but even as the law now stands the Government has practically the right of pre-emption over it by proclamation, and no private purchaser can interfere with it in any way whatever. But it is quite another question with regard to a district such as I represent. The Natives there have been so long in contact with Europeans that as far as I can judge they are perfectly well able to look after their own interest and to dispose of their lands, and they have disposed of them to very great advantage for many years past. Their lands are also paying rates, and, in fact, are being used in the same way as Europeans' lands; and I do not think it is fair or just to the Natives that the Government should practically have the right of giving the Natives whatever they may choose to fix as the price of that land. Mr. Carroll, the Minister who represents the Native interests in the Government, has again and again, in very eloquent terms, claimed for the Natives that they should enjoy the same rights as Europeans, and as speedily as possible be put on the same footing. I cannot therefore see how he can approve of the Second Division of this Bill, because it is putting the Natives on a worse footing than they ever occupied before. The honourable member for Eden, whose knowledge of Native matters is certainly equal to that of any member of this House, recommended the Premier to postpone the Second Division of this Bill until further time was obtained to properly consider it; and I would advise him in the same direction. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) pointed out the mistakes that had again and again been made in the passing of Native legislation, simply because it was hurried through without due consideration, and that very great wrongs had consequently been committed. How can the Premier expect for a moment that such an important measure can be properly discussed at this late period of the session? The honourable gentleman knows very well what happened to the measure which was passed in 1886. It passed its second reading on the 2nd July, with ample time at the disposal of the House to consider it and make it as perfect as possible, because the session did not end until the 18th August. With this Bill, on the other hand, we are, according to the Premier's own estimate, within a couple of weeks of the close of the session, the Order Paper cumbered with over forty Bills, and yet we are asked to pass it through the whole of its stages. I say the House cannot be expected to do it justice, and if the Premier can get the machinery part of it through he ought to rest content this session. With these few remarks, I shall make no further objection to its going into Committee, but shall very strongly oppose the Second Division.

Mr. SEDDON.—Sir, at this time silence is golden. I shall endeavour to get the Bill through as well as I can; but I take this opportunity of thanking the members of this House generally for the very nice way they have received this Bill, and, with the assistance of honourable gentlemen, I am sure we shall be able to make a very workable measure of it. But to postpone the Bill because there may be a defect in a particular clause is, to my way of thinking, nonsensical. As to the suggestion made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) and the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button), that there should be a Part III., dealing with Natives who do not care to sell direct to the Government, but who are willing to sell through the Government to private parties, I think, myself, with very little trouble, there could be amendments made by the inclusion of provisions in keeping with the Native Lands Acquisition Act of last session. We have now a good majority in favour of this Bill, and I fear, if we do not take the opportunity, but say "Taihoa," as the Maoris do on all occasions, we shall never get anything done.

Motion agreed to, and Bill committed.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 3.—Interpretation. — "Half-caste" includes the descendant of a half-caste."

Mr. BELL moved to strike out the words "descendant of a half-caste," and to insert instead, "descendants of half-castes by Natives."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause."

AYES, 30.

Buddo	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Carnell	Lang	Seddon
Carroll	Lawry	Smith, G. J.
Collins	McGowan	Stevens
Duncan	McNab	Stout
Earnshaw	Meredith	Te Ao
Hall	Millar	Ward.
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Tellers.
Harris	Morrison	Mills
Hogg	O'Regan	Parata.
Houston

NOES, 7.

Allen	Massey	Tellers.
Buchanan	McKenzie, R.	Ball
Heke		Russell, W. R.

Mr. Buchanan

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
Flatman	Newman
Hutchison, W.	Pere
Joyce	Button
Maslin	Wilson
McKenzie, J.	Hutchison, G.
McLachlan	Green
Reeves	Fraser
Saunders.	Mackenzie, T.

Majority for, 23.

Amendment negatived, and words retained.
Progress reported.

The House adjourned at five minutes to two o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 3rd October, 1894.

First Reading—Third Readings—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—New Zealand Consols Bill—Rating on Unimproved Value Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Foreign Insurance Companies' Deposits Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Rating Bill, Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY moved, That the Council do not insist on its amendments in this Bill.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE recognised the honourable gentleman's loyalty to his colleagues, and had no objection to his moving this motion; nor did he mean to say that the reasons given were not very much more conciliatory and much better argued out than any reasons he had for a long time seen given from the House of Representatives. They were moderate, well argued, and conciliatory; and he thought they were intended to hold out the olive-branch for a moderate compromise. But he thought the amendment which the Hon. the Attorney-General had been good enough to say was vital to the Bill was not one that the Council ought, simply on the reasons assigned, however well argued or ably put together, to forego. He thought it would be better, at all events, if they had a Conference on the matter. This, moreover, was not the sole amendment that was objected to. He hoped the honourable gentleman would appoint a Conference, as many of the Council held strong opinions on the subject.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS moved, That the Council do insist on its amendments.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said the main question in dispute was in reference to section 2, where the words were added, "where any person works for hire." He could not help thinking the Council should give way on this point, and make all shops close compulsorily, whether hired labour was employed or not. He had had some experience in this matter, and recently in Dunedin he was interviewed in connection with it; and it had been pointed out to him that there were shops in Dunedin—and, he supposed, it was the case also in other towns—where the shopkeeper carried on the whole of his business with the assistance of his sons. The result was this: that this legislation would practically play into the hands of people who did not employ labour. It was manifestly unfair that persons who employed two or three of their own family in carrying on a business should have legislation carried in their favour, and that it should be said, simply because a man happened to have a girl or male person employed for hire in his shop, he should be handicapped in his business by being obliged to close, while his neighbour, whose business was carried on by members of his family, numbering, perhaps, three, four, or five, should do his business during that half-day. He would go so far as to say that the Bill would be practically useless as amended, and would entail hardship on persons who employed one or two assistants as against those who carried on their business with the assistance of their family. And he was not overstating the case in saying that there might be a widespread feeling of dissatisfaction if these people were compelled to close while others were allowed to open. He submitted strongly that the Council should not insist on this amendment, inasmuch as it would be legislating specially in the interest of a class. If the Council wished to say the Bill should not pass at all he could understand it. Then all would be on a footing of equality. But to say that it should pass in a form in which it would handicap those who employed labour was unjust. He submitted, therefore, the Council should not insist on this amendment, for if they did he felt satisfied that the Bill ought to be dropped, as it would result in grave injustice.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER thought the last speech was carrying the notion of equality a point further than before. The plea set up for closing a shop carried on by a person without the aid of hired assistance, on the ground that you would be affording an advantage to these small people over their wealthy neighbours, was a plea to which they ought not to lend an ear. If it was desired to carry out the principle on which the legislation they were now considering was based—that was, to afford a fair and reasonable holiday in each week to every person employed—then a very slight alteration indeed in the Bill as it stood would effect that. The only alteration required would be to insert the words "or maintenance" after the word "hire." That would provide that every person employed, whether for hire or maintenance, was to be entitled to a holiday.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG did not know there was so much objection to keeping open a small shop for maintenance, but he would point out this: The maintenance of these persons did not depend on keeping open one particular day in the week. They were at liberty to keep open every other day, except Sunday, as long as they chose. They were only asked to close on this particular day. As to an attempt being made to compel people to compete equally, he thought that was one of the strongest arguments in favour of the measure, because if the Bill went through as now amended it was the man who put most capital into his business who would suffer most. That did not appear to him to be just. While they showed every consideration for the small shopkeeper, they should show a like amount of consideration for the large employer of labour. The Bill had been before the country and the Legislature year after year, and, if there was anything at all in the argument that the Council should pass measures because they had been approved of by the country, this was the one in particular that ought to be passed on those grounds. What did they find in another branch of the Legislature when this amendment was under consideration there? An overwhelming majority were against the amendment of the Council—the insertion of the words "persons employed for hire", and he submitted that the representatives, who came back from the country a very short time ago, should know how that provision would affect their particular districts. He submitted that they knew better the wishes of those districts than the Council did. They would know more who would suffer and who would benefit by such a law. And, that being the case, seeing that the majority was so decided, the Council ought not to insist on this amendment. The effect of the amendment would not be to benefit the widows or orphans, or those poor people, whom nobody wished to oppress, but it would be to exempt all Chinese from the operation of the Act, and encourage them to come and start business in the colony. He thought the Council would act wisely and judiciously in not insisting on their amendment in this particular.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN would point out that the Hon. Mr. Stewart, in objecting to the amendment of his honourable friend Mr. Reynolds, spoke as if the labour of the members of a family, because they were not paid directly by the head of the family, was not to be considered labour in the ordinary sense of the word. He understood him to suggest that shopkeepers whose assistants were members of their own families ought not to have consideration shown them because they were not employing outside labour. He was using the word "labour" in a very curious and technical way, which was more and more becoming the fashion. Surely a man had a right to employ the members of his family before he sought elsewhere for labour. The honourable gentleman spoke as if a man ought to be under a disability because he employed the members of his own family before employing strangers. The Council had accepted the general principle of the Bill; they had accepted the compulsory half-holiday; but that was no reason why they should not propose amendments, and it was absolutely nonsensical to say that because this amendment was accepted by the Council the Bill must be dropped. The exact wording of the amendment as it went to the other House need not be insisted on. If it was said that the phrase "persons employed for hire" was of an ambiguous nature, he thought they might express it that a man who kept his shop open by himself, or with the assistance of the members of his family, should not be coerced as to the employment of his own time. This would meet cases which occurred very often, and which reasonably ought not to be interfered with. The original clause appeared to him to be an interference with the liberty of the subject. He heard an expression used by the Hon. Mr. Rigg about the day on which no man should work, as if it came out of the Decalogue. They had, it seemed, got so into the way of interfering with the Decalogue by repeal that it was thought reparation might be made by additions. They were to read that a man should work five and a half days a week, and on the half of the sixth and on the seventh day he should do no manner of work. It appeared to him to be a queer sort of compensation for taking away personal liberty and personal property.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR hoped the Council would consider the matter well, and either very much modify the amendment or give way upon it. He was convinced that there were only two courses before the Council—either to waive the amendment in clause 2, or that the Bill should be dropped. He was convinced that it would be infinitely better for the country that the Bill should be dropped altogether than that it should be passed in the form in which it was amended by the Council. The Act now on the statute-book was, it would be remembered, altered and amended pretty much as this measure had been: in fact, it was altered and amended so much that its author was on the point of dropping it rather than accept the amendments of the Council. It was very much to be regretted that he did not adopt that course, because there was no doubt the present Act was most unsatisfactory. From one end of the colony to the other the Act was the cause of very great dissatisfaction; and of one thing also he was thoroughly convinced: that, rather than pass the Bill as amended by the Council, it would be very much better to repeal the present Act altogether. He thought that would probably be the best solution of the whole question. But there could be no question, on the other hand, that, whether they upheld it or not, the question of a compulsory half-holiday on one day in the week had been before the country for several years, and that members had been returned to the House pledged to secure the compulsory half-holiday; there could be no doubt that if there had been a mandate on any subject it was on this subject. He was quite sure the country would never accept the Bill as it stood as a satisfactory solution of the question. It was inevitable that the Bill as it now stood would cause a great deal of dissatisfaction and heartburning, if a shopkeeper who happened to employ a person at 5s. a week was compelled to close, while his next-door neighbour, because he employed some of his own family, was allowed to remain open. They could all very largely sympathize with the reason that influenced those honourable members who introduced the amendment, and that was, the possibility of hardship being caused to small shopkeepers who kept small shops for the purpose of their own maintenance—in particular, the case of widows who opened such shops for the maintenance of themselves and their families; and, if one were convinced that the alteration of the law would necessarily have such an effect, the only course one could take would be to have an end put to the subject altogether, and to give up attempting to legislate on it. But he could not believe, himself, that the hardship would be anything like what was imagined in the case of small shopkeepers of that class. If, for example, the compulsory half-holiday should be fixed for Wednesday or Thursday, or some other day than Saturday, it could not be contended even by the most ardent friend of the small shopkeepers that they would suffer very much, because the business done on the one evening in the middle of the week would be very small indeed. The hardship would arise only in the case of Saturday being declared the compulsory day. In the first place, it seemed to him at present, as far as they could judge, that there was no prospect of Saturday afternoon becoming the holiday in any of the towns; but if Saturday were to become the holiday things would settle down and adjust themselves so that Friday evening would really become Saturday evening for the purposes of business: that was to say, wages would be paid on Friday instead of Saturday, and people would get into the habit of doing their shopping on Friday evening, which they now did on Saturday evening. He was thoroughly convinced they were over-estimating and painting in too black colours altogether the damage that would be done to the shopkeepers of this class. He hoped, at all events, the Council would well consider this: whether it would not be as well to drop the subject altogether rather than attempt to pass another half-hearted measure such as was passed by the Council two years ago. He was quite sure that would be a mischievous thing to do. As he had said, he was convinced that the only proper course for the Council was either to give way in the matter of these amendments, or to say that the present Act should be repealed and wiped off the statute-book altogether.

Hon. Mr. Bowen

The Hon. Mr. KERR said he had given his ideas and opinions on the subject in the course of the debate on the second reading of the Bill, and he therefore did not consider it necessary to repeat them now. He believed the amendments the Council had made, especially the one in clause 2, would simply render the Bill unworkable. This amendment would give no satisfaction either to those who closed their shops or to those who kept them open. Those parties who granted their assistants a holiday would consider this unfair legislation, and would clamour until they got their shops open in order to compete with those whose shops the law allowed to remain open. It was hardly worth while arguing the subject. It would be better to drop the Bill altogether than adopt this amendment. His impression was that if they did insist on the amendments the Bill would be dropped in another place. He would sooner have the law that was passed two years ago in reference to shops, although it was very unsatisfactory indeed. He believed the Bill as it stood would have as pernicious an effect, so far as the half-holiday was concerned, as the other. Therefore he trusted the Council, if it wished the Bill to become law, would not insist on the amendments it had made.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN thought the Council would do well to accept the suggestion of the Hon. Mr. MacGregor—that was, pass the 1st clause and clause 21, and strike out the rest of the Bill. That would be a sensible way of dealing with the Bill. He thought it would be a very proper way to deal with it, because this Bill had caused more heartburning and trouble than any other Bill yet put forward, and if passed in the way they proposed it was likely to go on causing heartburning. Why should not the Council accept the proposition he had made—that was, to make the closing-day a half-Sunday—shut up every one, publichouses and everything else? That was a fair compromise to offer, and if the other Chamber would accept that he was quite ready to compromise in that way. He could not see why publichouses should be left open, or why fruit-crackers should be left open, on the half-holiday any more than on Sunday afternoons.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Butchers?

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—Yes, and butchers also. They could do their work on another day. If the proposal he made to the Council was not acceptable, and if they wished to drop the Bill, by all means let them do so.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said it appeared to him rather strange that, among the honourable members who had proposed and voted for these amendments, there did not appear to be one who suggested the proper and sensible course to be taken after such carefully elaborated arguments as they had from the House of Representatives against the amendments. If any of these honourable gentlemen—he was not one of them, although he had supported some of these amendments—would move that the Council insist on its amendments, and appoint Managers to draw up reasons, those reasons would be submitted to the Council, and all this discussion would take place on an intelligible basis, and the Council would be in a position probably to accede to the suggestion of the Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley, and not insist on the amendments. But in thus interposing a discussion at this stage he hardly thought the Council was acting according to custom or common-sense.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY did not think there was anything to which he had to reply, but, at any rate, he did not know that any good would come from the discussion. He thought the suggestion made by the Hon. Mr. Mantell was the proper one, and the sooner they went to a Conference the better, unless, indeed, the Council was prepared to accept the proposal he had made. At any rate, there would be a division upon that, and upon the decision whether they accepted or negatived it the whole matter would be settled.

The Council divided on the question, "That the Council do not insist on its amendments."

AYES, 14.

Bolt	Kenny	Morris
Buckley	Kerr	Rigg
Feldwick	MacGregor	Stewart
Jenkinson	McCullough	Whyte.
Kelly	Montgomery

NOES, 19.

Acland	McLean	Stevens
Barnicoat	Oliver	Swanson
Bonar	Peacock	Taiaroa
Bowen	Pharazyn	Walker, L.
Dignan	Reynolds	Whitmore
Holmes	Richardson	Williams.
Mantell

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Jennings.	Shrimski.

Majority against, 5.

Motion negatived.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS, the Hon. Mr. Bowen, the Hon. Mr. Bonar, and the mover were appointed a Committee to draw up reasons for the Council insisting on its amendments.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, the object of this Bill is to enable the Government to afford to settlers an opportunity of obtaining money in small sums at a low rate of interest. This is one of the measures which I think the country has had before it during the last election, and one which has been received and passed by the members in another place, as carrying out the mandate of the people at that election. Sir, this is no new mode of dealing with a question of this character. The system has been in vogue for more than a century in Germany and for a shorter period in France, and has worked with remarkably good effect; and, looking at the safeguards which surround the Bill in its present shape, I think the country may be congratulated upon having given such a mandate to the representatives of the people for the purpose of assisting them in carrying out the work of colonisation. The same reason which existed in Germany and in France when the system was initiated there exists to-day in this country—namely, that the amount of interest charged on money is too great for people to pay; and seeing that, and seeing also the low prices of our products and the bad harvests which sometimes occur, the Government thought it desirable to give effect to the wishes of the people by introducing this Bill. This measure has received the most serious consideration in the House where the people are represented, and, in view of the large majorities by which the principles of the Bill have been carried there, I trust this Council in dealing with it will give expression to the wish of the people in the same way that their representatives have done. I am not one of those who have any degrees of sympathy with those who believe that this Council does not give expression to the wish of the people. I know very well, as I said a few days ago, that the Council's great object is first to ascertain the wishes of the people, and, having ascertained those wishes, to give effect to them; and I trust we shall be ready to do that in this instance. If the money-lenders and financial institutions amongst us had only relented a little and charged less interest on the money they lent, the Government would never have ventured to introduce this Bill; but we know very well that these institutions not only extract their pound of flesh, but also draw blood occasionally; and many hard-working men to-day, in consequence of the large amount of interest that they have been paying for money, are without home or habitation. This Bill principally provides for the machinery required, to which I will briefly call attention, after having explained the principle of the Bill. The First Part of the Bill provides for an office, to be called the Government Advances to Settlers Office. Honourable members perhaps may suppose that the intention is to establish a new office and a new department. Sir, the machinery is already prepared, the office is equipped, no new department will be made, and the whole matter will be managed in the same way as the other lending offices of the Government are managed, and by the same Board. The Governor is empowered by this Bill to appoint a Superintendent, who is to be a corporation sole, with the right of succession, and whose appointment will be during pleasure. He is to be supported by a staff of officials, and they are to manage entirely the internal economy of the establishment. In addition to the staff, there will be what are known as the General Board and the District Board. Now, I should like to call the attention of honourable members to the constitution of the General Board. The Superintendent, of course, will be ex officio a member—that is, Chairman of the Board—"and the six persons holding for the time being the offices of the Colonial Treasurer, the Public Trustee, the Government Insurance Commissioner, the Surveyor-General, the Solicitor-General, and the Commissioner of Taxes shall be ex officio members of the General Board." Those officers now compose the Board known as the Public Trust Office Board and also the Government Insurance Board, and they will be able to manage, and assist the Superintendent in the discharge of the duties which are imposed upon him in this Bill. Four of these members are to be a quorum, and every matter which comes before them is to be regulated by the majority. Then, there is to be a District Board, to be composed of not less than three officials, if the officials are to be found in the district; if not, three suitable persons are to be appointed by the Governor. Then, clause 25 provides for the classes of land upon which money may be lent out on interest. I need not do more than refer to them; they are named in clause 25. There are freehold lands held in fee-simple, Crown land on perpetual lease, Crown land held under Parts III. and IV. of "The Land Act, 1892," Crown land held on lease as a small grazing-run, Crown land held on agricultural lease under the Mining Act of 1891, Crown land held on lease—not being for mining purposes—under "The Westland and Nelson Coalfields Administration Act, 1877," and Native land held on lease in perpetuity under "The West Coast Settlement Reserves Act, 1892." Then, there are two or three modes by which funds may be obtained by the Treasurer for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Bill. They are by debentures, by inscribed stock, and by what is known as the Land-bond Fund, which is a new method provided for in this Bill. Now I come to the important part—Part IV. Part IV. deals with the manner in which advances are to be made; and here I should like to call the attention of honourable members to one particular matter. I may be accused of having introduced a Bill that is badly drafted, and I therefore call the attention of honourable members to subsection (9) of clause 42. It is peculiarly drawn, and would seem to have been altered to its present form out of sheer "cussedness" in another place. The original subsection said that no smaller sum than £50 should be advanced; and here by some means or other the sum of £25 has been inserted, leaving the £50 standing, so that it is almost impossible to understand it. However, I wish to exonerate the draftsman, and the honourable gentleman who had charge of the measure in another place, from any share in the bad drafting of this clause. The subsection now reads thus: "No advance shall be granted for a sum of less than twenty-five pounds, nor for more than five thousand pounds, and every advance shall be for fifty pounds, or a multiple of fifty pounds." Advances are to be made on freehold securities to an extent not exceeding two-thirds of the value in the case of country lands, and in the case of urban and suburban lands to the extent of one-half the value, and in the case of leasehold lands to an amount not exceeding one-half of the value of the lessee's interest. And provision is taken under this Bill by which applications for sums not exceeding £500 are to have priority. The advances are to be made as the Superintendent may require them, and the money to be raised is only to be used for the purpose of making advances, and not used for any other purpose. The Bill also provides for special accounts, and for the audit of accounts, and it further provides—which I think is one of the most important provisions in Part

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

VI.—for an Assurance Fund. Clause 62 deals with this question very clearly. It says,—

“One-tenth as aforesaid of all moneys received in respect of interest on investments under this Act shall, as and when paid into the Management Account, be thence transferred and paid over to the Public Trustee as an Assurance Fund.”

That, Sir, will be for the purpose of meeting any losses or contingencies that may arise. It is a very desirable clause, and one which I am sure will commend itself to the consideration of the Council. The currency of the loan is to be for a period of thirty-six years and a half. Upon this loan the borrower will pay 5 per cent. interest, which will be payable half-yearly, and 1 per cent. to pay off the capital, so that at the expiration of thirty-six years and a half the whole amount of the loan will be wiped out. In addition to that, the borrower is allowed at any time to pay off any portion of this money, with which he is credited, and for money so repaid he receives interest at the rate of 4 per cent. Now, as I have stated, the Bill, with the exception of the portions I have referred to, is of a mere machinery character; and the schedules are elaborate. The mode of dealing with mortgages is very simple. The mortgages, or dockets, as they are called here, are of the simplest character. The Bill provides that “In every mortgage docket there shall be implied on the part of the mortgagor, and in favour of the mortgagee, the covenants and the conditions” specially stated in the Bill itself. At the end of the Bill there will be found several schedules, but the most important of all is the Second Schedule, which shows the amount that is to be paid half-yearly in interest, and the amounts paid in reduction of the capital. The schedule has been certified to by competent actuaries, and I believe it will be found to be perfectly correct. As I have said before, it is our desire to afford facilities to people to borrow money at the cheapest possible rate of interest. We think this is one of the best means for doing that. There is a clamour from end to end of the colony for this method of advancing cheap money, and we should not be fulfilling the duty imposed upon us if we resisted the call that has been made upon us by the people. At the last election the matter was brought forward prominently upon every platform of the country—cheap money for the people—and we have endeavoured faithfully to carry out their wishes in this Bill. I move, That this Bill be now read the second time.

Debate adjourned.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—Sir, when this Bill was before the Council yesterday I thought it was not getting that kind of consideration that was necessary for a Bill of such an important nature as this, and it was with the view of its getting more consideration, and to enable us to see what could be done with it, that I moved the adjournment of the debate. The Bill coming at a period of depression like the present is a Bill of serious consequence to the colony, and therefore we must approach the subject from different points of view, to see whether it is good for the colony that this Bill should pass, or whether in the interests of the colony it is better that it should be thrown out. It has often been thought that a loan of about £250,000 might be safely floated in the colony. That has been discussed for a good many years now, but it has never yet been attempted. Now, whether the present is a good time to attempt this or not honourable members must judge for themselves. When you come to consider the condition of the finances of the colony, the interference of this Bill may be considerable, or it may create no difficulty at all. The main point is this: Many people have said that the banks are overflowing with money, and that this Bill is a necessity to find investments for the people. Well, Sir, I should like to say that the banks are not overflowing with money, and that there is plenty of employment for capital. And I would say this for the institution I am connected with: If we had had £500,000, £600,000, or £700,000 more we could have lent it very satisfactorily; so that it is a delusion to say that the banks are full of money. Of course it may be the case that other banks, which it may suit to take away money from here when there is good investment elsewhere, and to bring it back when there is a good chance of investment here, may be full of money. That is a matter we cannot control. There is no doubt the Colonial Treasurer, being a business-man, has read the signs of the times, and has seen that the Post-Office deposits are not quite as safe to keep as what Consols would be under a Bill like this. Some honourable gentleman was saying that the savings-bank deposits were quite safe. Why, it is not many years ago that a gentleman, declaring that they were insecure, created a run of £44,000 on the colony's savings-banks. When people get into a panic they are no more amenable to reason in regard to Government banks than to any other banks. So that I can see what the Treasurer is seeking to do is to change the investments from deposits at call to Consols for thirty-six years. All of us would like to follow the same course and to do the same thing if we could, for then the money would not be subject to withdrawal in times of panic. Now, will this Consols Bill do what is being done by the savings-banks? It will not. The savings-banks have deposits of very small amounts. They are added to by sums of 5s., 10s., or £1, and so depositors continue adding up. This Bill will not touch that class of deposits at all. Then, I come to another class it is supposed to touch, and that is the investment of trust money. Is it well that these trust moneys should be taken for this investment? How have they been invested hitherto, and what good have these trust moneys done? We know the trust moneys are confined to special investments. Take the North Island here: how far would it have been improved except for these trust moneys? These trust moneys have been lent on properties all over the North Island—to do what? To enable the proprietors of that land to fell the bush, to sow the country, and to bring it into profitable occupation: so that it is not wise and not well for the Treasurer to seek that class of investment too much, and to bring it out of the employment to which it has hitherto been put. The question of Government investments cannot touch anything unless it touches the industries of the people, and while the Government is getting money it may do considerable harm to the investments. Now, Sir, people talk about getting cheap money. How does money become cheap? Money is cheap because of the distress all over the world. It is hoarded up and put in the Bank of England, and they get nothing for it, simply because they are afraid to trust it out. If the country became prosperous again, money would go up again quickly enough, you would find. Money would rise in value. When money rises in value it means that things are prosperous, and it is the opposite when money is at a very low rate. If you see money fetching a good price, as well as other articles in the market, we are succeeding, and everything is flourishing. So it is with the rise in price of grain and other produce. One honourable gentleman laid very great stress last night on the fact that the result of this measure would be to transfer money from the banks to these Consols. We must not forget that the more money that is taken away from the banks the more money is withdrawn from the trade of the country. The banks do not keep money locked up in safes. They accept deposits from all people, and they lend it out in the business of the country. It would be impossible for them to pay the shareholders a dividend, or to pay their expenses, if they locked it up. As for saying this money would go into the Government bank, how could the Government bank keep it, and pay the interest on it, unless they put it into profitable occupation? The thing is ridiculous. The bank would have to put it into profitable employment if it were put in the bank. Now, Sir, a great deal has been said about distrust, and it is said this Bill will draw money from people who have hoarded it up by putting it in the ground, or in stockings, as the saying is. Well, I doubt very much whether it will do that, or whether there is much hidden away in stockings. The difficulty that faces New Zealand is that we are not old enough yet to have acquired wealth, and there is very little acquired wealth in New Zealand. The Australasian Colonies are older, and the people there have acquired wealth, and have been able to lend money within themselves; but we are not in that position here. So far as this Bill goes, however, to take the place of larger deposits in the Post-Office Savings-Bank, I have no objection to it, and, if the Government would agree to reduce the amount to a moderate sum, I should have no objection to see the Bill given a fair trial.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—You do not want money, I expect?

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I should be sorry to profess that I did not want money. We all want money, and I should like to get some of it myself.

Hon. Mr. McLean

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—And pay interest on it, of course?

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—Oh, yes, Sir, there is a point in this Bill I should like to draw the attention of the Government to, and I would also call the attention of the Council to it, and that is the portion of the Bill under which they can inscribe the stock so that it might be converted in England. Now, we are getting into a very dangerous position with this inscribed stock, and the difficulty may face us at any time. If the English public take note of the floating of inscribed stock privately, and getting it on the market privately, instead of putting it on the market publicly when every one would know that it was being put on the market, it will lead to complications. I should like to draw the attention of the Council to the fact that we had the Cheviot money floated in debentures. That was floated away into London. We then had other purchases. Under the Land for Settlements Act, for instance, debentures were issued, and they are finding their way to London, and are being sold privately. It will certainly be the same in this case. We shall one day have an awakening. People will see that our loans are increasing; and they will wonder how they are increasing, because they have not seen them put on the market. We might get into trouble in that way, and I hope serious consideration will be given to the matter by the Government before dealing with any more money in the same way. I have said that I am quite willing to see the system fairly tried; but I believe we cannot touch this Bill, as it is a money Bill.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—It is not a money Bill in the strict sense of the word.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I believe, Sir, it is a money Bill, and that we cannot touch it; but, if I am wrong in that, the Council can, of course, deal with the Bill as it thinks fit. I should like, however, to say that I cannot agree to vote for the Bill unless the amount is reduced. If it were reduced in amount, say, to £250,000 for the year, so as to enable the Government to test the system, I should not like to stand in the way of its being tested, because I think it is a fair proposition to make. If we agree to try £250,000 for the first year, then we could see whether it was a success or not; and if it was a success, then it could be extended. My own idea is this: that if everything were going well in the colony the Bill would be a failure, and it can only succeed through a lack of public confidence in other institutions. That is the only way success can attend it, and for that reason the Government themselves would be wise in not endeavouring to withdraw too much money out of circulation and out of the active trade of the country—not to destroy that trade for the purpose of getting this money. As for the Government employing this money, they have many ways in which they could do so. They have their loans to local bodies. They could take the Treasury bills and reduce them, and I have no objection to their using the money in that way; but I would suggest that, if the Government would agree to modify their proposal, the Council should allow the Bill to be tested, so as to see whether it will prove a success or not.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—Sir, I cannot agree with the last speaker that dear money always accompanies prosperity in any country. My opinion is that dear money would cause industries to suffer by increasing the cost of production, which would be disastrous in face of the low prices of produce. With regard to the Bill itself, it seems to me that it is not a borrowing Bill in the ordinary sense of the term, because until the money is specially appropriated by Act of the Assembly it is simply a trust fund in the Public Account. When it is appropriated it will then partake of the nature of a loan for public purposes. I think this is a very convenient way for the Government to find money for the purposes of permanent Appropriation Acts that are already in existence, and it will be a great convenience for the public to be able to get safe investments for their money if they cannot do so at present, because some persons prefer to receive a low rate of interest when by accepting it they can get as near safety for their investments as possible—that is, the guarantee of the colony. Investment in banks is not always safe, because the banks have in some cases to come to the colony to guarantee their own existence. Only last session an Act was passed which gave power to the Government to make bank-notes a legal tender.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Have any of the banks applied?

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—I do not know, but it was considered desirable in the interests of the colony to pass such an Act—an Act which is still in existence and available as a remedy against possible disaster, brought about by foolish commercial panics. Sir, this Bill has been denounced as a borrowing Bill, and it has been stated that the colony returned members pledged not to borrow; but what do we find? That those who cry out most against borrowing are the most anxious to get money out of the Treasury for the comforts and convenience of their own districts. But how are roads and bridges to be made unless we borrow in some shape or form? It cannot be done from the Consolidated Fund, because the Consolidated Fund is to meet the ordinary requirements of departmental administration. If the colony is to progress by settling our waste lands, money must be found for roads and bridges to make settlement possible. I think that is one of the most convenient means of finding that money. Then, with regard to Treasury bills, the amount we are authorised to raise by Treasury bills is about £1,300,000—over a million of money. Of course this money must be found in some way or other. It must be taken out of the Post-Office Savings-Bank, or the Insurance funds, or from the Public Trust funds. I think this could be worked very well if the Savings-Bank would limit their deposits to £200. This would provide for small investors; and under this Bill larger deposits could be made, and then both systems would work in harmony. One of the greatest dangers in regard to savings-banks, as pointed out by the Hon. Mr. Bowen, is that the moneys are at call, and in times of financial disaster there may possibly be a run on the banks. In this respect I think the same safeguard should be taken with regard to savings-banks as has been already taken with regard to ordinary banks: that is, in times of panic, if there should not be sufficient gold to meet the demands made upon the Government, a legal tender should be established by law to supply the place of money. It seems to be the idea of some honourable members that because the Government will secure some of the money in the colony it will affect the industries of the colony. I do not see it, because the money will not be lost to the colony. It simply assumes the shape of a bank-note, and cannot therefore be diverted from industrial pursuits, if those persons who hold Consols wish to apply their money to such purposes. I do not think in that respect there will be any injury whatever. I think the Bill, as a whole, is a very useful one, and I hope it will be carried.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—I should like to have some indication from the Government as to whether they are ready to adopt the suggestion of the Hon. Mr. McLean as to lessening the amount it is proposed to borrow under this scheme. I should have no objection to voting for a trial of such a method of raising money, and affording people some means of getting a certain investment with the Government, if the experiment were confined within reasonable limits. I have listened to several proposals made during past years in the colony for trying such an experiment, and I quite agree with the honourable gentleman that there would be no danger at all in trying such an experiment if it were confined within reasonable limits, and if we were permitted, before embarking in a very large scheme of this character, to ascertain its suitability to the circumstances in which we are situated.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I feel, in common with many others, that the magnitude of this proposal demands our most careful attention, and I could not make up my mind to vote for a million to be borrowed in this way. I felt very much the force of the remarks of the Hon. Mr. McLean as to the withdrawal of capital from the banks, and the consequent withdrawal of that amount from the industries of the colony. I am sure, with him, also that there is not that quantity of spare cash which is supposed to exist, and which it is anticipated would be absorbed under the operation of this Bill. If there is a large amount of surplus cash it might be convenient to many to put their money into an absolutely safe investment, and get 4 per cent. for it. But I fear such is not the case, and from our general knowledge we may say that we know it is not the case. And therefore money in the colony may be withdrawn from useful employment in developing the colony. That is my great difficulty. Whether, in the event of any modification as to the amount to be raised under the new scheme, I might support it, is a matter to which I might give further consideration, but I can be no party to agreeing to raising within the colony the sum of a million of money. There is one point which I suppose I am stupid enough not to understand, but I should be glad if the honourable gentleman in his reply would refer to it. It is in connection with clause 37:—

“The Registrar may, with the consent of the Colonial Treasurer, accept Government securities in lieu of cash for Consols under this Act, upon such terms as the Colonial Treasurer may think fit.”

I confess I do not know what this means. I understand the object of this is to get cash for the use of the Government, but if the Government are to issue Consols and accept Government securities in lieu of cash it is a great mistake. They may be taking Government securities at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and issuing Consols on which they are going to pay 4 per cent.

The Hon. Mr. KERR.—I never like to give a silent vote on an important question. I think the Attorney-General, in introducing the Bill, explained it very satisfactorily and fully. He pointed out that it was a Bill to encourage thrift amongst the people of New Zealand. I could not see much in the remarks of the four or five honourable gentlemen who followed him. The great objection to the Bill seemed to be that it was a borrowing Bill. They seemed to harp on the word “borrowing,” and had no other objection to urge against it except that it was a “borrowing” Bill. Now, is it any more borrowing than the Post Office taking deposits from their numerous customers, or than the banks taking deposits from their customers? I think not.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—That is borrowing.

The Hon. Mr. KERR.—Surely. I always look on banks as borrowing from their customers; they give 4 per cent. and lend out at 8 and 10 per cent. But this system of borrowing is for a different object. It is to secure good investments for the people of New Zealand—investments that can be relied upon at any time. Has thrift been encouraged in the past? Judging from our history I do not think it has been. In the other colonies, if not in this, I think thrift has been very much discouraged. People have lived economically, and have put their savings into the banks and financial institutions, and if thrift has not been discouraged by the failure of banks and the “reconstruction” of financial institutions I do not know what discouragement is. This Bill, I understand, gives power to the Government to receive sums of money not only from individuals, but money held in trust: in fact, it will hold the money of those who during their lifetime have gathered sums up to £500 or £1,000 or £2,000, and wish to make provision for those they may leave behind them. The Government, looking, no doubt, at all the surroundings of our financial difficulties in the past, have brought in this Bill to afford a safe and secure investment for these people who are desirous of securing their money safely in time to come. I have not a great deal to urge further than what appears on the face of it—that the Government, along with the other Bills they have introduced, is providing a safe investment for the poorer classes in New Zealand. It may be said that the Bill is not for the poorer classes. But it must also be taken into account that the Savings-Bank only takes money to about £500, and, if I am correctly informed, the Treasurer can reduce the interest to 2 per cent. at any time he chooses. By making a safe investment under this Bill 4 per cent. is secured to those who invest, and that is a fair amount to those who wish for a safe investment with small interest. A great deal has been said in reference to the amount of capital that is stored up in New Zealand, and it has also been stated that money is overflowing in the banks—that colonists are holding it, and would not invest in this country, and are sending it away to England and elsewhere for investment, because they have no confidence whatever in the Government of New Zealand. Let us see by this Bill whether there is money in the country, and whether the people are willing or not to invest it when they find safe security. I am sure those who have money in stockings or teapots, or hidden underground, when they find the Government willing to receive their money, will bring it forth and make it reproductive. I think, if it were for nothing else, that we should find this out. The want of confidence in the Government ought to be put to the test, and we could put it to no better test than by calling on those who have money to invest it by taking the Consols that are now offered by this Bill. I think it is only fair and reasonable that the Bill should be passed by the Council. It is a policy measure, and has been introduced to afford relief and protection to the people of New Zealand. This and the other money Bills have been brought forward, in my opinion, in the interests of the people, and therefore this Council should not hastily or hurriedly reject it. I believe that it is the wish and desire of the people that Bills such as the Consols and Advances to Settlers Bills and liberal measures such as these should be passed. I also believe that if these Bills are not passed the people of New Zealand will not rest satisfied, but will bring such pressure that this Council will have to pass them. It is all very well to say that we are sent here to check and revise. We are here not only to do that, but to assist in the legislation of this colony. I have heard a great many complaints this session with regard to the slovenly manner in which the Government have sent down Bills that required hours and days of labour to lick them, as it were, into shape. But, Sir, is it not the duty of this Council, and of the House also, to revise and to alter and to bring into proper form a Bill if it is not in the shape it should be in—to improve the machinery so that the Bill will be workable? If that is not our duty, what are we here for? That is one of the principal duties that we have to perform, and in doing so we only do our duty and no more. I really think honourable members overstep the mark when they malign and say ill things of the Government because a Bill may be a little faulty. We know well that the Government have onerous duties to perform, and that these duties occupy members of the Ministry day and night during the session, and it is no wonder that a Bill occasionally comes up framed in a manner that is not acceptable to the Council. I will simply conclude by expressing the great need there is, in the interests of the people of New Zealand,—I will not say the poorer classes, but in the interests of the well-to-do people also,—that some safe security should be given them to invest the funds that they are not prepared to put into enterprises, in buildings, or in companies. So far as my experience goes, I would say, keep away from companies: they are very awkward things to have anything to do with; and if people can get only 2 per cent. for Consols let them accept that, because they know they will get back the principal, and that is more than those who enter companies can depend upon. In some companies both the principal and interest go. I hope the Council will pass this measure, and show to the country that we have a real desire for progress.

Hon. Mr. Bonar

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—I should like to say a few words on this Bill. It is, as we have been told, a policy measure of the Government, and therefore ought to be treated with due respect. Now, Sir, I am quite willing, unlike some previous speakers, to assume that the real object of this Bill is as stated in the preamble—namely, to afford safe investments for the savings of the people. I am also willing to assume that it is not for the purpose of obtaining a certain amount of money to play with, as has been suggested in the course of this debate. I am also disposed to agree with the Hon. Mr. Kelly when he says that the Bill is not, in the full sense of the term, a borrowing measure until appropriation is made for the purpose of using the money. But while looking at the Bill and its professed object it behoves us to consider whether it is likely to attain that object. What, then, does experience teach us in this respect? In 1882 Major Atkinson, the then Colonial Treasurer of the colony, introduced a precisely similar Bill with a precisely similar object. It was a Bill proposing to offer 5 per cent., and under its provisions sums of money from £5 upwards could be deposited by children of ten years of age and upwards who were desirous of becoming depositors. I think, if the Hon. Mr. Montgomery will look up Hansard of that year, he will see that he rather ridiculed the idea of children—boys and girls—being allowed to become depositors.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I approved of it.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—I think, if the honourable gentleman will refresh his memory, he will find that, while approving of the Bill, he rather ridiculed the idea of children of ten years of age becoming lenders under that Bill without the consent of their guardians. Well, Sir, what became of that Bill, and what was its effect? The whole of the money was mopped up by the Post Office, and afterwards the bonds were turned into inscribed stock, and absorbed in the general debt of the colony, not a penny of it having been taken up by private persons. That was, moreover, a proposal to pay 5 per cent., while this is only one to offer 4 per cent. I am disposed to admit that there may be a certain amount of money in this colony that might be invested under this scheme. It would, however, run into no large sum—perhaps £200,000 or £300,000, not more; and, if that be so, we have already provided for it by the Lands Improvement Bill, which we have practically already passed, and thereby done away with any necessity for this measure. Touching the likelihood of ordinary people using this scheme and depositing small sums, I would ask, does any honourable gentleman present know of people who would put, say, ten-pound or five-pound notes into an investment of this sort, to be locked up for forty years? How could they get the money when they wanted it? I shall probably be told they could sell out at par. Could they do so? Could they sell a ten-pound Government debenture at par? Where would they find buyers without employing agents, to whom they would have to pay commission? I feel convinced that small sums will not be invested in this way. I may here say that I have listened with interest to the Hon. Mr. McLean's suggestion as to reducing the amount to be borrowed, and I have now reason to believe that the Government will consider that suggestion, and that the amount may be reduced to, say, £250,000. But, even if a compromise of that sort should be arrived at, I think there are other matters in this Bill which must be altered before I can vote for it. For instance, there is no limit in this Bill as to the price at which the Colonial Treasurer might sell these bonds. No doubt he would get the best price he could; but under this Bill he has liberty to sell at any price he pleases, and that is a power which no Treasurer should have. There is a clause in the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill whereby bonds cannot be sold under a certain price. Now, a motion to insert a clause in this Bill to that effect was rejected by the other House, so that it is intended that there should be no limit as to the price downwards at which these debentures can be sold. I think that point should be looked to. There is also another and much more serious objection to the Bill generally, and that is that we are not told what is going to be done with the money; and that alone is enough in my eyes to utterly condemn the Bill. My own opinion is that the Bill will not attain the object it professes to aim at; and, even as an experiment, unless the amount is very much reduced—say, to a quarter of a million—I shall not be able to support it.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—Before the last general election every member of the Government declared against any further borrowing, and stated that the Government would confine its expenditure to its income, and that public works were to be provided for out of the revenue.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—They never said that.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I think I can prove that they said they were not going to borrow at all; and at the general election which followed almost immediately afterwards every member, or almost every member, of the House of Representatives pledged himself against any further borrowing. As that was the case, I think the Council will only be doing its duty in not allowing any further borrowing until the electors have an opportunity of again declaring their desire that the Government should borrow. On this ground—I am not going into the merits of the Bill—I consider it is my duty to vote against the Bill.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I have never known a Bill to be introduced by the Government that was not found fault with by the honourable gentleman opposite, even when he occupied a seat here with me. In the first place, I have to express my acknowledgment to the Hon. Mr. McLean for what I think may be fairly considered the judicious action he took last evening in moving the adjournment of the debate for the purpose of giving time for further consideration. My honourable friend asked me to state whether the Government will be prepared to modify the proposal; and, after consultation with the Colonial Treasurer, my colleague wishes me to say that a Governor's message will be sent down reducing the amount to half a million, extending over two years, and limiting it to £250,000 per annum. I think this is a fair compromise, as there is no use trying to experiment with a smaller amount for a shorter time, because it could not be worked with a less amount or with a shorter term. I should like to say one or two words in reply to one or two of the remarks made by the Hon. Mr. McLean. He said it was the fact that when money is high things are prosperous. My experience is the other way. I have a lively recollection that in 1879 in this city, and in other places in this province, money was very dear; interest was 15 per cent.—certainly 12½ per cent.—and money could not be obtained at that: yet no one could call that time prosperous. My honourable friend further says that the absorption of this money will trouble industry. I do not know how that can be, because, of course, the Government is not going to keep the money locked up in an account. I can assure my honourable friend that it will be put to the best advantage for the purpose of encouraging every possible honest industry in this colony. I was rather surprised yesterday, and, I might say, pleased, that what the Council seemed about to do did not take place. This Bill was debated in a manner such as I have never witnessed before. The Council met the Bill with a cool determination, apparently, to kill it, and it seemed at one time as if there was going to be no debate at all, but the Hon. Mr. Bowen was told off to “bell the cat,” and the manner in which he used the soft, velvety paw in attacking this Bill was very effective. I have again to thank my honourable friend Mr. McLean for coming to the rescue, and I trust that the compromise which I am now making will meet with the approval of the Council. Sir, this Bill has been characterized as a borrowing Bill by honourable members; but if the honourable member opposite, with his usual wit, had called it a lending Bill it might have been more appropriate. There is no “borrowing” in it; not one single word. It is permissive in its character. If any person has any money to spare he can take advantage of this mode of investment. I said in introducing the Bill that one of its objects was to meet some of the defects in the Post-Office Savings-Bank Act, under which sums beyond £500 do not bear interest. This Bill will give investors an opportunity of getting interest on their money, which may now be, and probably is, locked up. I am rather inclined to believe that there is a great deal of money locked up. The Hon. Mr. Bowen said that the Bill, considered seriously, presented a confusion of ideas. Why should it be called a Consols Bill, he asked? I say, why should it not be called a Consols Bill? On a former occasion there was another Bill placed on the statute-book called a Consols Bill. I do not know any more appropriate name for this Bill. My honourable friend endeavoured to be witty at my expense when he referred to the money which the Prussians forced the French to pay; and he said that was not done for the purpose of encouraging thrift. I tried to convey an entirely different meaning. I said that it was because of the existence of this thrift among the people in France that they were able to pay that large sum of money. As I have said, there is nothing in this proposal of a borrowing character. The Government have kept their promise to the people, and I trust the Council will keep faith, and accept the compromise which I have offered to the Council.

Hon. Mr. Reynolds

The Council divided on the question, “That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the question.”

AYES, 16.

Acland	Jenkinson	Oliver
Bolt	Kelly	Richardson
Bonar	Kerr	Rigg
Buckley	McLean	Walker, L.
Dignan	Montgomery	Whyte.
Feldwick

NOES, 13.

Barnicoat	Morris	Stevens
Bowen	Peacock	Stewart
Holmes	Pharazyn	Swanson
MacGregor	Reynolds	Williams.
Mantell

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Jennings	Shrimski
Whitmore.	Grace.

Majority against, 3.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the second time.

RATING ON UNIMPROVED VALUE
BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—The mover of the amendment, the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn, in his speech, quoted from several writers on political economy, especially writers on the land question; and I may say that the authorities quoted were all opposed to some of the newer or later ideas upon the taxation of land. The impression left upon my mind by the speech of the honourable gentleman was that he was opposed to this measure because he thought it was a step in the direction of what is known as the single-tax. He was also opposed to it because he believed it was a tax which would fall heavily upon the rich or wealthy.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—I said, fall heavily on the poor.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—I understood the honourable gentleman to say that it would fall upon the rich, because I noticed the contrast when my honourable friend Mr. Stevens was speaking: he said he thought it was a tax which was likely to fall upon the poor. I have been in error, but that was the impression which I received. I am, however, correct in saying the honourable gentleman's opposition to the Bill arose from the fact that he thought it was a step in the direction of what is known as the single-tax, and as carrying out the views of Henry George and others of that school. It is well known the honourable gentleman is somewhat conservative when questions of taxing land are before the Council. That is the impression which his speeches have always conveyed to my mind. I think it may be said that he thinks that all new taxes are bad, and that all old taxes are good. He is inclined very much to allow matters to remain as they are. He is certainly opposed to some of the new ideas upon taxation, and some of the advanced ideas, such as those introduced by the present Liberal Government. That this is not a new tax I think the remarks of my honourable friend Mr. Kelly showed. He stated that a similar tax to that proposed in this Bill was in operation in Taranaki in 1858, and remained in operation there for twelve or fifteen years. That was a very good trial of such a tax in a country district, and in such a district as Taranaki. Another strange fact is that a present member of the other branch of the Legislature, Mr. Button, several years after the repeal of the Taranaki Act,—which was repealed, I believe, at the time of the abolition of the provinces,—suggested that a measure with this principle in it should be passed. Mr. Button cannot be said to be a Radical by any means, and he certainly is a barrister of very high standing in his profession, and is therefore a man who would naturally know a great deal of such a question. I may mention, too, that a measure of a similar character is in operation in Queensland. It was introduced in 1890, and, as far as I can understand, its operation has been found to be very satisfactory; it has answered its purposes; it has been accepted readily, and without complaint from those who are most affected by it. I need only refer honourable members to the fact that the same principle underlies the Land-tax Act of New Zealand. I mention these facts to show that this cannot be considered a new idea or a new form of taxation. Therefore the objections to new forms of taxation should not be levelled against this Bill. I do not hold with the contention that this is a tax which will fall upon the poor. I will reply to that point later on. I should like to say that my honourable friend Mr. Stevens, in his remarks upon this Bill, spoke very fairly, as he always does, from his own standpoint. To me it is always a great pleasure to hear the honourable gentleman speak upon any measure. His remarks show that he has given considerable thought to the subject, and he speaks fairly and reasonably, in my opinion, upon most subjects with which he deals. He said that this tax was going to fall upon the poor, and therefore he thought it would not be a fair tax—that it would not fall evenly. The great object of all Legislatures is, of course, to devise some scheme of taxation which will fall as equally as possible upon all the contributors. Now, I should like to refer to the effect of the proposed law in the case of the cities. How does it affect the cities? It is said that the capital value of rated property in the boroughs and cities in the colony is about £36,486,000, and the improvements are put down at £18,445,000: that is to say, a little over half the whole value is in the improvements. Now, we will take the City of Wellington, and see how this measure would affect the ratepayers, supposing it were to become law. Assuming that the city is somewhat similarly situated to other cities and boroughs in New Zealand—that is, that half the value will be in the improvements—what would it mean to the taxpayer? There is provision in the Bill that there is to be no loss under this mode of taxation to the municipal authorities—that they are going to get an equal sum of money from the tax. It is only shifting or changing the incidence of the taxation. That is the whole object of the Bill. That is the only effect it would have on the ratepayers of the City of Wellington. They would have no larger amount of taxation to pay. Of course it has been instanced that in Wellington there are certain properties carrying very large and valuable buildings. They would be excluded from taxation. The less amount the owners would pay would mean practically that a present was made to them of the difference between the amount they would require to pay under this Bill and what they had been paying in the past. I think that is a very good thing, and I think they deserve this present.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—Who is to make the present?

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—I will show how it is to be made and by whom. I think that men who are enterprising, and who spend a large sum of money upon improvements, beautifying the city and improving the whole of their surroundings, deserve not that a heavier burden for doing so shall be placed upon them, or that they shall be called upon to pay to the State for the services they have rendered, but rather that they shall be called upon to pay less than those men who do not expend money upon improvements. And under this Bill the enterprising men will be called upon to pay less. Therefore I say we are giving a bonus to industry, and I think, too, this is a very proper way to pay a bonus. I may be asked, If the local authority is not to have any less amount of rates, and the owners of the more valuable properties are not to pay so much as they did, and the poorer landowner is not to pay any more taxes, how can the local authority get a sum equal to that formerly received? I will tell you. The unimproving landowners, who are not now paying their fair share towards the revenue, pay a little more.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—Some poor men have cottages.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—Yes, quite true; but the poor men are not touched. The owner of unimproved land is the man who will pay more—not the poor man with the cottage, and not the wealthy man with very good buildings, but the man who does not do anything with his land—the man who is lying by and allowing his neighbours to build cottages and residences to help to increase the value of his property. The very wealthy, who put up large storehouses and erect magnificent mansions, and by doing so beautify a city by their improvements, will escape. But the men who do nothing but lie by, allowing others by their work and outlay to increase the value of their property, will be called upon to pay a little more, and that is how the sum of taxation is made up. I will now take up the honourable gentleman's remark about the poor man with his cottage. Take an ordinary allotment with a house upon it: say it is worth £1,000, the house being worth £500. The owner of such a place will only pay upon £500. Now, is that not a fair illustration of the majority of cases in Wellington? Look through all the business places along the Quay, and through Newtown. How many of the buildings upon the allotments are worth more than what the land is worth? Not many of them, or very few. Therefore it cannot affect owners of that character. All those whose land and the improvements upon it are about equal in amount are not affected at all under this Bill, and those who have valuable buildings on their allotments are affected very much in a direction they will appreciate: that is, they will have to pay less, and the difference is made up by getting at those people who have unimproved land and allotments. For instance, look at the unsightly places along the Quay,—that large allotment lying between Kirkcaldie and Stains's and the Police Barracks. I think that is a blot upon the city. The owner of it should be made to pay such a tax upon it that it would not be to his interest to keep it unused. It is held, evidently, for speculative purposes—not built upon, but full of rubbish.

Hon. Mr. McCullough

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—Because it is unsaleable.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—It is not correct to say that. Probably the man who is the owner cannot get the money he wants for it; but that it is unsaleable I deny, because I am ready to buy it to-morrow at my own price.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—It is reclaimed land.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—No matter. It is held for speculative purposes by the owner.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who is the owner?

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—I do not know who the owner is; I have no idea. I merely call attention to this as an illustration of my argument. I think I have said sufficient to show that the Bill cannot operate very injuriously upon the ratepayers and the inhabitants of the cities. Now I should like to go into the question of how it affects the country. It is said that farming, agricultural, and other lands in this colony are worth about eighty-six millions of money. The improvements, of course, are very much less than on city and suburban land: in fact, there are only twenty-eight millions of improvements upon the eighty-six millions which represent the capital value of property. Therefore the proposed scheme of taxation will not be any hardship to owners of land in the country. I think that has been accepted. Most of the speakers are of opinion that the Bill would be a favourable measure for agricultural lands, but that it would not be favourable for the cities. There will be no objection to its acceptance, I believe, in the counties and in the country at large, and I will state why. Any member of the Council who has had experience must know that one of the great hardships in the country with the small settlers is this: that those who have taken up land, who have fenced it, and who have improved it, find very frequently that they have neighbours who will not do anything in the way of improvements. The difficulty is to find the owner of the property and to make him pay half the cost of the boundary-fences. Therefore in all rural districts—and I have some experience of the country—the whole of the taxation falls upon the scattered settlers: that is, the whole cost of making roads and bridges in the neighbourhood falls upon those who have been hardy enough to take up land, and who, under the most unfavourable circumstances, are trying to make a living.

Debate adjourned.

The Council adjourned at two minutes to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, 3rd October, 1894.

First Readings—Factories Bill—Government Railways Bill—Land for Settlements Bill—Native Land Court Bill—Public Works Bill (No. 2).

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Security of Homes Bill, Unclaimed Lands Bill, Distillation Bill, Stewart Island County Council Empowering Bill, Sea-fisheries Bill, Government Life Insurance Bill.

FACTORIES BILL.

Mr. REEVES moved, That the following reasons for disagreeing with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Factories Bill be referred to the Legislative Council for consideration:—

"The Committee appointed to draw up reasons for disagreeing with certain amendments made in the Factories Act beg to submit the following:—

"Section 20, new subsection (c): This amendment will be of service, but might be made much more useful if for 'wages' was substituted 'earnings,' as if the record only embraces wage-earnings there will be no record of rates paid to piece-workers, the latter being of more importance.

"Section 54, paragraph 5: Unless there is some unexplained reason why this cannot go in it should remain. It is contained in the English Factory Act; and, it must be remembered, the workpeople, in their ignorance of the laws of health, often need protection against their own acts.

"Section 56: This is rather dangerous as it stands at present, as it allows too much latitude to the Inspector, and exposes him to the possibility of social pressure. It would be desirable if the Council could see its way to limit such sanction of the Inspector to small factories carried on by families, and even then not for continuous work of children.

"Section 63: It would be preferable to allow the new proviso (line 10, p. 18) to be reversed in its permission—that is, for an employer owning both shop and factory to be allowed to close his shop on the factory-holiday, instead of closing his factory on a shop-holiday. This alteration would also seem to meet the case of some shopkeepers who have always given Saturday half-holiday, and object to alter to any other. It would also tend to work for the Saturday-closing movement.

"In subsection (c) of subsection (3) of section 63 some words have been added by the Council, viz., 'fish-preserving factories.' It is evident that a slight alteration is needed in the wording (such as leaving out the word 'fruit,' in line 33), in order that the intention of the framer of the amendment should be carried out.

"Clause 64: It is a very general practice for all workpeople, male or female, employed in factories to have a weekly half-holiday. This section, which has been excised by the Council, only gave legal sanction to a common practice, and one almost necessitated in many trades during the time women and youths are compulsorily absent. The deletion of the section denies to workers in manufactories the right to a time of recreation which is now enjoyed by shop-assistants, men as well as women."

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor transmitting amendments in this Bill.

Mr. SEDDON explained that the first amendment was found necessary upon looking carefully into a matter after his attention had been called to it by the member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). Otherwise they would be putting the whole of the Civil servants back, as it were, into the Civil Service for all the time they had been under the Commissioners. By the original Act they ceased to be Civil servants, and their rights as Civil servants had been maintained up to the time they entered the service of the Commissioners. By repealing the Railways Act—unless they passed this amendment—their rights accrued before they entered the service of the Commissioners would not be maintained. Consequently they would continue under this Act the same as they were under the Railway Commissioners, and their rights as Civil servants up to the time they entered the service of the Railway Commissioners would be maintained. Practically, this was to keep things as they were. As to the other amendment, at the time they passed the Bill they were discussing it in the month of September, and unless the words "October next" were struck out it would mean that the time of office of the Commissioners would not expire before October of next year. That was a necessary amendment to make.

Mr. BELL suggested that honourable members ought to have time to consider the first amendment. He had no doubt that what the Premier had said was correct, and that the draftsman had endeavoured to carry out the objects mentioned by the honourable gentleman; but honourable members had not had time to see the amendment, and, as the matter was a very important one, it should not be hurriedly dealt with. It could not be a party question in any sense, as honourable members on both sides had the same interest in seeing the rights of these Civil servants maintained; and he would ask the honourable gentleman to allow the matter to stand over, and, with that object, he would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SEDDON said he had no objection to the debate being adjourned.

Debate adjourned.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was his duty to draw attention to two amendments which had been made in this Bill by the Legislative Council. The Standing Order of the House of Representatives was very clear. It was a fac-simile of the House of Commons order, and he might as well quote it before expressing an opinion. Standing Order No. 406 was as follows:—

"All aids and supplies, and aids to Her Majesty in Parliament, are the sole gift of the House of Representatives; and all Bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies are to begin with the House of Representatives; and it is the undoubted and sole right of the House of Representatives to direct, limit, and appoint in such Bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which may not be changed or altered by the Legislative Council."

Now, in the new proviso of section 21 the acquisition of land in any one year was limited to the sum of £250,000, plus any balance in hand. And in section 5, instead of leaving the purchases to be made under the Act to the Governor with the consent and advice of the Executive Council, it said they might not be effected unless recommended by the Board. These amendments appeared to be limitations which the Legislative Council were barred from effecting by the rules of Parliament both in England and in New Zealand. He had nothing to say with regard to the other amendments made in the Bill by the Legislative Council.

Mr. J. McKENZIE intended to ask the House to refuse to agree with the amendments made in section 5 and section 21. He might explain to the House that he did not object to the other amendments in the Bill; but he thought it right that the privileges of the House should be retained, and, if the House agreed to exclude these amendments at present, he would have them made by bringing down a message from His Excellency. He disagreed with some more of the amendments; but he merely wished to intimate that to the House, in connection with the ruling which Mr. Speaker had given.

Sir R. STOUT said it seemed to him that section 39 provided for dealing with money appropriated, and cast a burden on the revenues of the colony. Section 39, as amended, was this:—

"'The Land for Settlements Act, 1892,' is hereby repealed; but all directions of the Governor to the Board shall be deemed to be made under this Act, and may be proceeded with under this Act, and all proceedings or other matters begun or undertaken under that Act may be continued and perfected under this Act."

By that clause it was provided that things done under the repealed Act were deemed to be good in reference to this Act. That was certainly dealing with moneys appropriated under this Act; consequently he submitted that this amendment also was violating the privileges of the House, because it provided that certain sums which had been appropriated by this Bill were to be spent in a particular way. It was taking the right of appropriation from the House of Representatives; and the Council said this: that this money might be appropriated to deal with past transactions arising under a previous statute. He submitted that this clause also was one which the Council was barred from enacting. He understood Mr. Speaker to say that the Council could make the other alterations, and therefore he would not raise any question with regard to them.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman could move that this amendment be also disagreed with.

Mr. Speaker

Sir R. STOUT said that was not his function; it was the function of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER said he confined his objection to the amendments made in clauses 5 and 21. These amendments he considered were a clear invasion of the privileges of the House, and he made it a rule only to take up such breaches of privilege as were quite transparent.

Sir R. STOUT said he would, then, move to add section 39 to the clauses disagreed with.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. J. McKENZIE moved, That the whole of the remainder of the amendments made by the Legislative Council be agreed to, with the exception of the words "one block," in new clause 8. There was a proviso, when the Bill left the House, to the effect that one block could be secured in each holding—that certain areas could be reserved by the owner of the land in one block. Certain words had been struck out by the Council, and the Bill as amended would enable an individual owner of property to divide his land into as many blocks as he liked, to secure the retention of certain areas within that block. He was not very sure how the amendment would apply, and he therefore asked the House to disagree with it in the meantime. He would also ask the House to disagree with the new proviso added to section 8. This proviso was put in the Bill in connection with the maximum area which one individual could hold when his land had to be taken compulsorily. He did not think this new proviso described what even the drafters of the proviso meant. He had asked several people how they would read it, and nobody had been able to give him a satisfactory answer. In the meantime, he would ask the House to disagree with it, so that the Conference might discuss the matter with the Legislative Council and see what was meant by the proviso. There was another new clause—clause 40. To that he did not object. Honourable members would see that sections 6 and 7 of the original Bill had been struck out, and had been redrafted in sections 6, 7, and 8, and so on. To a large extent, the redrafting had been agreed to not only by the Legislative Council, but also by the department. On the whole, he thought it an improvement on the original drafting of the Bill. Therefore he did not offer any objection to that. He might point out to the House that there was no principle involved in the amendments made in the Bill since it had left the House further than that in the sections he had dealt with and in the new proviso to new section 8.

Sir R. STOUT hoped that, as to section 8, the honourable member would not press his motion, because he would ask the House to consider what was involved in it. Suppose a man had 250 acres in the Auckland District, 250 acres in Wellington, 250 acres in Canterbury, 250 acres in Otago, and 250 acres in Nelson. According to the provision they could take any of the 250 acres. The man might be holding the land for his sons' benefit. He understood this provision was only to apply to large blocks. If a man had, say, 250 acres in one provincial district, he had no right to have that 250 acres taken from him. If an amendment was made as suggested by the honourable member, that land could be taken from him. He did not think that was what the House desired. The House surely did not want to take land from a man if he only had a small area. Therefore he thought the House should agree to section 8. He could see no harm in it. It simply said that if a man owned more than a thousand acres in one continuous block you could take what he had over the thousand acres. If this amendment were objected to, he did not know what it would mean. He did not really think the Minister wanted to take land from any man who had not his land in a big block. Therefore he did not see why they should not allow section 8 to stand as it was now. It did not alter what were supposed to be the principles of the measure when it passed through the House. He might just add that the Bill had been greatly improved in its language in another place.

Mr. ALLEN hoped clause 8 would be left in, because it seemed to him very necessary. He was sorry that the Bill left the House in such a state that it had to be amended. This clause now was readable and understandable, but he did not know any clause which was readable and understandable when the Bill was sent away from the House. The clause simply meant this: that if a man owned 1,500 acres of first-class land, 4,000 or 5,000 acres of second-class land, and a larger area of third-class land, he would be permitted to select portions of first-, second-, and third-class land so long as they were contiguous to one another, which was a right thing for him to do—he would be able to select, in one area, first-, second-, and third-class land which was contiguous. That was the original intention of the Bill. It was not right that all the slovenly and dirty work which had been done by the House should have to be put right by members in another place. He ascribed the errors in this Bill to the fact that the Minister would not accept any amendments put forward by the Opposition side of the House. The result was that when the Bill was sent to the Council it was not worth the paper it was printed on. He thought the thanks of the country were due to the Council for making the Bill readable and understandable.

Mr. BUCHANAN said they had not had time to really understand the amendments made by the Legislative Council, but from the little attention which he had been able to give to it he thought clause 8 really only carried out what the Minister himself intended; but it was not properly drafted as it left the House.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—It is not described now.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, perhaps not. That would only mean a further amendment of the language. He therefore hoped the Minister would not insist upon disagreeing with the clause.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said he proposed to disagree with the proviso with the view of having it amended. Notwithstanding what might be said to the contrary by the senior member for Wellington City and the honourable member for Dunedin City, the clause as amended did not describe how much land any individual could keep out of a block of land which was about to be taken by the Government. He asked the gentleman who moved this amendment in the Council if he could say, in an estate of 20,000 acres, how much land the owner could keep, and the answer was that he could keep 8,000 acres—1,000 acres of first-class land, 2,000 acres of second-class land, and 5,000 acres of third-class land.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said that was the intention of the promoters of the clause. He would tell the House this, further: He gave one member of the Council an amendment to put in its place, to the effect that a man could keep, say, 600 acres of first-class land, 1,000 acres of second-class land, and 1,500 acres of third-class land; or 500 acres of first-class land, and 2,500 acres of third-class land. But none of these proposals would please them.

Sir R. STOUT had never referred to the proviso at all. He had dealt solely with section 8.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said there was no intention on the part of the Government to take land in such blocks as the honourable member referred to, and at present a large landowner could devise means to so cut up his estate as to retain any block of a certain area. He wished to discuss the matter in conference with the Legislative Council, so as to ascertain its intention in regard to the proviso. With reference to the remarks of the honourable member for Bruce, who had stated that the Bill was slovenly drawn, and that no amendments were accepted by the Government in Committee, he might inform the House that he had accepted amendments in the Waste Lands Committee, and that those amendments were the very ones which had destroyed the Bill, and made it necessary to have it further amended in the Council. Did the honourable gentleman think that the other House had made those amendments of its own accord? He might tell the honourable gentleman and the House that one and all were provided by himself. All the amendments he was prepared to agree to were drawn up by himself, with the assistance of the Law Draftsman. He had discussed the matter with two Legislative Councillors, and agreed to make the amendments, and therefore they were not made in another place, as had been suggested by the honourable member for Bruce. It had been stated in the public Press that the Bill in its original shape when it passed the House was unworkable; but he would tell honourable members that, had the Bill been kept in its original state and so passed by the House, no amendment would have been required.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked if the honourable gentleman could tell him how the word "proportionately" could be used, and how many acres it would give power to a landowner to retain.

Mr. J. McKENZIE would ask the honourable gentleman another question. If he (Mr. Buchanan) had an estate of 20,000 acres, how much could he retain if the estate were resumed? He had put that question to an honourable member in another place, and he would like to have an answer from the honourable gentleman. One honourable gentleman thought a landowner could retain 8,000 acres. Some plainly-worded provision was required to show what amount of land could be retained. His endeavour was to make the Bill as clear as possible, but he had found considerable objection to it in another place, and he had consequently prepared the amendments mentioned, and which the honourable member for Bruce said had been prepared in another place. He would now tell the honourable gentleman, the House, and the country that those amendments were not made by the Upper House, but were prepared in his own department, and submitted by him as Minister of Lands to the Waste Lands Committee of the Legislative Council, and introduced there.

Motion agreed to, and Messrs. Montgomery, Duncan, and J. McKenzie appointed a Committee to draw up reasons.

Sir R. STOUT desired to say, as a matter of explanation, that when the Bill was before the Waste Lands Committee not a single amendment was made but what was moved by the Minister of Lands himself.

Mr. SPEAKER asked if the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) would make it clear to him, either by verbal explanation or in writing, that clause 39 was really an infringement of the privileges of the House. He would not like to send the matter to the Committee appointed to draw up reasons for disagreeing with this particular amendment, and from them to the Legislative Council, unless the case was clearly an infringement of the privileges of the House.

Sir R. STOUT said he was quite willing to do so.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 15.—Jurisdiction.

Subsection (7).—"To determine all claims to land based on any alienation heretofore or hereafter to be made by a Native, and all questions arising between conflicting claimants."

Mr. HOUSTON moved, That the words "heretofore or" be struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 35.

Buddo	Carroll	Graham
Buick	Collins	Hall
Button	Duncan	Hall-Jones
Carncross	Earnshaw	Heke
Carnell	Flatman	Hogg

Mr. Buchanan

Hutchison, W.	Montgomery	Stevens
Larnach	Morrison	Steward
Mackintosh	Parata	Stout
Maslin	Pirani	Tanner.
McKenzie, J.	Reeves	Tellers.
Meredith	Seddon	Lawry
Mills	Smith, G. J.	Pinkerton.

NOES, 18.

Bell	McGowan	Thompson
Green	McGuire	Willis
Kelly, J. W.	Newman	Wilson.
Kelly, W.	Russell, W. R.	Tellers.
Lang	Smith, E. M.	Allen
Mackenzie, T.	Te Ao	Houston.
Massey

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
McLachlan	Hutchison, G.
McNab	Buchanan
Ward.	Mitchelson.

Majority for, 17.

Words retained.

Clause 16.—Appointment of sittings.

Sir R. STOUT moved an amendment to the effect that the times and places of the sittings of the Court should be appointed by the Chief Judge, and not by the Minister.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 32.

Buddo	Houston	Morrison
Buick	Hutchison, W.	Parata
Carncross	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Carnell	Lawry	Saunders
Carroll	Mackintosh	Seddon
Collins	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Duncan	McGowan	Stevens
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Tanner.
Flatman	Meredith	Tellers.
Hall	Mills	Hogg
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Kelly, W.

NOES, 18.

Allen	McGuire	Stout
Button	Newman	Te Ao
Fraser	Pirani	Wilson.
Graham	Russell, W. R.	Tellers.
Heke	Smith, G. J.	Bell
Hutchison, G.	Steward	Massey.
Lang

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
McLachlan	Green
McNab	Buchanan
Reeves	Mackenzie, T.
Ward.	Mitchelson.

Majority for, 14.

Amendment negatived.

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the following words be struck out: "Before the time appointed for the commencement of a sitting, the Minister may order such sitting to be adjourned to such time and place as he may think fit."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 38.

Buddo	Harris	Mills
Buick	Houston	Montgomery
Carncross	Hutchison, W.	Morrison
Carnell	Kelly, J. W.	Parata
Carroll	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Collins	Lawry	Saunders
Duncan	Mackintosh	Seddon
Earnshaw	Maslin	Tanner
Flatman	McGowan	Tellers.
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Hall	Meredith	Stevens.
Hall-Jones

NOES, 16.

Allen	McGuire	Willis
Button	Newman	Wilson.
Fraser	Pirani
Heke	Russell, W. R.	Tellers.
Hutchison, G.	Smith, G. J.	Bell
Lang	Te Ao	Stout.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
McLachlan	Green
McNab	Buchanan
Reeves	Mackenzie, T.
Ward.	Mitchelson.

Majority for, 17.

Words retained.

Clause 20.—"No person may appear or be assisted in Court by counsel or agent without the assent of the presiding Judge first obtained. Such assent may be at any time withdrawn."

Mr. HOUSTON moved to strike out all the words after "agent."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 35.

Allen	Joyce	Russell, W. R.
Bell	Lang	Seddon
Buchanan	Larnach	Smith, E. M.
Buddo	Mackintosh	Stevens
Buick	Maslin	Stout
Button	Massey	Tanner
Carncross	McGuire	Te Ao
Carroll	McNab	Ward
Earnshaw	Mills	Willis.
Graham	Morrison	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Pinkerton	Fraser
Heke	Pirani	Russell, G. W.

NOES, 22.

Carnell	Kelly, J. W.	Newman
Collins	Kelly, W.	Parata
Duncan	Lawry	Saunders
Flatman	McGowan	Thompson.
Hall	McKenzie, J.
Harris	McKenzie, R.	Tellers.
Hogg	Meredith	Houston
Hutchison, W.	Montgomery	Hutchison, G.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
McLachlan	Green
Reeves.	Mackenzie, T.

Majority for, 18.

Words retained.

Clause 27.—Authority to valuer.—"The Court may authorise any valuer or other person to enter upon any land the subject of a proceeding; and any person impeding any one acting under such authority shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds, and in default of payment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one month."

Mr. HEKE moved to strike out "fifty pounds," and insert "twenty-five pounds" in lieu thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 52.—Restrictions, how removed.

Mr. HEKE moved to strike out the word "one-third," and insert "one-half," in order to provide for the assent of one-half of the owners, instead of one-third, being necessary before the restrictions are removed.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 27.

Bell	Houston	Seddon
Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Smith, E. M.
Button	Mackintosh	Stevens
Carnell	Montgomery	Tanner
Carroll	Morrison	Ward
Duncan	Pinkerton	Willis.
Earnshaw	Pirani	Tellers.
Fraser	Russell, G. W.	Lawry
Graham	Saunders	Mills.
Harris

NOES, 27.

Allen	Kelly, W.	Newman
Buchanan	Lang	Parata
Buick	Maslin	Russell, W. R.
Carncross	McGowan	Stout
Collins	McGuire	Te Ao
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Thompson.
Hall	McNab	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Meredith	Heke
Hogg	Mitchelson	Massey.
Hutchison, W.

The CHAIRMAN gave his casting-vote with the "Ayes."

Word retained.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE moved to strike out the word "number," with the view of inserting "value."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 47.

Allen	Carroll	Fraser
Bell	Collins	Hall
Buick	Crowther	Hall-Jones
Button	Duncan	Harris
Carncross	Earnshaw	Houston
Carnell	Flatman	Hutchison, W.

Joyce	McNab	Seddon
Kelly, J. W.	Meredith	Stevens
Lang	Mills	Steward
Lawry	Montgomery	Tanner
Mackenzie, T.	Morrison	Thompson
Mackintosh	O'Regan	Ward
Maslin	Pinkerton	Willis.
Massey	Pirani	Tellers.
McGowan	Russell, G. W.	Graham
McGuire	Saunders	Smith, E. M.

NOES, 11.

Buchanan	Mitchelson	Te Ao.
Heke	Newman	Tellers.
Hogg	Parata	McKenzie, R.
Kelly, W.	Russell, W. R.	Stout.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
McLachlan	Green
Reeves.	Hutchison, G.

Majority for, 86.

Word retained.

Clause 60.—Judge may authorise survey of land.

Mr. HEKE moved the addition of the following proviso: "Provided that such Judge first obtains in writing the consent of the majority of the owners of such block."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 9.

Duncan	Parata	Tellers.
Hogg	Stout	Heke
Mackenzie, T.	Te Ao.	Newman.
Massey

NOES, 38.

Buick	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Button	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Carnell	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Mackintosh	Russell, W. R.
Collins	Maslin	Saunders
Crowther	McGowan	Seddon
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Flatman	McNab	Stevens
Graham	Meredith	Steward
Hall	Mills	Thompson.
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Tellers.
Harris	Morrison	Pirani
Joyce	O'Regan	Tanner.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Bell	Millar
Duthie	Cadman
Green	McLachlan
Mitchelson.	Ward.

Majority against, 29.

Amendment negated.

Clause 61.—Surveyor-General may authorise survey of Native land.

Sir R. STOUT moved the insertion of the following words after "Minister": "and with the consent of five persons claiming to be interested in any Native land."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted."

Allen	Montgomery	Te Ao
Buchanan	Parata	Wilson.
Heke	Pere	Tellers.
Mackenzie, T.	Smith, G. J.	O'Regan
McKenzie, R.	Stout	Tanner.

NOES, 36.

Buddo	Hall-Jones	Pirani
Buick	Houston	Reeves
Button	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, G. W.
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Russell, W. R.
Carnell	Lawry	Saunders
Carroll	Mackintosh	Seddon
Collins	Maslin	Stevens
Crowther	McGowan	Thompson
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Willis.
Earnshaw	McNab	Tellers.
Fraser	Meredith	Hogg
Graham	Mills	Morrison.
Hall

Majority against, 22.

Amendment negated.

Mr. HEKE moved the addition of the following proviso: "Provided that the consent of the Native Committee or Commissioners, and the majority of owners claiming to be interested in such land in the district where the land is situated, is first obtained in writing."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the proviso be added."

AYES, 10.

Allen	Montgomery	Tellers.
Hall	Stout	Heke
Mackenzie, T.	Te Ao	Parata.
McKenzie, R.	Wilson.

NOES, 37.

Buchanan	Hogg	Russell, G. W.
Buddo	Houston	Russell, W. R.
Buick	Kelly, J. W.	Saunders
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Seddon
Carnell	Mackintosh	Smith, G. J.
Carroll	McGowan	Stevens
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Crowther	McNab	Thompson
Duncan	Meredith	Willis.
Earnshaw	Mills
Graham	Morrison	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	O'Regan	Button
Harris	Pirani	Lawry.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Bell	Smith, E. M.
Duthie	Cadman
Fraser	Reeves
Green	McLachlan
Hutchison, G.	Pinkerton
Mitchelson	Ward
Newman.	Flatman.

Majority against, 27.

Amendment negated.

Clause 64.—Land to stand charged with cost of survey.

Mr. HEKE moved to add the following words to the clause: "but all such costs shall not bear interest."

The Committee divided on the question,
"That the words proposed to be added be so added."

AYES, 9.

Allen	McKenzie, R.	Tellers.
Buchanan	Te Ao	Heke
Hall	Wilson.	Parata.
Hogg

NOES, 37.

Buddo	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Buick	Lawry	Russell, W. R.
Carnell	Mackenzie, T.	Saunders
Carroll	McGowan	Seddon
Collins	McGuire	Stevens
Crowther	McNab	Stout
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Earnshaw	Meredith	Thompson
Graham	Mills	Willis.
Hall-Jones	Montgomery
Harris	Morrison	Tellers.
Houston	O'Regan	Button
Kelly, J. W.	Pirani	Smith, G. J.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Bell	Smith, E. M.
Duthie	Cadman
Fraser	Reeves
Green	McLachlan
Hutchison, G.	Pinkerton
Mitchelson	Ward
Newman.	Flatman.

Majority against, 28.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 106.—Time for appealing, within thirty days.

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the word "thirty" be struck out, with the view of inserting "sixty."

The Committee divided on the question,
"That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 29.

Buchanan	Hogg	Morrison
Buddo	Houston	O'Regan
Carnell	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Lawry	Russell, W. R.
Collins	Massey	Seddon
Crowther	McGowan	Stevens
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Tanner.
Graham	Meredith	Tellers.
Hall	Mills	Button
Harris	Montgomery	Smith, G. J.

NOES, 18.

Allen	Maslin	Willis.
Buick	McKenzie, R.
Hall-Jones	McNab	Tellers.
Lang	Parata	Heke
Mackenzie, T.	Te Ao	Stout.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
Duncan	Wilson
Flatman	Newman
McLachlan	Green
Pinkerton	Hutchison, G.

Reeves
Smith, E. M.
Ward.

Fraser
Bell
Mitchelson.

Majority for, 16.

Word retained.

Sir R. STOUT moved to strike out the word "seven," with the view of inserting "fourteen."

Amendment agreed to.

Progress reported.

PUBLIC WORKS BILL (No. 2).

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 31.—Compensation.

The Committee divided on the question,
"That the following subclause stand part of the Bill: 'Any public reserve, or any land vested in any local authority for any purpose whatsoever, or any land vested in trustees for any public purpose whatever, whether local or general, taken or set apart, or over which any power is exercised under this Act, for any Government work; except for improvements made thereon.'"

AYES, 20.

Buddo	Harris	Montgomery
Button	Hogg	Morrison
Carnell	Houston	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Kelly, W.	Seddon.
Collins	Lawry	Tellers.
Earnshaw	McGowan	Mills
Hall	Meredith	Tanner.

NOES, 14.

Buchanan	Maslin	Smith, G. J.
Buick	Massey	Willis.
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Tellers.
Fraser	McNab	Allen
Lang	O'Regan	Pirani.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
Duncan	Wilson
Flatman	Newman
Hall-Jones	Mackenzie, T.
McKenzie, J.	Russell, W. R.
McLachlan	Green
Pinkerton	Hutchison, G.
Reeves	Te Ao
Smith, E. M.	Bell
Ward.	Mitchelson.

Majority for, 6.

Subclause retained.

Progress reported.

The House adjourned at three o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Thursday, 4th October, 1894.

Shops and Shop-assistants Bill—Factories Bill—
New Zealand Consols Bill—Foreign Insurance Companies' Deposits Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

The following reasons for insisting on the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill were agreed to:—

"Clause 2: There appears to the Council to be no reason to interfere with the right of individuals or families in the disposition of their own time in relation to the keeping of shops; and, as that is all that is intended by the amendment, there is no objection to keeping this clause.

"The Council has every reason to believe that there are a very large number of small shopkeepers whose interests will be harassed by a compulsory closing on certain days, and they think there is no reason for the proposed interference with their rights and liberties as individuals. If, as is suggested in the 'Reasons' of the House of Representatives, the number of such shopkeepers is very small, the fact that they do not close their shops on a given day will not affect the general interests of the shopkeeping class.

"The general principle of a compulsory closing of shops for the benefit of shop-assistants was more or less accepted in large constituencies at the last general election, and the Council has accepted the general principle of the Bill, but questions of detail were not, and could not then be, dealt with.

"It is the business of the Legislature to prevent hardship and injustice to minorities.

"Clause 3: The convenience of the public requires that hairdressers' shops should be open on Saturday afternoons.

"Clause 9: If the paragraphs mentioned are not sufficiently clear, they can be made so.

"Clause 16A: The point raised is open to consideration."

FACTORIES BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY moved, That the Legislative Council do not insist on its amendments made in the Factories Bill.

Motion negatived.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART moved, That the Hon. Mr. Oliver, the Hon. Mr. MacGregor, and the Hon. Mr. Stewart be appointed Managers to draw up reasons for insisting on the amendments of the Legislative Council in the Factories Bill.

Motion agreed to.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be committed,

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said this Bill should be considered together with another Bill on the Order Paper—namely, the Advances to Settlers Bill. That Bill, he thought, should be read a second time before the Council went into Committee on the New Zealand Consols Bill. His reason for asking this was that a number of petitions were being sent to the Council praying that this Bill be not agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR suggested that they should be discussed on the third reading.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS thought the Bill should not be carried through Committee until the other Bill was before them. He thought the matter required a little more consideration, and he hoped the committal would be adjourned until, say, Monday.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY thanked his honourable friend for the suggestion, but he had never taken the honourable gentleman's advice, and he was not likely to do so now. He had the regulation of the Order Paper; and there were many other Bills to be discussed besides the Advances to Settlers Bill. This matter had been fully discussed, and he thought the honourable gentleman had had sufficient time to consider it.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN would like to ask the Hon. the Speaker how far this Bill was a money Bill. It seemed that a dispute had arisen in another place with regard to the Land for Settlements Bill. Certain clauses of that Bill had been there considered to be money clauses, and apparently the Council had no power to deal with them.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said they were not supposed in the Council to notice what took place in another place. He understood that the question which had come up in another place was a rather serious one, and he thought his honourable friend should not discuss it until the matter was referred to the Council, which it would be, no doubt, in due course.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said it might not be right to discuss the matter so far as the other Bill was concerned, but it was right to discuss it so far as this Bill was concerned, and he was only asking the Hon. the Speaker's ruling on the point.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said, as there were several Bills coming before the Council which involved this same question, the sooner the matter was put on a proper footing the better. He submitted that this was not a money Bill in the true sense of the word, as laid down in May. In England cases could scarcely arise of the same sort, because they did not borrow there in the sense we did here, and, according to Todd's "Parliamentary Practice in the Colonies," he submitted that these borrowing Bills were not supply or aid Bills within the meaning of the term "money Bill," and it was competent for the Council to make amendments in them. He was not aware of any distinct ruling upon the question whether a mere borrowing Bill was a money Bill. In principle he submitted this was not a money Bill, because it did not deal with a question of taxation, or aid or supply to the Queen. It would therefore be necessary to consider this question and settle it if there was any doubt about it.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY would suggest that as the Consols Bill was a means of aiding revenue it was a money Bill. Under the Bill money obtained by the sale of Consols was to be paid into the Public Account and appropriated by Parliament, and that certainly was a distinct aid to revenue, and, as Bills which provided aids to revenue were money Bills, consequently the Consols Bill was a money Bill.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER would like to call the honourable gentleman's attention to the preamble of the Bill, in which it stated that the Bill was introduced because it is expedient to encourage thrift in the people of New Zealand by providing safe investments for their funds. It was therefore not a Bill in aid of revenue. On the contrary, they had the assurance of the Government that the intention of the measure was to provide means for thrifty people to invest their savings in safe securities; and therefore it appeared to him that the power of amendment possessed by the Council could be exercised, because the Bill could not be held to be a measure imposing a charge upon the people. It seemed to him that, if this Council was to forfeit its right to amend such Bills as this, then the usefulness of the Council would be considerably diminished, and one could hardly see what use it would be to have a Council at all. He would be the last person to claim for the Council any right of interfering with the taxation of the people; but this Bill would not have the effect of imposing a charge on or increasing the taxation of the people. Therefore, if they, in the course of their examination of the Bill, should see fit to alter or modify some clauses of it, it appeared to him that they would only be performing their manifest duty.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN submitted that, with the exception of clauses 3 and 36, the Council had full power to alter any part of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR said it was necessary that this question should be tested, and it seemed to him that the sooner it was tested the better. Now that they were going into Committee, he thought the Council should have the ruling of the Hon. the Speaker on this important question. He was aware that there was a very general impression that it was not in the power of the Council to alter this Bill in any particular at all, but he was quite sure in his own mind that there could be no question as to whether or not it was within the province of the Council to alter the clauses referred to by his honourable friend Mr. McLean—clauses 3 and 36. At any rate, it was a point upon which they should have a ruling as early as possible. The principle seemed to be that a money Bill in the sense in which the Council had no right to amend it must be either a Bill levying taxation or an appropriation Bill, but it seemed to him that this Bill was not a money Bill in either of those senses. In the eye of the law every section of an Act of Parliament was considered as a distinct enactment, without preliminary words, and, whether or not clauses 3 and 36 were money enactments in that sense, at all events other sections of the Act might be dealt with by the Council as the Council thought proper. Even with regard to the two sections he referred to, he should think they were not money enactments, because they neither appropriated revenue nor levied taxation. But all the other clauses of the Bill except those two were not in any sense money Bills. Therefore all the sections except these two, he thought, should be dealt with by the Council as the Council might think proper.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE said if this Bill could not be amended by the Council he would be compelled to vote against it, and he fancied there were two or three other members in the same position. In addition to the compromise which they arrived at on the previous day regarding the amount to be borrowed, and which the Colonial Secretary agreed to, there were two other points in regard to which he would require to be satisfied. The first was regarding the price at which the bonds could be sold.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Which bonds do you refer to?

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE thought honourable members understood what he meant—the bonds referred to in clause 3, and afterwards in clause 14. He had been told that this was provided for in clause 3, and perhaps that was so. However, he would like that point to be made a little more clear. The other point was as to the term of forty years for which these bonds could be issued.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—“Not exceeding.”

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE said, Yes, it was true that the term “not exceeding forty years” was used in the Bill. But, as an honourable member had said, the Council would be giving up its functions if it left it to the Minister to do what he pleased, as was proposed in this clause, without laying down definite lines of action for him. In view of the general outlook of the money-market, even to suggest that the bonds should have a term of forty years' currency was simply folly. They did not seem to learn anything by their past experience. Even in the old plunging days they used to provide for the liberty of paying off their loans at the end of a given number of years. For instance, there were the loans called the Five-thirties and the Ten-forties, which meant that power was taken in those cases to repay the money at the end of the shorter periods if the colony decided upon doing so and if money had become cheaper. Those were two points upon which he would require to be satisfied before he could vote for the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN would only like to point out, with regard to the question as to the power of the Council to deal with this Bill, that in the case of Bills which were a new departure in legislation—Bills proposing to borrow without declaring what the money was to be borrowed for—it would be difficult to find a precedent to guide them. Therefore he thought they should be exceedingly careful in dealing with a question like this; and, as there was no precedent to follow, they must be guided by principle. The principle underlying the limitation of the powers of an Upper Chamber was that it should not interfere with provisions for taxation or appropriation. It could not be said that the question before the Council affected either.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said it appeared to him that the position of the Council in dealing with such Bills was laid down clearly. He would read the following, bearing on the point, from Todd's “Parliamentary Practice,” page 705:—

“But neither the New Zealand nor the Canadian laws can be so construed as to warrant a claim by the Upper Chamber of either Parliament to equal rights in matters of aid and supply to those which are enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom; for such a claim, if insisted upon, would to a like extent derogate from and diminish the constitutional rights of the representative Chamber."

The question was, Was this a Bill of aid and supply? To his mind it was not. As had been pointed out by the Hon. Mr. Oliver, the preamble of the Bill stated that it was a Bill to encourage thrift. That was the object of the Bill as set forth in the preamble, and upon that they must go. He thought, certainly, it was not clearly a matter of aid and supply. Standing Order 322 said,—

"It shall be the duty of the Speaker to see that, in all Bills initiated in the Legislative Council, imposing fees, fines, and penalties, and made payable into the Colonial Treasury, for the public uses of the colony, the clauses imposing the same be distinguished by being underlined."

If the Council had power to insert such provisions and send them down to the other House in italics, surely they had similar powers to amend a Bill coming from the other Chamber, when such Bill was not a Bill of aid and supply.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN thought it would be a rather dangerous doctrine to say that the preamble governed a Bill, because in that case it would be perfectly easy for a Government, or any one else, to put anything which they thought proper in the preamble, whereas the body of the Bill might be quite different. He wished to explain that he had not the slightest desire to limit the powers of the Council in dealing with this or any other Bill. He only wished to know exactly what their powers were. He thought their powers ought to be as extensive as they could possibly make them, especially when dealing with Bills of this novel and extraordinary character.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY might explain to the Hon. Mr. Whyte the position of clause 3. After the question was raised by the honourable member on the previous day he made inquiry at the only possible quarter where information could be obtained—from the Treasury Department—as to what was meant by "Consols-certificate," mentioned in section 3. He pointed out, when moving the second reading, what that certificate meant. A man went to the Treasury and deposited his money and got a receipt for it. On the inscription of the party's name in the register the amount became inscribed and he received a receipt. There was no authority whatever by which the Treasurer could sell or interfere with that receipt or inscription. He had been puzzling his mind to know what his honourable friend meant. There was no such thing as any authority to sell the Consols for a less sum than the amount which had been subscribed. Then, as to the "Consols-certificate," he explained that matter also. Assuming that a person had inscribed his money for £1,000, and afterwards wanted £100, he went to the Register and received the £100, and then he was inscribed for £900, and for that he got a certificate, which bore upon its face the value and the rate of interest.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said this question was surrounded with difficulty. Unfortunately there were precedents which, if he were to follow them too closely, would compel him to rule that this was a money Bill; but to declare this a money Bill would be to control the powers of the Council to such an extent as to deprive it of its proper value as a branch of the Legislature. He therefore ruled that the Council had the power to amend such clauses as were not appropriation clauses.

Bill committed.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 4.—Date of repayment and interest to be fixed.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE moved, That "forty" be struck out, with the view of inserting "fourteen."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 14.

Barnicoat	Jenkinson	Montgomery
Bolt	Jennings	Rigg
Buckley	Kelly	Walker, L.
Dignan	Kerr	Whitmore.
Feldwick	McCullough

NOES, 21.

Acland	McLean	Richardson
Bonar	Morris	Stevens
Bowen	Oliver	Stewart
Holmes	Ormond	Swanson
Kenny	Peacock	Taiaroa
MacGregor	Pharazyn	Whyte
Mantell	Reynolds	Williams.

Majority against, 7.

Word "forty" struck out.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART moved, That the word "twenty" be inserted, in lieu of the word "forty."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 24.

Acland	Jennings	Richardson
Barnicoat	Kelly	Rigg
Bolt	Kerr	Stewart
Bonar	McCullough	Swanson
Buckley	McLean	Taiaroa
Dignan	Montgomery	Walker, L.
Feldwick	Oliver	Whitmore
Jenkinson	Pharazyn	Williams.

NOES, 11.

Bowen	Mantell	Reynolds
Holmes	Morris	Stevens
Kenny	Ormond	Whyte.
MacGregor	Peacock

Majority for, 13.

Word "twenty" inserted.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART moved, That the words "or places in the colony" be inserted after the word "place."

Hon. Mr. Bonar

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted."

AYES, 22.

Acland	Mantell	Richardson
Barnicoat	Morris	Stevens
Bolt	Oliver	Stewart
Bonar	Ormond	Swanson
Bowen	Peacock	Walker, L.
Holmes	Pharazyn	Whyte
Kenny	Reynolds	Williams.
MacGregor

NOES, 13.

Buckley	Kelly	Montgomery
Dignan	Kerr	Rigg
Feldwick	McCullough	Taiaroa
Jenkinson	McLean	Whitmore.
Jennings

Majority for, 9.

Words inserted.

Bill reported, with amendments, and read the third time.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES' DEPOSITS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The object of this Bill is to protect the public from companies which are doing business, or may do business in the colony at some future time, and which may not be able to meet proper demands that may be made upon them. The Bill deals entirely with foreign companies. The interpretation of "company" is,—

"'Company' means any association, person, or persons, corporate or unincorporate, registered or established for the purpose of carrying on (whether concurrently or not with any other class of business) any one or more of the following classes of insurance business, that is to say,—the business of (1) life assurance, or (2) fire and marine insurance concurrently, or (3) fire insurance only, or (4) marine insurance only, or (5) accident insurance, or (6) insurance of any class not hereinbefore mentioned; and includes mutual associations as well as proprietary; but does not include the Government Insurance Department established under 'The Government Insurance and Annuities Act, 1874':

"'Foreign company' means a company, as hereinbefore defined, registered or established out of the colony, and includes a local company whose chief office is situated out of the colony."

It has been found that some of these companies have not made payments after they have got money from the people, and this Bill is to provide a security that they shall not make default. Part I. deals with life assurance companies. These companies must deposit with the Public Trustee a sum of not less than £5,000 nor more than £50,000, in cash or approved securities, according to the scale in the schedule.

"Approved securities" mean—

"(a.) Government securities of New Zealand or any of the Australian Colonies;

"(b.) Debentures issued or mortgages executed by any local authority within the colony, under any law now or hereafter in force, secured upon general or special rates, or upon real estate within the colony held in fee-simple;

"(c.) Mortgages on the security of any real estate held in fee-simple within the colony and free from all encumbrances: Provided that no mortgage be accepted as a deposit for a sum exceeding two-thirds of the value of the security therefor;

"(d.) Real estate held in fee-simple or leasehold interest within the colony and free from all encumbrances;

"(e.) Fixed deposits in any bank of issue established by or under any Act of the General Assembly or by Royal Charter, and carrying on business in the colony: Provided that such deposits be made in and be payable in the colony; or any of such securities."

The Government do not insist at all upon having deposits of money. All they want are such securities as will be a guarantee to the people who are insured with these companies that their policies will be paid. I mention this specially because I see it stated in southern papers and elsewhere that the Government are anxious to get hold of a lot of money. Now, the Government do not want any money at all.

HON. MEMBERS.—Oh!

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I say the Government do not want any money at all. They want securities to be given for the protection of those who may be insured with these companies. There is nothing else in the Bill; there is nothing that can be construed into anything else. In the case of fire and marine insurance companies,—

"Every foreign company which at the time of the passing of this Act is carrying on any such business as aforesaid within the colony shall, within six months from the passing of this Act,

"Obtain from the Public Trustee a certificate in form to be prescribed by the Governor authorising the company named therein to carry on such business within the colony for the period of twelve months from the date named in such certificate."

These companies are to furnish to the Public Trustee statements of their affairs. The object of the Bill is simply to prevent bogus companies from victimising the people of New Zealand. I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I am not quite certain that I perfectly understand the intention of this Bill. The first thing to remark is that by "The Life Insurance Companies Act, 1878," life insurance companies were, to the best of my recollection, obliged to deposit £20,000, and I have not heard from my honourable friend exactly the reason why this has been varied. The minimum here appears to be £5,000, and the maximum £50,000. The other point is this: Are we clearly to understand that no deposit is to be required from foreign fire and marine insurance companies? It does not seem to me that the Bill does impose any responsibility upon them, nor did I understand my honourable friend to say that it did. In the definition of "foreign company" it does not say exactly what companies they shall be, further than that they are registered and established out of the colony, and will include local companies whose chief offices are situated out of the colony. From the fire and marine companies being dealt with in a separate part of the Bill, and the certificate being obtainable in the form indicated there, it would appear to me that it is not intended to exact a deposit from them. That being so, I was going to inquire whether the Government were aware that there has been for a considerable time in the colony, especially among those carrying on insurance business, a feeling that there should be some pecuniary guarantee to the public that the stability of a company is reasonably good—I mean in the case of foreign fire insurance companies. It has often come to my knowledge that there is a strong feeling that foreign companies are sometimes started with insufficient capital, and carry on business under circumstances which are not sufficient to warrant their doing so.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—There is one point in connection with this Bill which, I think, might deserve attention, and that is this: With regard to foreign companies carrying on business here it is extremely difficult sometimes to prove that they are companies at all. There is a provision in the Foreign Companies Act which is not complied with, or which may be evaded to a certain extent. I think the Public Trustee should satisfy himself, before he issues a certificate, that the company is a properly incorporated body, and if sued in that name the person suing would not require to do anything further. That is a very necessary provision. There is another point to which I would direct the honourable gentleman's attention, and that is this: Supposing a person gives a mortgage to a company for £10,000, he has no knowledge of what becomes of that mortgage; and if he pays off the mortgage—that is, to the company—the mortgage will not be worth the paper it is written on so far as the Public Trustee is concerned, the person having paid off the money. I mean that the deposit of the mortgage will probably afford no security whatever.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why?

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—Because it is not transferred to the Public Trustee in any way. It is merely lodged with the Public Trustee. The deeds lie with the Public Trustee, but he may know nothing of the paying-off of the loan. So far as the Public Trustee is concerned, his security has vanished, because the person has paid his money to the company or person from whom he borrowed it. Section 18 seems to me rather drastic. It provides, in case of any default in complying with any of the requirements of the Act, the "attorney, general agent, or other agent are respectively and severally liable to a penalty of not less than five pounds nor more than fifty pounds for every day during which such default continues." There may be a slight technical non-compliance with the Act, to which the Public Trustee may have assented—for instance, in not giving notice, and so forth. The Act may not be strictly complied with in a slight technical respect, and this penalty may be inflicted. There is no discretion given to the Court to deal with such technical breaches of the Act, and the penalty of £5 a day might amount to a considerable sum in course of time. I think some discretion should be given to the Court to say whether the non-compliance is purely technical in its character.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I think, myself, that this will afford very considerable protection. I think the points mentioned by the Hon. Mr. Stewart are worthy of notice, because, I say, looking at the foundation of foreign companies, they are duly incorporated in accordance with the laws of the countries in which they were formed. Then, provision is made by which they shall have an attorney here before they begin business, and I think we ought to make some provision that that attorney shall be appointed without delay. The other points referred to by the Hon. Mr. Stewart I agree with.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Sir, I am not able, of course, to discuss the legal points raised by honourable gentlemen in connection with this Bill, but I would point out that any company means an association of persons, corporate or unincorporated, with a security from the company carrying on business, quite regardless of whether or not it is incorporated according to the law of the country in which it has its headquarters. With regard to what the Hon. Mr. Stevens said about fire and marine insurance companies—that some guarantee should be given to the public that the stability of the company is reasonably good—that is provided for by the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th clauses of this Bill, a certificate from the Public Trustee being required. With regard to clause 18, and the question of whether or not the penalty is too high, I think that is a matter to be considered in Committee.

Bill read the second time.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Sir, the Bill just now before the Council, which was moved by my honourable friend, is one of the very greatest importance, and one which will be found to be exceedingly far-reaching in its application, and its consequences will, in my judgment, be of the most serious character: so serious, indeed, that I propose, during my remarks, to give to honourable members an opportunity of expressing an opinion in a particular direction, which I shall indicate by amendment. Sir, it is proposed to borrow no less a sum than three millions on the public credit of the colony for the purpose of lending

Hon. Mr. Stevens

it out, to persons owning property, at 5 per cent interest, with a sinking fund of 1 per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly. Now, let us review the origin of this measure. It may be perfectly true that during the last general election some considerable amount of attention in certain quarters was drawn to the subject, and it is even possible that, as my honourable friend the Colonial Secretary has said, on every platform opportunity may have been taken to speak upon it. But this also is what took place at the last general election: that a most unmistakably determined opposition to increase the public indebtedness by way of loans was expressed from one end of the country to the other. Upon that fact there can be no manner of doubt. If, therefore, it can be shown that this measure increases the public indebtedness, it will, I think, be a fitting subject for the consideration of the country, and, if it has been considered at all, a fitting subject for reconsideration. Sir, the original proposal was to give loans to farmers. Now, what we are at the present time proposing to do is to make loans to any one who has a security, subject to certain limitations, to which I shall make reference presently. My honourable friend the Colonial Secretary has informed us that this system has been successfully tried in France, Germany, and other European countries. Now, I am going to show the Council what has been tried in those countries, and then they will be able to judge whether the view put before the Council by my honourable friend is a correct one. Mention has been made of the Crédit Foncier of France; but what is the position of that? It is a State institution, there is no doubt, but it has not State aid. Not one farthing of the national resources is in that great institution. It is, however, supervised by the State. Its governors are appointed by the President of the Republic, and, as I say, its affairs are supervised and investigated by the Administration, which is really a board of directors. The control of the whole of the affairs is under that board, which is elected by the shareholders. It is not, as I shall point out presently, the same case as in some other countries in Europe. It is not even an association of persons for the purpose of enabling moneys to be obtained on their properties through the medium of associated capital. It is simply an association of money-lenders, and no doubt their operations in France have been not only gigantic, but extremely beneficial to the country. But do not let it be supposed for one moment that the system proposed at the present time by this Bill has any resemblance whatever to the Crédit Foncier. The position of that institution in relation to the Government is very similar to that which has recently been established by the Shares Guarantee Act between the Bank of New Zealand and the Government of this colony—that is to say, the superior officers have to be appointed by the Government. Let us take the case of Germany. Similar institutions throughout Germany, which are very extensive, and, no doubt, very beneficial, are in no sense State-aided. In the case of some of the older ones, I suppose that, somewhere from a hundred to a hundred and twenty years ago, a few of them were in their earlier stages assisted, with regard to the cost of their establishment, by the Government. In one case there was an institution which was supported, I think, to the extent of 200,000 thalers. A thaler, I think, in Germany is equal to 3s. With regard to business of this character in Germany, there is no case in which it is supported by Government capital, or where it has received any aid whatever. But I would more particularly like to call attention to one which has produced very good results in Hungary. Some of them are founded as associations of landed proprietors. Now, in Hungary, when enforced labour was done away with, the condition of the landed interest was such that it was found necessary for a great effort to be made to enable the owners to improve their properties and make them productive, and the landed proprietors adopted the method of associations amongst themselves, by which their property was, more or less, liable to be mortgaged for the necessities of the institution; and by that means they obtained sufficient capital to improve their properties and make up the losses which had been caused to them by political and other causes. In no case did the institution resemble the one we have now under consideration. In no case has the State gone into the market to borrow money, either in large or small amounts, for the purpose of lending to the proprietors of the country. It is perfectly true that in a few of the cantons of Switzerland there is a system of lending money entirely by the State, or, at all events, to such an extent that nearly all money has been removed from the market, and it is said that this is beneficial. But they have no institution, as far as I can discover, by which the State undertakes large engagements in the way of borrowing money for the purpose of lending it to persons so situated. It appears to me that the whole pith of the question in regard to this Bill is this: We are now asked to pass a measure by which the State credit shall be used for the benefit of private individuals, and there is no question about it whatever. When you come to examine it with any degree of care or consideration, the proposal is that persons who have not more than £5,000, which is the maximum, down to a minimum of £25 only, are to receive these loans. Then preference is to be given to those who have applied for sums under £500. Now, it is not pretended that all the applicants can be satisfied. Those who cannot give sufficient security will not get the money. Those who have insufficient security will therefore be rejected; whilst the larger proprietors will be left out by reason of their being over the maximum of £5,000. I should like the Council to consider whether the credit of the colony and its benefits are not just as much the property of one person in the community as of another. For what uses is the credit of the colony to be legitimately applied? Defence is the primary and most important one, as we knew in New Zealand to our cost in old times, as also does any other country that has ever engaged in war. In this country, where we own the railways, the Government railways are also a legitimate subject for the application of borrowed money. They are public property, and the advantages go to every one who uses the railways. They are a piece of national property of the highest importance. The same principle can be applied to telegraphs, and other numerous subjects to which I need not now refer. Even in the case of our harbours it is in only two instances that we have departed from the principle of treating them as local concerns. But, Sir, this proposal is exactly of the nature I have stated. It is actually proposed now to borrow money upon the credit of the whole people of this country for the sake of those who are fortunate enough to get it. If that is considered to be the right principle, then there is nothing more to be said with regard to it. In my opinion it is an exceedingly wrong principle. I consider it as bad a principle as could possibly be conceived. What does it mean? It means that the country is going to borrow money for no purpose by which the State could be directly aided, or by which the inhabitants of the colony are going to derive any benefit or convenience whatever. It simply means that the credit of the country is going to be used, and more or less invaded,—I think that is the proper term to use,—for the purpose of assisting persons who have got more land than they can pay for; and that is the sum and substance of the whole of this business. It seems to me to be a matter of great importance, in thinking over this question, to see what this Legislature is doing at the present time, what it has done this session, and the burdens which have been imposed upon the public for which this session will be held responsible. We have given, or are directly responsible for,—for it is neither more nor less than direct responsibility, and the sooner we recognise it the better,—£2,000,000 for the support of the Bank of New Zealand. There is another sum which will be borrowed of £250,000 for lands for settlement. We have under the present Bill £3,000,000 for advances to settlers, putting aside any question which might be raised as to the two sums we are going to authorise by the Bills that we are just passing, which involve an expenditure of £500,000, which may find its way to London before long—the Consols and Native Lands Acquisition and Lands Improvement—which are supposed to be loans domiciled in this colony. We know also that a proposal before the Legislature involving £700,000 or £800,000 for the Midland Railway Company has to be considered; and I ask honourable members this: In the wildest days of this colony, at the period which it seems now to be the fashion to look back upon as the period of the most abandoned recklessness, did we ever reach the height of recklessness we have reached this year? I state the position now and the position then, and it will be found there is a great difference. Take the days of the never-to-be-forgotten Vogel proposals—and, in calling attention to them, do not let it be supposed that I personally ever regarded what was done then as more than a speculative enterprise, and one that was going a great deal too fast. Let us look at the position then and compare it with these days. In those days we had the world before us. The lands of the colony were undeveloped; vast areas of territory were waiting to be opened and improved; railways and every conceivable species of public works were undertaken by means of Government expenditure, for the benefit of the settlers. We may have gone too fast, but, as I say, we had then the world before us. I say that our position now is different. There is a great economical difference between the two positions, and it seems to me that what we are doing now to get money will never cause prosperity to attend our footsteps. We have now placed before the world—a world which is neither more nor less than the financial world of London—a most extraordinary spectacle of our operations this session. We have of late found the necessity of raising money from all sorts of sources—and, in fact, I need not dwell upon that, for it will be admitted in every direction, I presume; but, having done all that this session, we are absolutely, through the medium of this Bill, letting out a regular flood-gate of liabilities, and what is to be the position I am quite at a loss to understand. Where the limit is to be fixed nobody has the least idea. You have undertaken to lend enough money to everybody who has sufficient security in one year or another. You have entered into this to any extent that their demands may reach; for can any one suppose that, when the Government have undertaken to borrow £3,000,000 for purposes of this kind, they can satisfy the demands, or that those people who are disappointed—the man with five thousand pounds' worth of land, and the man who has got no loan allotted to him, also the man who has property to the extent of £500—are going to sit still and allow themselves to be ridden over by the people who have been successful in getting funds? It is an obvious absurdity; and I do not see how we can imagine that such proposals could be entertained for a moment, or that such a state of things could be allowed to exist. What will be the upshot of these proposals? You are going now to face the London market, and we have got to place before the financial public of London very plainly our position, and the position we are going to take into our hands next year. I remember, in London, when I was there on the 15th April, 1887, when taking up a newspaper, there appeared before me this terrible sight: that the 4-per-cent. New Zealand stocks were down to 94.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—What are they up to now?

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—It is not what they are to-day, but it is what they are going to be through the misuse of a restored credit. And what I was going to point out to the Government is that these kinds of proceedings must inevitably reduce the credit from what it is now.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—The stocks

Hon. Mr. Stevens

are at 109 now, and they have never been so high.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—It is exactly for that reason that I am making these few remarks, by way of urging the honourable gentleman and his colleagues to stay their hands before danger comes upon us through the recklessness which is already allowed to be the leading characteristic of the Government. Now, I have to say again what this is that we are taking before the eyes of the financial public. Are we exhibiting to them a favourable state of things? We are going to them to say, "Lend us money in order that we may open a loan-office." That is what we are going to do by this Bill. And, in connection with that, we are unfortunately obliged to lay before them diminishing productions—not by any means a proof of prosperity. It is extremely painful to me to have to lay before this Council these returns, but I would ask honourable members to refer to the reduction in values of products and the main articles of export as disclosed by the statement which has been made before Parliament. I find that, taking the items where there had been an increase in export value in the year 1891, we have not less than about half a million of decrease in value between the position of two years ago and the period with which the parliamentary paper deals in 1893. I do not know whether honourable gentlemen would like me to give them the figures in relation to half a dozen items, but they are to me very important, and I think they ought to be generally understood. The value of the wool exported this year, as compared with the value two years ago, is £354,948 less; gold was £91,251 less; grain was £72,000 less; and, unhappily, I have to notice that last year it was only about one-half in value of what it was in the year 1890, the year before the time of my starting-point; then, we have New Zealand flax, which is £60,000 less in value; and frozen meat, £109,907 less; making a total of £687,795. On the other side must be taken items where there was an increase. I find that in kauri-gum there was an increase of £73,000, which is, so far, satisfactory, although I regret to say that, compared with former years, the return shows very indifferently. There was on butter and cheese an increase of £117,313, making a total of £190,000 and a few hundreds as against the large reductions to which I have made reference. One of the most unfortunate features in the whole of this review is the practical disappearance of wheat-growing to a very large extent. It means that an amount of employment has been displaced which is almost beyond estimate in our small concerns. I think it may be regarded generally in the colony as a subject of the greatest importance, because it seems to me to mark very strongly the view which I have endeavoured to place before the Council. My object in mentioning these facts is this: to show that no time could be worse chosen to increase the liabilities of the colony than the present, and that there evidently is very strong danger of important subjects of the kind in relation to our financial affairs being utterly ignored. We have been in the habit of late of taking immense comfort to ourselves in the presence of a surplus in the revenue of the country. No doubt a surplus is an exceedingly desirable thing, and no doubt at all times it should be a subject of rejoicing; but, at the same time, I must say that it appears to me that we are so far from marching to a deficit, we are galloping to it. In looking at the Statement of the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer, I find that he estimates that he will only have £91,000 at the end of the financial year in the way of surplus; and from that sum will have to be taken the supplementary estimates, which will have to be passed before the session closes. I see a very small surplus indeed, and one which I fear, in the presence of what we are now doing, will very soon become a very shadowy surplus. Let me also ask the attention of honourable members to this fact—one which, I believe, is scarcely recognised by members of the Legislature generally: It is that in our revenue we have been taking for some years past, and are still taking, a very large addition to revenue in the form of money which is rendered available through the operation of the Consolidated Stock Act of 1884. And that is not a permanent thing; it is rapidly diminishing and rapidly approaching the point of extinction; and in all the calculations which I should ever make with regard to the strictly sound financial position of this country I should invariably allow for that. I regret to say that it never is allowed for. I see also that in the estimate of the Colonial Treasurer for this year there is an allowance for diminution of revenue from Customs, and to a smaller extent from the railways. It appears to me that the Customs revenue will, in all probability, in view of the general depression of the country, and of the large amount of unemployed labour, diminish more or less during the current year. No doubt one very much avoids giving one's individual opinion in place of official estimates; but it appears to me that we cannot expect a return from the Customs revenue larger than estimated by the Colonial Treasurer, and it would not surprise me in the slightest degree if we found his estimate was scarcely realised. I am now going to mention two or three points with regard to the details of this Bill. They will not be placed before the Council in any such elaborate form as to make them tedious, or otherwise than readily understood. The first I will mention is that we are going to lose on all these loan operations under this Bill the whole of the land-tax which is now payable on the land on which the money will be advanced. I should have thought that, at all events if the public credit is to be used for the benefit of special individuals who are to be granted loans on their property, the least that could have been expected would have been that the tax would be made good by them. Not so, however. Now we come to another point, and, so far as I am able to understand the Bill, it is intended to go on reinvesting the sinking fund in the form of what, I think, is called the Sinking-fund Debentures Fund. Therefore, so far as I can see, this loan will never be paid off. It will be a perpetual burden upon the colony, and will be perpetually renewed—that is to say, unless it should be called in and paid off. In such case, of course, the accumulated sinking fund will be used for that purpose. Another point has reference to the fact that the Bankruptcy Act is brought into play in this Bill in a very extraordinary manner. The borrower, it is true, is to have great advantages conferred upon him at the public expense; but there is something on the other side. In the event of his being unfortunate in the race of life, in the event of his failing to meet with that success which we should desire, should he have the misfortune to seek the benefit of the Bankruptcy Act he never will be released: he will be a Crown debtor, if not from the cradle, at all events to the grave. Then, we have another very extraordinary proposal, which I thought might be put down, if not to imperfect drafting, at all events to an imperfect application of the ordinary care which is supposed to accompany the preparation and passing of Bills. I find in the 69th clause this: A heavy penalty is imposed—not less than £50 nor more than £200; and one of the offences for which this penalty is to be imposed is—what? What do honourable members think? “Having any pecuniary interest in any land tendered as security for a loan under this Act.” So that if a person has sold a piece of land to another, and the purchaser borrows the money from this Government loan-office, the person who sold him the land would be liable to a penalty; and it would be precisely the same if an individual held a mortgage from another and he was paid off out of a loan raised from the Government loan office: they would be equally liable in the two cases. I will say no more upon that point, nor do I propose to occupy the time of honourable gentlemen in discussing generally the closer details of the Bill. Let me, however, call attention to one of the most important items in the whole detailed structure of the Bill. In reviewing these institutions on the Continent of Europe, to which reference has been made, I think I mentioned that they never lend to the extent of more than 50 per cent.—one-half the value of the property which is offered to them. That is an invariable rule. It is so with the Crédit Foncier, and with the German and other institutions of this character, and I believe there is not one single exception in the whole list of them. What is proposed in this measure is that in the case of urban and suburban property one-half only of the value of the property may be lent, as in the cases I have mentioned in Europe; but in the country two-thirds may be lent. It is very commonly supposed that a one-third margin is enough, but I submit that it is not enough. I submit that experience shows in every direction that one-third is not sufficient, and I undertake to say that is the experience of every one who has had any considerable acquaintance with the subject of lending money upon mortgage. Now I propose to make a few remarks on the general effects of the scheme. My honourable friend the Colonial Secretary informed us that in the past, and even now, interest was too high. Does my honourable friend really mean to offer to us the suggestion that money is not like any other commodity, which goes where it is profitable to it to go, and goes away from a place when it ceases to be a productive field of investment for it? Surely every one must know that. And that is precisely what will happen with regard to this scheme. I would ask honourable gentlemen to consider what is going to be the case in the event of this scheme succeeding so far that the Government obtain the money in England, and are successful in lending it to their satisfaction in this country. Loans which are at present in existence here will be displaced. England being the safest place in the world to keep money in, it naturally remains there, and the rate of interest falls with the increase of its volume. What will happen here will be what has happened before, and what is happening every day of our lives here, and that is, when money is displaced it leaves the country. I know vast sums of money, relatively speaking, which, unless they can produce a certain return here, will leave the country to a certainty. When I was in England, in 1887, I was brought into close communication with a number of the largest money-lenders in England, principally some of the large insurance companies; and the authorities of those institutions informed me that a certain given rate of interest was absolutely a condition of their sending money out to these colonies at all; that, unless they get a certain net return, which will be appreciably more than will be got, so far as I can see, in the colony if this scheme is carried out, money will certainly return. Speaking with absolute authority on the subject, these gentlemen say that this money will not remain in New Zealand if it does not bring in a certain net return; and therefore, if the money is displaced, it will certainly return Home. That will be one of the most completely unsatisfactory results of this proposal. It seems to me that no regard is had to the fact that money is a flowing thing, which will go where it suits it best to go, and will stay where it pays it best to keep it. I have now but a little more to say upon this subject. It has been often said that when one strongly complains of a particular proposal it is desirable that he should suggest an alternative. I will suggest an alternative, and one founded upon what I consider a thoroughly sound principle. It is exactly the one upon which the European institutions are founded, and upon which they operate. It was one which was embodied in a measure which was introduced by Sir Julius Vogel, and it is known as the “mortgage-bond system.” That was to be brought into operation only by companies—in fact, by companies which might have loan undertakings in this country—and it had at its root this sound principle: that the strength of an institution should be in its own possessions, that its loan operations should be conducted with its own loan-moneys only, without any State guarantee, and without the interference of the State for the purpose of keeping it alive. I submit to my honourable friends that they really might—and I will lend them a hand in doing it—establish a system of that kind, which might in time, not immediately, operate in two ways very beneficially. It might on the one hand take any private funds which they desired and find a perfectly secure State investment; and on the other hand it might supply in a measure funds for the object they have in view in this Bill. But, Sir, when I think of the Government's proposal as it now stands, and as I have reviewed it to the Council—when I think that it is calculated to produce the consequences I think it will, I feel it is not right that it should be allowed to pass this Legislature in its present form. I have endeavoured to place before the Council the fact that it is not founded upon the principles which regulate the European institutions to which I have referred. I have also endeavoured to show that it contains this immense fault, this radical and utterly defective principle: that the public credit is to be used for the benefit of private individuals—that it leaves out of its scope all benefit both to the rich over the £5,000 limit and to the poor who are unsuccessful in obtaining money, either from want of security or through the general competition for the loans. I have shown also that it is absolutely beyond any reasonable limits to which we could go in the direction of burdening the colony, with the engagements we now have, and the immense liabilities which we have not only now existing, but with also those liabilities we have recently assumed. I have also shown that the revenue of the colony is in no condition to sustain further engagements. I have likewise endeavoured to show, and I think I have successfully shown, that the productions of the colony are not in that condition which we desire; that, so far from their showing any sign of redundancy, the tendency is backwards. Another point which we have to consider is the large quantity of labour that is unemployed; and I have further shown that we have no expectation whatever of continued surpluses. I pass by the defective details of the Bill, which are always subject, of course, to remedy. Now, looking at the position, and that we have before us a measure containing these great faults, and one which, I believe, is radically wrong in itself, and, above all, that it has not been submitted to the country in any practical shape, or in any form in which the country could have any opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it, or of in any sense expressing an opinion for the guidance of this Legislature, I feel it incumbent upon me as a public duty to move this amendment: Whereas this Bill proposes to initiate a policy of unlimited borrowing, which must be attended with great risk and commercial responsibility, and whereas no opportunity has been afforded to the people of the colony to express an opinion thereon, this Council is of opinion that the Bill should not be proceeded with until the subject has been maturely considered, and that therefore it should be read the second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. Stevens

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—It was easy, Sir, to see from the tone of the honourable gentleman's remarks what his conclusion would be. The first thing that strikes us is this: that that conclusion might have been stated in fewer words. As regards the speech we have just listened to, I consider it an exceedingly able and comprehensive one; but it is the speech of a strong individualist—a disciple of the laissez-faire school—one of those who look with alarm upon any innovation such as this, or upon any bold and progressive policy. That being so, it must follow that I, being a firm and strong State socialist, must disagree with many of the conclusions of the honourable gentleman, although I admit that many of his facts are correct. The first point with which the honourable gentleman dealt was the Crédit Foncier, and he explained what it was and how it was governed, and then he proceeded to tell us that this Bill in no way resembled such an institution. Now, Sir, had we proposed to establish such an institution in this colony his remarks would have been à propos. But what we propose to establish is something entirely different, and therefore there was no necessity to tell us that the Bill now before us in no way proposed to establish an institution resembling the Crédit Foncier.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I think I ought to say that the Government claimed that it did, and therefore I made the remark to which the honourable gentleman refers.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—I heard the remarks of the honourable gentleman who introduced the measure, but I did not catch that portion. Of course that would account for the honourable gentleman's remarks. Then, Sir, he said that it could not be shown that any State had gone so far as we proposed to go in this direction—that is, in lending money to private persons. Now, I would ask, Because no other State has gone before us in this direction, is that any argument why we should not do so? If it were so,—if we are never to do anything but what has already been done by somebody else, and every one else is to act accordingly,—then we should have no progress whatever. It is necessary that some one should first make an advance, and then allow others to judge of the judiciousness or otherwise of following in his footsteps. Then, the honourable gentleman told us it was right to borrow money for the purpose of establishing telegraphs and railways, for the reason that they were State property: and he quite approved of that. Now, the prosperity of these institutions depends also on the prosperity of the colony; and if by doing as the Government are doing in this matter they are encouraging enterprise and production, and so increasing the prosperity of the railways and the other Government institutions, approving as the honourable gentleman does of money being used directly for that purpose, I should not expect to find him objecting to its being used indirectly for so laudable a purpose. Now, I look upon this measure as proposing one of the greatest experiments in State socialism that have probably ever been attempted. And, Sir, I look with a certain amount of confidence to the result. I know there is an objection on the part of the Individualist school to people receiving any benefits whatever from the State, for they talk a great deal about self-reliance. Now, from the point of view from which the State socialist looks at the question, he sees that in depending on the State he is depending upon himself, for the people are the State, the State as a whole, and therefore their dependence upon the State is in itself the very essence of self-reliance. The economical effect of a measure such as this is easily foreseen: it will be to reduce the rate of interest on money throughout the colony. The Bill purports to be a cheap-money Bill, and a low rate of interest is cheap money. Cheap money provides facilities for persons to use their labour and their industry for the very best purpose. It was well said by Turgot, the French economist, that a low rate of interest resembles the receding sea—it leaves behind it a fertile plain, fertile lands which afterwards become productive though previously covered by a waste of waters. That is his view, though, perhaps, those are not his exact words; and that is what will happen under the effect of such a law as this. Then we come to this question: Do the farmers require cheap money? And here I have to call attention to some remarks which fell from the Hon. Mr. Stevens, when he dealt with low prices. They all go to show the necessity there is for this cheap money. Probably at no time in the history of New Zealand, or, I might say, in the history of the world, was the condition of farmers worse than at the present time. Owing to these fallen and falling prices, the farmer is now required to pay, in many cases, 50 per cent. more produce as interest than he had to pay twenty years ago. The consequence is that the whole lifeblood of the farming community is being sapped by the money-lenders. Any reduction in the rate of interest must therefore relieve the farmers to a certain extent, and commensurately improve their position. Under this measure farmers who are now borrowing money at 7 and 8 per cent.—perhaps more—will be able to convert their mortgages, and borrow at 5 per cent. The consequence will be, that a certain amount of money, that is now placed on mortgage, will be set at liberty. Either one of two things will then happen: Either this money so released will be invested in other directions, in some reproductive enterprise—perhaps in manufacture—and so add to the prosperity of the colony, and give employment; or it will, as stated by the Hon. Mr. Stevens, float to some other place, where it can get better investment. But supposing the three millions we propose to borrow displaces three millions of English capital already invested in the colony, and the money so brought in is to bear interest at 4 per cent., as compared with the other which has been gaining interest at 8 per cent., would not that be a distinct advantage to the country? I say it would, and any one who looks at the matter from this point of view will see that the exchange would be enormously in our favour. I must say that I also look with some dissatisfaction at the large increase proposed to be made in the colony's indebtedness. Still, under the circumstances, I think it is justifiable; but I am afraid, with this drain of interest that is going on, in face of the fallen and falling prices I have already referred to, the day is not far distant when that interest-charged will become more than we can bear; and so, I say, I view with dissatisfaction any increase in that direction. At the same time, I think, had the Government—of course, they have acted as they think best, and probably are better informed than I am—started by establishing a State bank in the place of appointing a Board to deal with a matter like this, the wants of the settlers might have been better attended to, and at the same time a certain amount of paper money could have been issued without any risk, and advanced to the settlers to meet their necessities, without the necessity of going on the London market. Then, the Bill provides that this money must be lent on mortgage; but I would point out this: that, while the farmer requires assistance, he does not always want to mortgage his land. He requires temporary assistance, very often an advance on his clip; and were a State bank established, and these necessary advances made, I think there would be an improvement on the present proposal. Had we had such an institution in the past we should never have had people fleeced as they have been by many of the financial institutions of the colony, which first had a lien on the clip; then they had the clip; sometimes they had the second year's clip; then they had the sheep, and then they had the farm: in fact, they had everything in payment of interest. Had we had, as I say, a State bank able to make these advances, and deal with the settlers on a more considerate basis, we should not have had so much distress as we have at the present time. The honourable gentleman did not say in plain words that he doubted our ability to get this money, but he pointed out that the fact of our going on the London market for a large amount of money would have the effect of injuring our credit. I do not know whether he wished to convey the impression which was left on my mind, that we might have some difficulty in obtaining this money. Upon this point I do not think we need to trouble ourselves at all. I do not think the London capitalist is at all sentimental. I believe that wherever he can get a good and safe investment for his money he will accept it; he will not consider that the effect of lending this money to New Zealand will be to reduce the rate of interest in this colony: that is not a matter he will concern himself about—the big fishes eat up the little ones—he will leave the local capitalists to look after themselves. He will see that we have here a population of three-quarters of a million, and that the people possess private wealth to the amount of £154,917,000, without considering our public wealth at all, and that is the point of view he will take; and he will see that the mere fact of our asking for a certain number of millions—six, eight, or ten millions—need give him no cause to fear as to the soundness of the security, or our ability to pay, if it should come to that ultimately. I shall not take up the time of the Council any longer. I think it will be seen, from what I have already said, that I see much in the Bill to approve of. I am altogether in sympathy with its object, and I trust that the day is not far distant when the Government will do something in the direction of establishing a State bank and a paper currency, instead of going on the London market for money, and then I shall feel perfectly satisfied. Taking everything into consideration, I shall support the Bill.

Hon. Mr. Rigg

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—Sir, the honourable gentleman who has just sat down has told us that he intends to support the Bill; but a great many of his arguments were directed against it to this extent: that, however much he might approve of the Bill, he thought a Bill which would establish a State bank or some similar institution would be infinitely preferable, and he said that because he considered a very large number of persons who wanted money objected to mortgaging their properties for it, and he thought that by the substitution of a State bank for the proposals contained in this Bill they would in some undefined manner obtain money without giving this particular kind of security for it to which he objects. We can understand the view he takes, because he said he is a pronounced State socialist, and a State socialist, we all know, has very peculiar notions as to the rights of property, and as to what may be done by the State in altering the relations of property and distributing the property of the whole amongst different members of the society of which the State is composed. An official definition of State socialism was, if I remember rightly, given at a meeting held last year at Zurich. I have just jotted down from memory what the definition was, so that I may not be absolutely correct in the wording, but to the best of my recollection it was this:—

“A State socialist advocates the nationalisation of all the means of production and exchange, the abolition of individual capitalists, and the substitution of State and municipal enterprise in their stead.”

That is a very broad platform, and one on which this country has not professedly taken its stand, although I think, substantially, we have gone very considerably in this direction. I noticed in this morning's New Zealand Times a remarkable article advocating the Undesirable Immigrants Bill, evidently approving of that measure. The writer said, “We are now engaged in a great experiment of State socialism.” I can understand this is a part of that great experiment, and, as I am as strong an individualist as the honourable gentleman is a State socialist, I altogether disapprove of continuing this experiment any further than we have gone already: in fact, I should very much like to see the process stopped, and that we should go back to the old system under which the country was so prosperous many years ago. My main objection to this Bill is, that it is not desirable to increase the functions of Government—that is to say, I am opposed to State socialism in every shape and form; and, although the Colonial Secretary argued very strongly in its favour, because, he said, the banks and capitalists had charged enormous rates of interest, and had always demanded their pound of flesh—in fact, the Bill was, to a certain extent, a kind of punishment for those wicked persons—

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—No; I did not say that.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—The honourable gentleman did not use the word “punishment,” but I think the whole meaning and intention of his speech went in that direction.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Allow me to correct the honourable gentleman, as I do not think he would wish to misrepresent me. I did not say that they kept up the rate of interest, but that if they had reduced the rate of interest the Government would never have introduced this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—Exactly; because they did not reduce the rate of interest, and because they did not treat the people in a fair way, therefore they are to be punished by this Bill. I think it can only be looked upon as a punishment when people who have been in the habit of obtaining a high rate of interest are, by the action of the State, deprived of that power; and to that extent I consider it is a very considerable punishment. If a man who was in the habit of getting 10 per cent. is forced by the State to take 8 per cent., I consider myself that he is punished to the extent of 2 per cent. With regard to this question, I should say that the rate of interest depends entirely upon the supply and demand of money, just as the price of anything else depends upon the supply and demand. It is utterly absurd to say that any one should not demand the rate of interest which he can obtain. I can remember the time when I had to pay 10 or 12 per cent. interest, and I think I was making a great deal more profit at that time than when I paid as little as 6 per cent. There was a time when things were so prosperous that we could afford to pay that rate of interest, and I really cannot see that any blame attaches to any individual or corporation for demanding as high a rate of interest as can be obtained. Could anything be more ridiculous than for the manager of a bank to say to the persons who had borrowed money, “Well, it is very hard to charge you 8 per cent. when I am sure you cannot make a very large profit out of your property, and therefore, on account of good feeling, I will reduce it to 6 per cent.”? What would the shareholders of that bank say? They would say that the manager was not fit for his position, and they would dismiss him as quickly as possible. It is perfectly absurd to blame any man, or any set of men, for obtaining the highest rate of interest they can possibly obtain. It is well known that money-lending is a special business, and one which involves frequently a very considerable amount of risk. I do not think it is the kind of business in which the Government ought to enter, as I do not think the Government is at all fitted for business of that sort. We have seen great companies, such as the Bank of New Zealand and the Loan and Mercantile Agency Company, making a tremendous mess of their business all over the country; and why should it be thought that a similar mess would not be made by the Government? On that account I think this proposal is likely to be injurious to the country, because I think a very considerable loss may arise at any moment from the injudicious management by the officers of the department, prudent as they may be. Then, supposing this scheme is gone into, and supposing we plunge the country into this vast speculation by raising three millions of money and lending it at the rate of 5 per cent., what will be the necessary result of that lending upon the value of property? We know that the value of land varies inversely with the rate of interest, and directly you reduce the rate of interest to 5 per cent. you cause something in the nature of a boom in landed property. The consequence will be, if you lend, as proposed in this Bill, on country properties to the extent of two-thirds of the estimated value, and in the case of towns to one-half, you are likely to find the whole of your margin cut off, almost before you see the first year's interest. That is a very probable result. The security will be necessarily exaggerated; and what has been called bed-rock has been by no means reached yet. I heard only the other day of a case where a person some few years ago purchased a country-town section from the Government for the sum of £30, and a few months ago he found he had been rated, for land-tax and other purposes, at £3 on his property, say, one-tenth of the value it was at the time he purchased it. That shows the danger of lending on property without the greatest circumspection. Then, it appears to me that, so far from the farmers to whom this money is proposed to be lent being necessarily gainers, it will very often happen that the man who owns land which he is prepared to cut up into farms will be the real gainer. When the people can get money at 5 per cent. they will, of course, be prepared to give much larger sums than when they had to pay 7 or 8 per cent. upon mortgage. So, instead of the poorer class of the community being benefited, as proposed under this Bill, it is exceedingly probable that the comparatively rich will be benefited. So, even on the principle of State socialism, that can hardly be called an advantage. But I consider that the greatest danger that is likely to arise under this proposal is that under it you will have an enormous number of State debtors, and in the course of time, if they are not successful with their properties, they will demand a reduction of interest. They will even insist upon interest being foregone altogether; and, when the country will be prepared to lend larger sums on these properties, there is nothing to prevent a political reaction taking place. As the Hon. Mr. Stevens pointed out in the course of his speech, it is ridiculous to suppose that this is going to stop at the three millions now proposed, because when once we begin this system we shall have pressure brought to bear by persons who have not got money under it, and we shall gradually find, instead of having on our hands three millions of money for this purpose, we may have a loan of fifteen millions. There will be perpetual pressure brought to bear, and the liabilities of the colony in the future will be perfectly enormous. Then, there are other curious arrangements in the Bill. At present we only talk about borrowing these three millions, to be spread over two years; but, then, we are to issue land-bonds up to the amount of the existing mortgages, and that, it appears to me, will become a sort of paper currency, and it is very difficult to see what the effect of that currency will be. I quite agree with the Hon. Mr. Stevens that one effect of the land-bonds will be to drive the existing money out of the country. You will find that directly people in England or elsewhere are aware that the State may interfere with the investment of money they will cease to send it to this country. They will never be sure what they will get for it, or, at any rate, they will know that they can only get 5 per cent.; and I believe the effect will be that a large amount of money will be withdrawn, and, what is possibly still worse, a large amount of money that would otherwise be available will be locked up. Then, if some of the mortgagees are unable to pay, the market will be immediately flooded as regards land, and the depreciation of that land will be such that it will be utterly impossible for the Government to recover the money advanced upon it; so that we have no security against the colony being saddled with a large portion of this debt which we are going to incur for the purpose of lending to settlers and others. I may say, too, that it appears to me extremely unfair that any particular class of the community—farmers and other landowners—should be selected as the only persons who are to derive any benefit from this measure. I do not see at all why the manufacturers in towns should not be equally entitled to these extremely good things which are going. I have no doubt that in the course of time there will be an amendment to this Bill, if it is once put in operation, and that we shall have demands not only from farmers of all classes, but from every class of the community that may want to borrow money and that can show any sort of security for it. Sir, it is very easy for a man to lose a very considerable amount of money in endeavouring to work land. Every one must know of people who have done that with various amounts of capital. I know of numerous instances where a man who began with from £5,000 to £10,000 dropped the whole of that capital in land. In the course of a few years the whole of their capital is gone from them, and they become absolutely penniless. And that has not been from borrowing, but it is partly from misfortune and partly from mismanagement. Just as in an ordinary business, a man requires a certain amount of special skill to make anything out of the land at any time: and then, cheap money will certainly be a very great temptation to many persons who never contemplated going upon land to go upon it, in the belief that with money at 5 per cent. they will certainly be able to do well; and this system is certainly encouraging a large class of persons to spend money, and who will be State debtors for all time—they will not be producers, or be of any real service to the country in the way of production or of the increase of exports. I think that is a state of things exceedingly likely to arise. It has arisen to a large extent already, owing to the way we are dealing with our lands. We are attempting to settle people on the land on all kinds of fancy tenures. They go upon the land, and we know that many of them are in a state closely approaching starvation; and, as we are aware, it is this class of people it is proposed to help by this Bill. I think we are making a huge mistake. Sir, we have, of course, to consider that the working of the Act will cost a considerable sum of money, no estimate of which has yet been laid before us. But I understand it is admitted that it will cost a considerable sum of money per annum to pay the officers who will be engaged in working this Act. I notice that a large number of appointments are to be made under the Bill, and it is difficult to see how the work which these gentlemen are supposed to do can be performed by anything but a very large staff. There is one thing which I think ought to be considered. Clause 16 states that the members of the General Board are to be the Superintendent, who is to be Chairman of the Board, and six other persons holding the offices for the time being of Colonial Treasurer, Public Trustee, Government Insurance Commissioner, Surveyor-General, Solicitor-General, and Commissioner of Taxes. They are to be ex officio members of the Board. It seems to me that we are piling an enormous amount of work on to those officers, especially the Surveyor-General. It seems to be supposed that he can do anything the Act directs him to do. We have already thrown a considerable amount of work upon him under the Land for Settlements Bill, and now it is proposed to throw this additional work upon him. I think it will be impossible for these gentlemen to attend to this business properly, and the probable result will be that the work will be done in a very perfunctory manner, or not done at all, and the Act will become inoperative. It is said that whatever we may think about it the country has approved of the scheme; but, as the Hon. Mr. Stevens said, the country has never had this scheme before it, or anything like it, in a definite shape, and has not expressed approval of it. There was a general statement or something of that sort made that cheap money was to be given to settlers, but the country has never had this proposal before it. I am convinced if it had that it would take much the same view as was taken only the other day at a meeting of the National Association of New Zealand in Auckland. The Colonial Secretary may laugh, but I may state that the National Association is doing very good work. No doubt it is extremely distasteful to the Government, but unquestionably the country will be benefited by it. I read their report this morning with very great interest, and I think what they say is perfectly correct. One of the delegates, Mr. Kirkbride, speaking of the advances to settlers, moved,—

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

“That, as the electors at the last general election declared against increasing the liabilities of the colony, and inasmuch as the borrowing proposals of the Government will greatly augment the public debt, and will eventually result in grave disaster, this meeting is of opinion that a respectful petition should be presented to the Legislative Council urging it to reject the proposed measures until they have been submitted to the people for consideration.”

Mr. Kirkbride said a meeting of farmers had been held the previous evening at Mangare. He believed nine out of ten farmers, if not a greater proportion, were entirely against the proposals of the Government, and particularly so against the Advances to Settlers Bill, because they looked upon it as a sop—a mere class bribe. They also objected to the proposal because it would be sure to lead to a very great deal of corruption. Mr. Kirkbride then went on to read a letter which, at the meeting he had referred to, it had been resolved to send to the Hon. Mr. Swanson asking him to oppose the Advances to Settlers Bill. He also said,—

“The new department to be created would mean additions to officialism, and the people who would benefit would be those of the right ‘colour,’ or those of a ‘wobbly’ kind. Farmers considered the margin allowed for advances was not sufficient. He knew a gentleman who a few years ago bought a small farm in the Waikato for £900. Only last week he had to sell it for £300. Where, then, was the margin for risk? It would be very unwise to advance more than half the value of the land. At the present time plenty of money could be got on undeniable security at 5½ per cent.”

I understand that Mr. Kirkbride referred to a petition which it was proposed to send to the Hon. Mr. Swanson, asking him to oppose the passing of this Bill. This petition was unanimously adopted at the meeting, and I expected to see it here this afternoon; I understand, however, it has not arrived. It is an indication of the feeling of the country at the present time. The National Association represents a very considerable section of the community, and is certainly doing good. I am convinced that when the people of the country thoroughly understand what is proposed in this measure they will entirely agree with the resolution proposed at that meeting. There may be a different opinion, of course, as to whether the country will approve of it, but this is a matter which remains to be seen. I hear that on all sides there is a very considerable amount of distrust produced by this enormous borrowing policy, and the people of the country are beginning to wake up to the fact that we have already this session committed the country to a borrowing policy to the extent of five and a quarter millions. This is a very large sum, and we are, as the Hon. Mr. Stevens has pointed out, entering upon a borrowing policy at a time when, owing to the low price of produce in other countries, this colony is in the worst possible condition to enter into such a policy. I must say, also, that the whole thing is an entire departure from the pledges of the Government during the election, when they professed to be carrying out the policy of the late Mr. Ballance, who, in his Financial Statement of 1892, said that the policy of his Government was a policy, financially, of self-reliance. I particularly noted that at the time, because it was an adaptation of the old phrase. It was used in reference to our war policy in the old days, and I was glad to see that he, at any rate, had adopted this system. The Government has professed all along to go on the same lines: in fact, this has been their platform all through; but they have suddenly jumped into a sea of troubles, as far as this country is concerned. The Government a short time ago proposed a policy of self-reliance, but it has now become a sort of "Jubilee plunger." They seem to be perfectly reckless of the amount of debt which they accumulate on the country, and they go about in the most light-hearted way borrowing money in all directions. I call it sly borrowing; and it would be far better, if it is necessary that the amount should be raised, that we should go to the London market and raise it on the best possible terms for a specific purpose, for I say that this is certainly not one. The proposal is really one to convert the colony into a vast pawnshop, and I think the Government will go down to posterity as the authors of the great pawn policy, if this Bill is carried. I shall certainly support the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Stevens, believing it to be essential to the good of the country that this sort of thing should be stopped; but, if the Bill passes, I shall ask my honourable friend the Colonial Secretary if he will substitute for the Southern Cross in the flag of New Zealand the three balls of the pawnbroker.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—Regarding this Bill, much will depend upon the way in which the scheme is administered, but I am not prepared to say that the officers who are to compose the Board are the best business-men we could get to carry out a scheme of this kind. Nor do I altogether think it is likely to contribute to good feeling among the people of the country that we should perpetuate this abominable system of class legislation, of which we have had too much during the last few years. As to what has been said to the effect that we should restrict in any way the amount that we may properly lend, I understand the largest amount that may be lent to one person under the provisions of this Bill is £5,000. Nor can I see that our sympathies should be allowed to go all in the one direction—that is, in the direction of one class. There is another point in regard to this Bill which should be mentioned. I doubt whether the one-third margin is sufficient, because there are no valuers who are really reliable, and there is nothing upon which people differ so much as upon the question of the value of land. That is my experience, and therefore I must say that I have great hesitation, and some little doubt, with regard to this point, and I think it will have to be modified. This is not a scheme for indefinite borrowing, as the limits are definitely specified in the Bill—namely, two years, and £1,500,000 to be raised each year. That is all, and it is merely a flea-bite in the private indebtedness of the colony. It means, so far as the persons who have to pay are concerned, a very great reduction in the amount of interest they are now paying. For instance, the institutions which have had for many years the supplying of money have received high rates for it, and they are the people who are opposing this scheme. It appears to me a reasonable thing, and I think, as far as my experience goes, it is not an unwise scheme at all, if properly carried out. I am quite willing that it should be tried. It cannot be called borrowing, because we have an asset at hand, if the margin of one-third is sufficient. I am not prepared to say whether the Government is taking a safe course in bringing down the rate of interest in this colony. Although the settlers of the colony have certainly had to pay too much for the accommodation they have received from their agents, the question of borrowing should not come into this matter. I differ from the Hon. Mr. Rigg, who said this is State socialism, because I do not think it can be called a socialistic measure unless we make it so. I differ from him in regard to State socialism, as I think it is an improper thing. And to show how little State socialists agree with this measure, in another place a gentleman who is looked upon there as a great State socialist has voted against the Bill consistently, and this only shows that this question of State socialism has not been half thought out, and I doubt very much whether State socialists really know what they require, or the proper way to get it. It seems to me that they have no distinct idea about the matter, and that at present they do not agree upon almost any point. As regards the principle of assisting the country settlers, who have all along had a very heavy burden in the shape of the interest they have hitherto been paying, I think there is a very good argument. In a late number of the Nineteenth Century I read an article arguing out this question as to whether it was a fair thing for the Government to carry out or not. This principle has been followed for some years in England. For instance, in England the draining of lands is now carried on on this principle, by the Government lending the money at a rate of interest which in time works out both principal and interest. If some little improvement were made in the Board, I think there is very little to find fault with in the Bill. The Hon. Mr. Stevens, I grant, delivered a well-thought-out speech against it from his point of view, and probably he was right from his point of view, but he generally takes a pessimistic view, and he does not admit anything to be right at all in the direction in which this effort is going to be made. It has been urged that the money might also be lent to business people as well as to farmers, but I can assure honourable members that there is ten times more likelihood of the money being lost in business than if it were lent to farmers. There is no similarity between the two classes. The one is a producing class, and the other is not a producing class. If proper persons are intrusted with the carrying-out of the scheme and the advancing of the money, the one is a class which, if money is lent to it, is likely to do well. The other class may do well, but most probably would not. I may mention that the Globo Assets have, as security, all kinds of properties, such as flourmills, sawmills, and even, it is said, racecourses. How have these fallen into their hands? Simply because the speculations have not prospered. I very much object to the Bill being used to advance money on such speculations as those I have indicated. If we are going to begin, let us begin by lending on land, and, if nothing else comes of it, the produce of the country will be increased by it. I am disposed to support the Bill for that reason. I think it will bring down the price of money.

Hon. Mr. Pharasyn

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—It will bring down first-class securities, but not second-rate.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—I do not presume that a properly-constituted Board would for a moment lend money except on first-class security. I shall vote for the Bill, but I hope, under your ruling, Sir, we shall have an opportunity of amending in Committee some of the minor provisions to which I object.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—I should not have risen to say a word about this measure but for some remarks which have fallen from the last speaker. The honourable gentleman said that no people outside farmers are producers. I felt rather tickled at that. It strikes me that, in the case of the gum-digger, a loan would be very useful to him, and I venture to say he has produced as much, man for man, as any of the farmers have done lately.

An Hon. MEMBER.—He has got no security.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—He has got his lease of the gumfields. Then, does the gold-digger or the coalminer produce nothing? Why cannot they be assisted also? I contend that, in spite of the failure of some sawmills and timber companies, not many farmers have brought as much money into New Zealand as these in this industry have done—supposing we confine it to the northern end of the colony. The kauri and the timber industry generally has brought millions into the country. If these people are not to be encouraged I should like to know why they should not be. There are a great many industries which I could also name in this connection. If this scheme turns out to be a disaster, those are the people who will have to pay for it.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They will go away.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—Who is going to pay then? They will have to do so. If the scheme fails they must pay, because there will be nobody else left.

Debate adjourned.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives asking for a conference on the amendments made by the Council in this Bill.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. BONAR, the Hon. Mr. Reynolds, the Hon. Mr. Bowen, the Hon. Mr. Swanson, and the Hon. Mr. Bonar were appointed Managers on behalf of the Council.

The Council adjourned at five minutes to nine o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, 4th October, 1894.

First Reading—Extra Clerks—Bellamy's—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill—Land for Settlements Bill—War Stores—Criminal Code Bill—Public Works Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Land and Income Assessment Bill.

EXTRA CLERKS.

Mr. MCGOWAN brought up the following report from the Goldfields Committee, and moved, That the report be laid on the table:—

"THE Correspondence in connection with the Clerkship of the Goldfields and Mines Committee.

"I am directed by resolution of the Committee to lay upon the table of the House the attached correspondence in re the above matter."

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GUINNESS moved, That the correspondence be read by the Clerk.

Mr. SPEAKER did not think the correspondence ought to be read, at present at least, as it reflected on the conduct of the Clerk of the House for doing his duty in reducing the number of extra clerks when there was not sufficient work for their employment. He understood from the Clerk of the House that it was the usual custom towards the end of each session to reduce the number of extra clerks; and that course had been followed on the present occasion.

Motion negatived.

Mr. GUINNESS moved, That the report and correspondence be printed. He thought it was as well that the House should be placed in possession of the facts in relation to this matter. The Goldfields Committee, which was a standing Committee set up every session by the House, had had appointed to it a clerk who had conducted the business of that Committee for several years. About a fortnight ago the members of the Committee were very much surprised to find that that gentleman's services had been dispensed with, and that a new clerk had been sent there to carry on the business of the Committee. The Committee, wanting the services of a clerk who was acquainted with the petitions that had been partly dealt with, and with documents in connection with those petitions, had a clerk sent to them who knew nothing about these matters. A resolution was then passed,—

"That, in the opinion of the Committee, the services of the clerk of the Committee, Mr. Clinton, should be retained until the end of the session; that Mr. Clinton has always given entire satisfaction to the Committee, and has conducted his duties with despatch and accuracy; and I am directed to ask the Government to accede to the Committee's request, and to allow Mr. Clinton to remain until the business of the Committee is concluded."

That resolution was sent to the Premier. To it a reply was sent by Mr. Friend, Clerk of the House of Representatives, to the effect that the letter had been sent to him, and the answer went on to state, "I regret to say that I am unable to retain Mr. Clinton in the service of the department until the end of the session. The staff of extra clerks is being reduced as opportunity offers." That answer was not considered satisfactory by the Committee; and the following resolution was passed:—

"That, in the opinion of this Committee, the answer forwarded by Mr. Friend to the Committee's resolution requesting that Mr. Clinton's services be retained as clerk of the Committee to the end of the session is most unsatisfactory, as it simply expresses Mr. Friend's regret that he is unable to retain Mr. Clinton's services to the end of the session. The Committee therefore desire to place on record its opinion that, if the services of any of the clerks must be dispensed with during the session, the services of those clerks who have been employed for the first time this session should be dispensed with before a clerk who has well and efficiently discharged his duties for many years. That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Premier."

That answer was sent to the Premier on the 27th September, seven days ago, but up to the present had been totally ignored by that honourable gentleman, and no answer had been received by the Goldfields Committee. The Committee met this morning, and it was resolved that these facts should be reported to the House. He contended that the system which was disclosed by the facts brought before the Committee with regard to the services of these clerks was most unsatisfactory, inasmuch as new clerks were appointed nearly every session; and he maintained that where it became necessary to dispense with the services of any of the clerks towards the end of the session the suspension or discharge of these clerks should be of the clerks who had been more recently appointed, and that with regard to an old and efficient officer, who had performed his duties satisfactorily, who had got the run of the whole of the facts in connection with the working of the Committee at his fingers' ends, it was unfair to discharge that clerk, and send to the Committee a new clerk who knew nothing about its business. He had therefore great pleasure in moving that this correspondence be printed. He regretted the Premier was not in his place, so that he might offer some explanation in regard to the manner in which these discharges had taken place, because he held the Government were responsible for the proper carrying-out of engagements, and the discharge of these duties. If the Government delegated those functions to the Clerk of the House, and he did not carry them out in the manner in which they should be carried out, then he hoped the House would agree with him in saying that the responsibility fell upon the Government which so delegated its authority to an officer.

Mr. Speaker

Sir R. STOUT desired to second the motion: but he could not understand what the honourable gentleman had to complain of, as he was one of those who last session voted for the control of the officers of the House being taken out of the Speaker's hands and left to the Minister. He understood that it was now looked upon that the officers of the House from the highest to the lowest were simply objects of patronage, and he did not see why the honourable member should complain of a system he helped to inaugurate. He must put up with it.

Mr. SPEAKER did not understand why the Committee should have made any application of the kind to the Premier. If the Committee had any complaint to make on the subject of clerical assistance, or on the conduct of officers of the House, the Speaker should have been addressed on the subject. Application was, however, made to the Premier, who had referred the correspondence to him, saying, as this was a matter of detail, he did not see his way to interfere, and that he had every confidence in Mr. Friend.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON said, so far as he could see, this matter had been left to Mr. Friend to arrange. He had nothing to say on that subject, but he wished to say, in reply to the senior member for Wellington City, that the ground taken up by him was indefensible. He had stated that the House had handed over the control of its officers to the Premier, and therefore they would have to put up with it. But, although the Premier had got this control, if he used it improperly the House would not put up with it. That was the recommendation of Ministerial control: the House itself was supreme; and they could certainly bring the Premier to book for any irregularity, and would do so.

Mr. SEDDON understood that complaint had been made owing to a recommendation of the Goldfields Committee not having been complied with. That Committee had sent a recommendation to him to the effect that a certain clerk should be retained, and he had treated that recommendation in the same way as the House would have treated it: it was by him sent on to the Speaker and Clerk, as in matters of detail they were conversant with every particular, and were the proper ones to advise the Government in such matters. Had he done otherwise he would have been accused, as he had been accused before, of dealing with everything according to his own sweet will; and because he had refused to do what was wanted, and take an improper course, then fault was found. He thought that in matters of this kind they should be advised, unless there were very strong reasons to the contrary, by the officers of the House. He had, however, laid down a rule that, if there was no work, then no clerk was required, as they had a right to study economy.

Major STEWARD thought that the motion for the printing of the papers would serve the purpose the honourable gentleman had in view, but, as Chairman of the Printing Committee, he might point out that the Appendices had grown enormously, and many of the papers printed simply went to the butter-shops. There was no objection to the motion being made simply as a means of ventilating the question, but in the interests of economy he hoped it would be negatived. The honourable gentleman would see the necessity for that.

Mr. DUNCAN said this was a very simple matter. The Committee had thought that when an old clerk had been for some time engaged on this work, and was a man with a family, he should have the preference over a young man who had no family. That was the real grievance in connection with the dismissal of this clerk, and had it not been for this there would not have been a word said further than that the Committee would not perhaps be as well served by a new man as it would be by the old one. In retrenchment questions of that nature, he thought they should consider whether a man was in need, or whether a single man with no family should be given the position. He would advise the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) to forego the attacks he continually made on the Liberal party. Whenever the honourable gentleman got an opportunity he had a dig and a slap at the Liberal party and the Government, and he objected to the honourable member doing so. He thought the Government had done the proper thing. They were responsible in the first instance to the House, and therefore could be held responsible for their action. That was the very reason why such matters should be brought up. But he would advise the honourable gentleman not to be too elaborate in his snubs, as he had been during the session. The honourable gentleman would find that if he continued to attack the Liberal party in that way he would not add to his own dignity or to the dignity of the House, and that two could play at that game.

Mr. GREEN sincerely hoped the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) would take the advice offered by the honourable member for Oamaru; but he thought it would be well in cases of the kind that the advice should be tendered by people who carried out the principle. It was within his recollection that the position the Premier took up now was entirely different from the position he took up a few weeks previously. The Premier then said that he would exercise the powers conferred on him as Premier irrespective of the opinion of any officer. Then they had been reminded that the House had handed over to the Government the power of making such appointments, and the Premier had made an appointment disregarding the recommendation of the same officer whom he now said it was desirable he should be guided by in his action. It had now been stated officially by the Premier on the floor of the House that he would always retain the services of the senior officer when one of two had to be dispensed with. If the Premier would always adhere to that, the House, he felt confident, would invariably approve.

Mr. SEDDON said that he never denied the responsibility. He had accepted it, for the House had placed the responsibility upon the Government.

Mr. GREEN said the honourable gentleman had done so before, but he had now said that he should consider it to be his duty not to interfere with the recommendation, because it was a matter of detail. It appeared to him, so far as the present discussion was concerned, the exception that had been taken to the Premier's action now was not that the Committee wished to retain an extra officer when there was no work to do, but they considered the officer to be retained should be the one who had been longest in the service—that his services should be retained rather than the services of the one who had been last appointed. That was a point that honourable members had not referred to, and it left the House exactly in the same position as before. The Committee were entirely satisfied with the officer who had been dispensed with. He agreed with the honourable member for Waitaki that there was no necessity for printing these papers, as the object for which the motion had been brought forward had been attained—namely, that of ventilating the reason why the services of the last-appointed officer had been retained in preference to the services of the officer who had been previously appointed, and who had discharged his duties to the satisfaction of the Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER said it might enable the House to comprehend this matter if he stated that none of the Committee clerks had been appointed either by the Premier or at his suggestion. They were most of them engaged by the Clerk of the House before the Speaker was appointed, and he had not been consulted in regard to them. In this particular case he understood that the clerk referred to had been taken on after the session was opened and when occasion arose for his services being required, and they were only dispensed with when the work of the Committees was nearly over.

Mr. McGUIRE asked if the Premier, in his reply, would state what was to be done with reference to the case of Mr. Kinsella—whether the recommendation of the Committee was to be carried out.

Mr. SEDDON said he would answer that question when the supplementary estimates came down. He had been asked the question whether a clerk who was in the middle of an inquiry into a particular work should be sent away and another clerk appointed to his place. He agreed that this was undesirable, as the clerk appointed in the middle of an inquiry would not know what had taken place before, and would have to start de novo, and it was a great mistake to do so.

Mr. ALLEN said that applied to more cases than one; but in this particular case the clerk referred to was not in the middle of any specific inquiry, but as the result of his removal the Committee had been hampered in getting the run of papers. For instance, in the case of one petition it took a great deal of time to find out where it was, as the new clerk had not the run of things, and was not aware what had been done with it by the previous clerk of the Committee.

Mr. GUINNESS, in reply, said that, in reference to the remarks of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), to the effect that he (Mr. Guinness) had supported the motion for handing over the control of the officers of the House to the Government, he did not retract one step from the action he then took and the vote he then gave. Power having been given to the Premier to exercise his authority in this matter, if he delegated that authority to any one else they had the right to call his action in question if the authority so delegated was exercised improperly. The Premier had stated that he could not interfere with these matters, but that they must be left to the executive officers of the House to deal with, and, when there was no work requiring the services of any clerk, of course that clerk must go. That, however, was not the question in the case of this clerk of the Goldfields Committee. The honourable gentleman, as an old goldfields member, must know that towards the end of a session there was always a great deal more work than at the commencement of the session. The Goldfields Committee would have more work to do during the next ten days than they had early in the session; and it was absolutely necessary that the clerk to that Committee should have the

3.0. run of the business. The main objection he (Mr. Guinness) urged against the manner in which this had been dealt with

Mr. Speaker

was that, if a clerk had to go, the proper course had not been taken, inasmuch as the new clerk, who was not so well acquainted with the business of the Committee, but had only been appointed during the present session, had been retained, and the old and efficient clerk, who had done the work for many years—and for the present session up to a fortnight ago—had been discharged. He hoped the Premier would look into the matter—he was responsible for what his executive officer did; and if the honourable gentleman thought it was just and right to discharge an old and faithful servant, against whom no fault could be found, and to keep on a new servant, all he could say was that he could not agree with him, and he believed that most members of the Liberal party would not agree with him. He did not wish to press the motion, and would ask leave to withdraw it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BELLAMY'S.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON brought up the following report of the House Committee:—

"I have the honour, by direction of the House Committee, to report the following resolution come to by the Joint House Committee—namely, that, on the motion of the Premier, it was resolved that the usual order for supplies for Bellamy's be sent."

In moving that the report lie on the table, he would take the opportunity of stating that the resolution of the Joint Committee was come to at an emergency meeting held on the 28th of last month. He was himself not present at that meeting, and knew nothing of it till after it was over.

Mr. SEDDON rose to a point of order. This was not a report brought down by order of the Joint Committee. It was the House Committee reporting what the Joint Committee had done. He questioned very much whether a separate Committee could bring down a report of a Joint Committee, though a Joint Committee could certainly report to both Houses.

Mr. SPEAKER, on the point of order, thought, if the Joint House Committee came to a certain decision, which the Committee of this House wished to draw attention to, it was in order for the Committee of this House to bring under consideration such proceedings of the Joint House Committee as our Committee thought this House should be made acquainted with.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said the position of the matter was this: The House of Representatives in the beginning of the session set up a House Committee, which met separately and elected a Chairman. A House Committee was also appointed by the Legislative Council, which met separately and elected a Chairman. The Committees of the two Houses had been in the habit of meeting together and discussing matters that were of common interest, but each Committee remained a separate entity. The resolution come to by the Joint Committee on the 28th of last month was considered by the House Committee of the House of Representatives, and it was resolved that it should be reported to the House, as relating to a matter which had before been under the attention and direction of the House, when, early in the session, a resolution had been passed to the effect that the sale of liquors at Bellamy's be discontinued, and when, six days after,—in view mainly, he believed, of the fact that arrangements had been made for the session by laying in stock,—it was resolved that the necessary permission be given to continue Bellamy's for this session only. In consequence of these resolutions he had felt it his duty to move in the Joint Committee to rescind the resolution ordering supplies for next session, and on his motion being rejected he asked that the resolution be reported. That was objected to by the Premier and some others. Consequently this was not the report of the Joint Committee, but of the House Committee of the House of Representatives, which met separately afterwards and resolved to report the resolution come to by the Joint Committee. He considered the subject was one the House ought to be consulted on. If this order were sent, it meant, taking the experience of the past as a criterion, that they would order supplies to the value of nearly £300 during the recess, to be stocked for next session. If he understood the resolutions of the House aright they meant that Bellamy's should not be opened next session. As the law stood it was quite clear that until a resolution of each House had been come to authorising the opening of Bellamy's no business could be carried on there. In view of what had occurred, it seemed to him that it was unbusinesslike to go to the expense of ordering supplies that might have to be disposed of at a sacrifice. Probably the intention of the Premier and others interesting themselves in this matter was, by ordering supplies and making all the arrangements for carrying on Bellamy's next session, to so commit the House as to make the resolutions come to practically nugatory. He would move, That the report do lie on the table.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the report be referred back to the Committee. The honourable gentleman was not doing himself much credit in assuming the character of Paul Pry.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I do not object to it—coming from you.

Mr. SEDDON said, when he told the House what had been done in respect to this matter honourable gentlemen would see that he was justified in exposing the honourable member's tactics in respect to this question. First of all, he would give the whole history complete. Some fortnight or three weeks ago the Joint House Committee mooted the question of sending for supplies, and the matter was postponed till there should be a full meeting of the Committee, notice of which was given. At that meeting the question arose as to whether or not the usual orders should go Home, leaving the matter to be dealt with when Parliament met next session. If the orders were not sent Home as usual, and if Parliament determined that Bellamy's should go on as it had gone on since its creation, then they would not be in a position to go on. The whole question was considered, and it was unanimously determined that the order should be sent. It would not amount, as the honourable gentleman had stated, to £300, but would be about £200, and it did not at all trammel the action of the House or Parliament in respect to the matter, because it was good value, and, if the House decided that Bellamy's was to be closed, then they would realise the amount it had cost. There would be no loss whatever; it was purely a matter of business—a matter of detail. At all events, it seemed to him that the almost unanimous decision of the Joint House Committee ought to be respected. Never before had the decision of the Joint House Committee been brought before the House in the same way as that now for the first time inaugurated. He challenged the honourable member, who had been for some years a member of the Committee, to say when the decision of the Committee with respect to sending orders had been brought before the House. Such a thing had never occurred in the past, and there was no reason why in this case there should have been a departure from the usual practice. The honourable member had appeared at the meeting of the Joint House Committee and had protested against the minutes being confirmed. That was also an unusual thing, for the minutes were merely a correct record of what had transpired. Then the honourable member gave notice to rescind the resolution previously agreed to. He appeared to move his resolution, and moved it without remark; the matter practically went by default, only the honourable gentleman and the honourable member for Franklin voting for it. The honourable member for Franklin had moved the resolution that Bellamy's should be closed, and he was therefore acting consistently with his motion to stop the sale of liquors at Bellamy's. Then, he would describe the next scene. His honourable friend the member for Patea had stopped him as they were going down the passage, and said, "Come in here"; like the spider to the flies, he said, "Come into my parlour." Well, they went in: there were four of them—himself, the honourable member for Patea, the honourable member for Franklin, and the honourable member for the Thames. Immediately they got into the parlour his spider-like friend the honourable member for Patea closed the door, and said, "We will make this a meeting of the House Committee." There had been no notice of this sent to members, but they were coming from the meeting of the Joint House Committee, and at a moment, without any notice, they were to form themselves into a meeting of the House Committee. There were only four of them; his honourable friend the member for Patea was Chairman, and with the honourable member for Franklin voting with him he had the casting-vote. He (Mr. Seddon) therefore came to the conclusion that he would have to play the part of the wasp on this occasion. Wasps, in their encounter with the spider, generally tore the web and the spider got the worst of it, and the wasps flew away. He said to the honourable member, "This will not do: you have the casting-vote, and if myself and the honourable member for the Thames walk out you have got no quorum,—and you had better not try it on." The honourable gentleman saw that he (Mr. Seddon) was master of the situation, and he said, "Oh, very well"; and they took their departure and were not caught. What was the next move? A meeting was called for that day. He had no notice of it, and he knew other members had not the slightest idea of it, and it was not on the cards that the meeting was for the specific purpose of reviewing what had been done by the House Committee. It would have been consistent with a fair course if that had been put on the notice. But the honourable gentleman took very good care that no proper notice was sent.

Mr. SPEAKER presumed the notices had been sent out by the clerk. He himself, being a member of the Committee, had received notice to attend the Committee.

Mr. SEDDON asked, would the honourable gentleman say that he told the clerk to let the members of the House Committee know what the business was?

Sir R. STOUT said that was not usual.

Mr. SEDDON said, where it was a matter of such importance as the honourable member wished to make out, it was his duty to have a notice put on the cards as to what the business was. He did not do so, but he brought a motion down telling the House that the House Committee had come to a conclusion, and he was in the position of having placed before the House the very wrong course taken by the Joint House Committee. What was the position of the honourable gentleman? Was he one of those who supported the closing of Bellamy's?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Yes.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable gentleman forgot. When the question of keeping Bellamy's open this session was before the Joint Committee the honourable gentleman moved a resolution. He (Mr. Seddon) asked that one word should be put in—the word "only." That was accepted as a compromise, and the resolution was passed.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said it was not a compromise at all.

Mr. SEDDON said it was a compromise, and the result was that the honourable gentleman's motion to keep Bellamy's open was carried. Now, however, he had changed front, for this reason: Because he (Mr. Seddon) moved this motion, he thought he was going to play upon the feelings of the temperance party in the House, and hold up the Premier as a shocking example. He desired to make a little capital as against the Premier in respect to the matter. But the honourable gentleman would make no capital out of it at all. He (Mr. Seddon) would be commended, on the other hand, for taking a straightforward, business-like course. And honourable members were as free as ever next session, as they were at the beginning of this session.

Mr. Seddon

An Hon. MEMBER.—They were not free; they had the liquor in hand, and had to drink it.

Mr. SEDDON said the liquor sold in Bellamy's evidently proved good liquor, as members generally looked none the worse for it. What was the position? They had a Bill before the House called the Licensing Bill, and if the honourable member had been attending to his duties he would have heard him say that when that Bill was before the House they could determine by that Bill what was to be done as regarded Bellamy's. Then, he was told that he would not get the Bill through; but he had been told that with regard to other Bills. Only the previous day he had been told he would not get the Public Works Bill through, and yet, with the help of his friends and the consideration of his opponents, he had done so. He had pointed out that the clause dealing with Bellamy's was almost at the commencement of that Bill, and whatever decision was arrived at by the House might be taken as an indication of the wishes of the members. Then, they must not forget the other branch of the Legislature, which had a right to be taken into consideration, and they had been almost unanimous in the Committee about sending the order Home. And, after all, what was there in it? As he had said, if the order went Home and the liquors came out here, they could realise its cost, and there was no loss; and if, on the other hand, the House agreed that Bellamy's was to be kept open, then everything was provided. If they were not in that position they would be told they did not understand their business; and if the result was that they had inferior liquor, and it had a baneful effect on the health of honourable gentlemen, who would be blamed? Those members who refused to send the order Home. When they realised what had taken place they would commend the Joint House Committee and the Premier for having done what any businessman who looked to details would do under the circumstances. As regarded the House Committee, was it fair that they should be placed in the position of receiving no notice? He would move, That the report be referred back to the Committee; so that they might discuss the matter and advise the House accordingly. He looked upon the meeting of the House Committee with only three out of ten members present, as a hole-and-corner proceeding, for the purpose of making capital against himself, and he thought, if the honourable member for Patea could get nothing better out of which to make capital against him he should leave it alone.

Sir R. STOUT regretted that Parliament should have this question discussed at all. He had hoped the House would see that it was better for its dignity not to have Bellamy's. The only way to get rid of such a discussion was not to have a licensed house on the premises. He could not understand what the Premier meant by finding fault with the report. What had the Committee done? They had only reported to the House what the Joint Committee did; and the Joint Committee, if they had done their duty, ought to have sent a report, as soon as the resolution was carried, to both Houses. What had the Committee done? Well, the House Committee had only told the House what was going on, which the House had a right to know, and therefore he could not see that there was anything to blame in the matter. The only other objection was that there was no notice given, on the back of the card inviting members to the Committee, as to what was coming on. Now, he had two cards before him for Committees on the following day: on the one there was a mark on the back, but on the other there was none. Any one who attended Committees knew that it was only occasionally that what was to happen in the Committee was marked on the back of the notice-card. He thought the Premier had all along been playing with the House on this question. He would explain the position. When the resolution was carried that Bellamy's should be closed, what happened? The Premier was not pleased at that being carried, and set about to get it defeated. What did he do? He brought down, with a great flourish of trumpets, a Bill to deal with the question. Where was that Bill? It had never been heard of; it was never intended to be brought up. And what was done? The Premier went to the Joint Committee and got that Committee to agree to a resolution—practically to do what? To rescind the resolution of the House. That was brought up, and he used his majority to carry, practically, the rescinding of a resolution carried previously by the House, and, having got that carried, they heard nothing more of the Bellamy's Bill. The honourable gentleman said it could be dealt with in the Licensing Bill. How could it be? The Bill as proposed by him left everything practically as it was now, so that the license might be issued, and he apprehended that might be the verdict of the Legislature. How could this, therefore, be an instruction to the House Committee? It would be nothing of the sort. He submitted the proper course would be to affirm that the House would not consent to Bellamy's being continued, and if anything happened the Premier would be to blame, because he had not acted straightforwardly with the House, but had tried to get behind the House, and the opinion of the House, on every occasion. He could not see that the House Committee did wrong in allowing the House to know what was going on.

Mr. MCGOWAN said the discussion seemed to have widened out into the continuance of Bellamy's. The real question was the report of the House Committee, and he would say that he could not admire the method by which that report had reached the House. He said distinctly that the resolution as read in the House was not placed before the House Committee. When the Joint House Committee drew up a report he thought it was the usual thing to direct that the Committee of each House should report their finding to the House whose Committee they were. In this particular case no such finding was come to. The House Committee met after the usual invitation, and it was some time before a quorum assembled, and then as soon as it was there the statement of the Chairman was, "Should we make a report as previously?" There could be no objection to doing so in the ordinary course, and, of course, that was assented to. But he said the report as read was certainly not a report that the House Committee had any knowledge of.

Mr. WILSON said that, as he was a member of the House Committee, he would like to give his version of what took place at the meeting referred to. At half-past twelve the meeting of the Railways Committee closed, and at twenty minutes to one the clerk of the House Committee came to him and asked him to attend its meeting, so as to make a quorum. He went to the Committee for that purpose, and his arrival there constituted the quorum that was required. The Minister was present, and the Chairman of the Committee informed those present that the Joint House Committee had passed a resolution ordering supplies for Bellamy's for next year, and he wished to know whether the House Committee should report to the House. It seemed to him (Mr. Wilson) that the House should be made aware at once of what had taken place at the Joint House Committee, and for that reason he moved, "That this Committee report to the House the motion which has been passed by the Joint House Committee." He did not draw out the motion, because he had not the motion with him, and he left it to the Chairman to do so. Probably he would have drawn it up himself had he had the opportunity. The motion he made was that a report be handed to the House embodying the resolution passed by the Joint Committee.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said that what the honourable member had just stated was exactly correct, and what the report said was exactly what occurred. The statement of the honourable member for the Thames was not correct. No such reference was made at the last meeting. The business was distinctly confined to reporting the resolution arrived at by the Joint House Committee—neither more nor less. He would like to say a word as to the Premier's statement of what had occurred after the Joint Committee meeting. The Premier was not celebrated for accuracy. The Premier's fanciful sketch could only go to confirm the distrust every one must feel at the account which he had been rash enough to give of what had occurred. It was largely made up of imagination. Throughout this matter he (Mr. Hutchison) had taken what he thought was a consistent stand. He voted for the general resolution of the honourable member for Franklin, in the early part of the session, that the sale of liquors at Bellamy's should be discontinued; but, seeing that the whole of the supplies for the session were in stock, he proposed at a meeting of the Joint House Committee that permission be given for this session to carry on Bellamy's. The "compromise" which the Premier indicated as having been come to did not suggest itself to his mind as a compromise at all; it was merely a further affirmation of the position indicated by the resolution he (Mr. Hutchison) had moved as to the permit being for this session, emphasizing the point that no permit should be given for another session, which should open under different conditions from those of this session. As to what occurred on the 28th September at the meeting of the Joint House Committee, he (Mr. Hutchison) could only speak from the minutes, as he was not present; but the next ordinary meeting he did attend and moved the rescission of the resolution previously come to on the motion of the Premier for the ordering of the supplies for Bellamy's for next session. There were four members of the House Committee present on that occasion.

Mr. SEDDON.—You were there at the time of the confirmation of the minutes of the preceding meeting.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said, Yes, and he took exception to what the Joint House Committee had done at their previous meeting. He took exception to the Joint House Committee having, as they had done, taken to deal with certain internal arrangements of this House, as he considered it was not in the province of the Joint House Committee to interfere in such matters, which were properly under the control of the House of Representatives Committee. That, however, was by the way. It had nothing to do with the Bellamy resolution, which, being a matter affecting both Houses, he admitted was properly a subject for the Joint Committee. He also objected to the resolution come to in the Joint House Committee on the motion of the Premier ordering supplies for Bellamy's. He objected on the ground that the Joint Committee should not have so acted, although the matter was within their province. He was told that he must give notice of his motion. He accordingly gave notice of motion. On the Joint House Committee meeting a few days afterwards, to consider the motion of which he had given notice, four members of the House were present—the Premier, the honourable member for the Thames, the honourable member for Franklin, and himself (Mr. Hutchison). He and the honourable member for Franklin voted for the rescission of the previous resolution; the Premier and the honourable member for the Thames voted the other way, the whole of the members of the Legislative Council who were present voting with the Premier. He (Mr. Hutchison) then suggested that the resolution of the Joint House Committee should be reported to each House. That was objected to by the Premier, who was supported by the other members of the Committee. It was evidently desired that the resolution which had been come to should not be made known to this House at any rate. He (Mr. Hutchison) then suggested that, as there was a quorum of the House of Representatives Committee present, they should meet separately and decide whether or not they should make a report of the resolution come to by the Joint House Committee; and, as indicated but not quite accurately detailed by the Premier, he (Mr. Hutchison) invited the members of the House to go into another room, and they accordingly went there. He then asked whether it was not proper that the House should be informed of the resolution come to and confirmed by the Joint Committee, which traversed, as it appeared to him, the resolutions previously come to by the House this session. The Premier objected, and said, "If I leave, and Mr. McGowan goes with me, you will not have a quorum." That was perfectly true; and they accordingly went out, and left no quorum. He then directed the clerk to summon another meeting for the next day, leaving the issue of the cards, in the ordinary course, to the clerk, and he had no doubt the clerk had done all that was proper. Such was the position, and it was only right the House should know what was being done.

Mr. G. Hutchison

Mr. MCGOWAN wished to make a personal explanation, as the honourable member for Patea had said his (Mr. McGowan's) statement was incorrect. He merely wished to say that the honourable gentleman was in error, and ingeniously inaccurate.

Mr. ALLEN agreed with the Premier that the action taken by the Joint House Committee was businesslike, and could not possibly result in any loss to the House Committee, more especially as he believed the House would next session rescind the resolution which was carried in the early part of this session. He agreed with the amendment which the Premier moved this afternoon, and he thought for one or two reasons this matter should be referred back to the House Committee for further consideration. In the first place, it seemed that the record was not quite correct. Surely, if the record of the Committee was not correct, it ought to be referred back to the Committee in order that it might be corrected. He agreed with the Premier also for this reason: that it seemed to have been a hole-and-corner meeting, and he was afraid his honourable friend was like the proverbial fly which had been caught by the wiles of the spider. He was not quite so "fly" as the Premier was the other day, and consequently had been caught. He thought there were very good reasons why the report should be referred back to the Committee, and he hoped the House would agree to the amendment moved by the Premier.

Mr. CROWTHER said this was a go-as-you-please debate. Debates of this kind were very educating to the young members. As far as Bellamy's was concerned, they had been told that if they consented to Bellamy's being allowed to remain open this session the contents of the cellar could be consumed, and no loss would be sustained; that if they did not sell the stores great loss would be sustained, which the House could not afford. Now, however, they were told that if they ordered a large stock for next session, and if after all it were not required, it would all be sold, and no loss would be sustained. How convenient it was to meet circumstances as they arose! He had no objection to Bellamy's remaining open, and he took no objection to the report, but, still, he thought there was one feature in it that deserved consideration. The House had no right to assume that the House Committee of this House were the only people in the colony who were able to import whiskey fit to drink. That really was the inference. Surely, if the House Committee wanted liquor for the supply of Bellamy's, it could be bought in the colony, and they had no right to assume that they were the only people able to import it. They need not spend the whole time of the House in discussing this matter. All that was required for Bellamy's could be got in the country without importing it.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON wished to ask the Premier if he would accept an addition to the amendment—if the report were referred back to the Committee to add these words: "but no order for alcoholic liquors be in the meantime given." If it were not accepted, he presumed he could move it as a further amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman could move those words as an addition to the amendment that certain words be added to the word "That" of the original question.

Mr. SEDDON said that it looked like the device of an old spider. He had escaped being caught by a young one, and must give the seeming proposed entanglement a wide berth.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON had listened to the long speech of the Premier, but it all amounted to this: that he was the instigator and mover of the motion passed by the Joint House Committee to send Home for a further supply of alcoholic liquors. He thought there could be no question about that, and he was very sorry to know the honourable gentleman had done so. He said in the most friendly spirit that, looking at the resolution of the House in the early part of the session, and the tendency of public opinion, it was altogether unfortunate that the Premier should have taken up such a position. He told them that if they shut up Bellamy's they could dispose of these supplies and get the money back again, and that, the honourable gentleman said, was quite a businesslike way of looking at it. It was quite the reverse. Would any merchant send Home an order for goods that he would not be sure to dispose of in the ordinary way, but might be forced to sell by auction or in some other exceptional manner? The true business method was to wait until they saw whether they could accomplish the shutting-up of Bellamy's or not. If it was to be kept open they could at least get drink that would not be so very much worse than the drink that would be imported by the House Committee; and it would not be quite a bad thing to encourage their own trade and commerce to the extent of buying these supplies in the colony. The whole question was, whether they should have Bellamy's continued or not, and he would test the feeling of the House upon the addition he had proposed to the Premier's amendment.

Mr. TANNER said that during the whole of this discussion, and during the discussion on previous occasions in the present session, there appeared to be, on the part of a large number of members, a supreme disregard of the rights which undoubtedly belonged to another Chamber. He considered the present gathering of members to be more advanced on the particular line of temperance than the one that sat there during the previous three years; but he could not help pointing out that the continued discussion on this subject—this was the third time this session—was not calculated to enhance that feeling of respect that ought properly to be entertained in the country for members of both Houses. Bellamy's was assuredly a dying institution, and it was not consistent with the dignity of that House to waste time in repeated discussions over it. But, aside from that, he regretted the disposition to ignore others who had a right to be consulted, which was being manifested by a considerable section of members of the House. He did not know whether that was intended to be incorporated as an article of faith in the creed of the New Liberalism. If it were, he utterly dissented from it. This was the third occasion this session on which a number of gentlemen in that House had undoubtedly attempted to arrogate to themselves the functions which belonged to both Houses. That was the point on which he wished to insist. The Second Chamber was not to him the most cherished institution in the world, but it was a Chamber with nearly co-equal powers and rights with the Lower House, and the decision arrived at earlier this session was come to, he believed, under a misapprehension as to the powers of the House of Representatives. He believed a large number of new members assumed that the institution known as Bellamy's was entirely under the control of that House alone, and they certainly acted as they had done under that impression. He did not care in which way the question might be settled, so long as the rights of the other branch of the Legislature were not infringed, and all the parties interested were duly consulted. The question ought to be settled by a vote of both Chambers, and he did not think any person could object to that. The very best solution of the matter was a notice of amendment which stood in his name—that the opinion of the whole of the members of the Legislature ought to be taken on the subject.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said the honourable member who had just sat down spoke of the rights of the other Chamber; but they had to consider that they had certain rights in that House. In the early part of the session the House passed a resolution which was deliberately ignored for the time being by the House Committee, and the Steward was allowed to continue selling liquor after that resolution was carried. The honourable member for Avon had said that they were attempting to arrogate to themselves certain functions that belonged to the other House. Now, they had no right to constitute a special licensing district for the benefit of the legislators of the country. If members wanted liquor, let them go out to the ordinary licensed houses and procure it. It was time these privileges should be clipped, and in that House there was a general feeling that Bellamy's was not required. When the report of the House Committee was read, he for one was exceedingly sorry that the Premier had moved the motion referred to in the report. He had come to think that the Premier had some sympathy and feeling in favour of temperance reform; he had come to think that the honourable gentleman's sympathies with the temperance party were genuine; but when he found that in a Committee of that House the Premier was the one who moved that a continued supply of liquor should be obtained, his belief in that honourable gentleman was again threatened. In the early part of the session a vote was passed to close Bellamy's. That vote was afterwards rescinded, because they were told the Steward had got in a large stock of liquor, and that if Bellamy's were closed there would be a large loss incurred: the House, in view of these circumstances, agreed to rescind that resolution. If there was a desire for Parliament Buildings to continue as a special licensing district the House should take a vote on the question, and if the vote were taken in that House as to whether Bellamy's should be open next session or not that vote would go in favour of closing Bellamy's by a very large majority. Let that vote be either an open vote or a vote by ballot; he was not particular which way. It was time now that this question should be dealt with by the House, and dealt with definitely. They had had it before them on two or three occasions, and if they were not careful they would be landed in the same place as they were at the beginning of this session. He hoped the report would be referred back to the Committee, with the addition proposed by the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison).

Mr. MILLS said the honourable member for Christchurch City seemed to overlook the fact that the circumstances of that House were very special when he spoke of this being a special licensing district. Was there any other House or club whose members had to remain in harness from the time they started in the evening at half-past seven until four or five o'clock the next morning, and sometimes later? Of course some people liked tea, but there were others who preferred a glass of beer, and honourable members should be allowed to have any kind of refreshment they pleased. Some members, he knew, liked sherry in their soup, and it was perfectly right for them to have it if they enjoyed it. They should not overlook the fact brought under their notice by the honourable member for Avon. The members of the Legislative Council had just as much right to give their voices in this matter as the members of the House of Representatives, and if a poll was to be taken it should be taken at the end of the present, not at the beginning of a new, session. There were a great number of members who came away from their homes for three or four months, and he ventured to say there was not a member who would not extend the right hand of hospitality to any one who came to visit him, and he ought therefore to be in such a position that he could ask his friends to accept a cup of tea, a glass of wine, or anything else which was to be procured when they came here. It was unfair and most ungenerous for some members to persist in saying, "You shall not take this, and you shall not take that." No one said, "You shall not take a cup of tea"; and why should they insist on saying that people were not to take something else which they preferred to tea? Let everybody take what he most enjoyed, and had most inclination for, in the way of refreshment.

Mr. G. J. Smith

Mr. PIRANI said it seemed to him that a great many members of that House were using "the other place" as a stalking-horse. It was ridiculous to say that members of the other place, who sat there for two or perhaps four hours a day at the utmost, were being deprived of some enormous privilege by the closing of Bellamy's. He thought that such misplaced ideas should be dissipated. They should recognise and admit that those members who supported the continuance of Bellamy's in that House wanted to use it for their own purposes. If they were anxious to retain it they should say so, and not say it was kept there for the members of the Legislative Council. The honourable member for Avon told them that the new members of the House were not aware that Bellamy's was under the control of the other branch of the Legislature as well as that House. It seemed to him the honourable gentleman was not aware that if that House did not pass a resolution in favour of the continuance of Bellamy's it had no legal existence, and that liquor ought not to be sold there. He was sorry indeed that this matter should come up in this way, or that there should be any irregularity; but if there was any fault to be found he thought it was the Premier's in not having this resolution reported to the House directly it was carried by the Joint House Committee. It was not many months since the Premier told them in the House that they should pass a vote before the end of the session directing the Custodian not to give any orders for supplies for Bellamy's next year, if there was a desire that Bellamy's should be discontinued. If a resolution was passed in Committee authorising these orders, and the House was not to know until the orders were sent away, how could they prevent the orders from being sent Home for the supplies? The House should take a straight issue as to whether Bellamy's should be continued or not. If members of the Legislative Council wanted to have a Bellamy's of their own, let them have it, and joy go with them; but as long as the House of Representatives was against it the members should not countenance any evasion of its wishes.

Mr. DUTHIE quite sympathized with the object of the Premier, but the House having resolved to only keep Bellamy's open for one year, he thought the motion passed in Committee ought to have been brought before the House for discussion, and he did not think the Premier was justified in committing the House, by acting on the Premier's Committee motion, before bringing the question before the House for consideration. There was a marked inconsistency in the action of the Premier in moving the motion referred to, so committing the House to the continuance of Bellamy's, while early in the session he led the House in agreeing to keep it open this session only.

Mr. SEDDON.—I am not the House Committee;—only one of thirteen.

Mr. DUTHIE said the honourable gentleman moved the resolution, and he was speaking of the honourable gentleman's responsibility in moving that resolution, looking to the position in which the question stood in that House.

4.0. The question ought, however, now to be dealt with straightforwardly on the floor of the House, and decided one way or another. It ought to be brought forward by a direct resolution, and the question settled once and for all.

Motion, That the report do lie on the table, negatived.

On the question, That the report be referred back to the Committee for reconsideration,

Mr. W. HUTCHISON moved, That the following words be added: "with an intimation that no order for alcoholic liquors be in the meantime given."

Mr. SEDDON desired to take the opportunity of putting his position clearly before the House. If he were a member of a Committee he was entitled to use his discretion on that Committee, and he was not one of those who did things clandestinely. It would have been quite easy for him to have suggested to some other member to move this motion, and then to have voted for it; but he preferred to take the responsibility, and to act in a straightforward and open manner, rather than go behind the scenes, as some members he could name generally did. He had asked the question on the Committee whether it had been the practice to report to the House when orders were sent Home, and the Steward had said No, it had not, and there never had been an instance, as regarded carrying out details and sending orders, of the matter being reported to the House. He had then stated that in this case he did not see any necessity for reporting it specially to the House. He had said to the Committee at the same time that the orders must not go until the House had dealt with the Licensing Bill, when there would be an indication from the House of what they desired to be done in regard to Bellamy's. The Committee had raised the question, however, that the Licensing Bill might not go through; but he had replied that they would get past the clause in the Bill relating to Bellamy's. He hoped the Licensing Bill would go through, and that would finally settle the question. Then, there was another question. If that were done before the House dispersed the House could pass a resolution, which, as the law at present stood, had to be done at the commencement of each session. This had to be done by both Houses; otherwise there was no power given to the Steward to act at all. It had been asserted with some force that during the first fortnight of this session the Steward was liable to be proceeded against unless he had some permit, even a temporary one, and he had thought it would be necessary to alter the law, so as to enable the Speakers of both Houses to issue a temporary permit until the House had come to a conclusion upon the matter. He would take the whole question on the Licensing Bill: he could not do more than that; and it would be unfair not to give consideration to the members of the Legislative Council. There were thirteen members present at the Committee, four belonging to the House of Representatives, two of whom voted for the motion and two against. It was not fair, therefore, to throw the whole responsibility upon him, and that he should have to stand the brunt of adverse criticism in respect to this matter. However, he had very broad shoulders, and he might say that he did not think his intentions were such as to warrant the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. G. J. Smith) in allowing his confidence to be shaken. If he had had the honourable gentleman's confidence he did not know it, but he was sorry, after they had got near the killing of the fatted calf, that the honourable gentleman had sworn off again. He would accept the amendment of the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison); and, when the Committee brought down its report, if it were referred back to the Committee, the honourable member could move again. He wished to take this opportunity to say that the reason the House Committee had reported this matter—a thing they had never done before—was that the House had passed a resolution taking away from the Recess Committee the power they had hitherto possessed. The honourable member for Patea had had this power during the whole of the recess: to use a colonialism, he had "bossed the show." That power had been taken away, and the buildings, grounds, et cetera, were now vested in the Government during the recess. That was what had caused umbrage on the part of the honourable member against the Government, and against the Premier, who had moved the resolution. He (Mr. Seddon) desired to work with the Legislative Council, and to do what was fair and reasonable, and, because that was the case, this motion had been brought forward and another afternoon had been wasted. He, however, intended to defend himself, and to put himself clear before the House and the country.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON asked if he could amend his motion.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman had already moved one amendment, and he could not allow him to move a further one, which would mean giving the honourable member the privilege of not only moving two amendments but also of making two speeches on the same subject.

Mr. EARNSHAW said it was quite evident that the amendment of the honourable gentleman might bear a different interpretation from what was intended; and in that respect the House should be very careful. The Premier had, when the House met this session, taken up the position that Bellamy's should be allowed to continue for this year; but he did not think that the opportunity the honourable gentleman said would be given on the Licensing Bill to discuss the question of Bellamy's would be afforded. Some seven weeks ago he (Mr. Earnshaw) had stated that they would not have the Licensing Bill this year, and that opinion he still held.

Mr. SEDDON said perhaps the honourable gentleman would alter his opinion by the following Saturday morning.

Mr. EARNSHAW said he did not alter his opinions, but always stuck to them. With regard to the sale of liquor at Bellamy's, the opinion he had expressed to the House had always been that they did not need that institution. He understood that this session Bellamy's was making a great loss on account of the members having been so very temperate. If the Premier had control during the recess, then there were ample supplies on hand for those members who chose to take liquor there during next session. The present moment was a most opportune one for the House to come to a decision as to whether liquor should be kept at Bellamy's next year or not. If the question were left over from this session, or after the report came back, he doubted very much whether the House would have the opportunity of coming to a conclusion; and if the House were wise it would embrace the opportunity it had at hand rather than the opportunity the honourable gentleman promised, because he made promises that he did not carry out. He thought the country was looking to the House to give some clear expression of opinion regarding Bellamy's. It was one of the many questions that arose at the last election, and he failed to see why members should deal differently with themselves from what they did with people outside. If they wanted liquor for members, and if they could carry on their business better with liquor than without liquor, then let it be so. But he thought that Bellamy's had been no advantage in carrying on legislation during the current session. The Premier himself could not say but that it had been a great barrier to carrying legislation through this session, and on that ground he thought the House ought to speak straight out, without making a stalking-horse of the Legislative Council, and making the Councillors bear a burden that the members of the House of Representatives should bear themselves. If they did not decide the matter this session, Bellamy's would be open next session; and the House should come to a definite decision whether liquor should be sold there or not. He trusted the House would permit the honourable member for Dunedin City to amend his motion, if it were necessary, if it did not carry the interpretation the honourable gentleman wished to convey.

Mr. THOMPSON thought this question was one that should be left to a Joint Committee of both Houses to settle, as the members of another place had just as much right to be consulted as the members of the House. It was a pity that such a subject should be brought up, and that a whole afternoon should be wasted in discussing it. He also considered it a pity that those honourable members who so often trotted out this question of Bellamy's should be so often found in Bellamy's, and he would suggest that they should in future keep away from a place where they were so often found enjoying themselves. He hoped this matter would be left entirely to the House Committee, and that they would have no more afternoons wasted this session.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON desired to say one or two words in reply to the Premier, who had again been drawing upon his imagination when suggesting that the motive for the report was that he (Mr. Hutchison) was disappointed at there being no Recess Committee. He had no reason to suppose that he should take any particular part in any Recess Committee that might have been appointed. The friction that occurred during the last recess between the Recess House Committee and the Premier had arisen entirely from the fact that the Premier had interfered with the appointment of charwomen employed in the Parliament Buildings: not that such appointments were matters that the House Committee claimed any authority or took any particular interest in, such things having been always left to the Serjeant-at-Arms. The subject had come before the House Recess Committee in the way of a report that the Premier had interfered with the employment of the charwomen who, in the ordinary course, were kept on during the recess. The Premier had discharged one of them so as to make room for some one else.

Mr. SEDDON said he was not alluding to that, but to the friction concerning the grounds.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said, nothing of the sort; the resolution last session left no doubt as to the grounds being left to the control of the Public Works Department.

Mr. SEDDON.—What about stopping the cutting-down of the trees?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said, Yes, the Recess Committee had remonstrated with the Premier for cutting down some of the trees in front of the building, and had got a promise from him, when a few only were left, that they should not be cut down—which promise, however, had not been kept. It was the question of charwomen which was really the burning question during the recess, because, having acquired the knowledge through the Custodian that the immemorial prerogative of the Serjeant-at-Arms had been invaded by the Premier, he (Mr. Hutchison) had, at one of his meetings in Hawera, taken occasion to refer to the increasing way the Premier interfered with everything, from the courtesy due to His Excellency the Governor down to the selection of charwomen. The Premier afterwards had taken occasion to go there and assert that his statement had not been correct, when, as a matter of fact, it was correct. He believed there had been only two meetings of the Committee during last recess, and very little had been done; so that any suggestion that he (Mr. Hutchison) felt hurt at no Recess Committee being intended to be set up for next recess was palpably absurd. As to the amendment of the Premier, he supposed that if the House did not insist upon the report of the House Committee being brought down at a definite date they would have no report at all, because throughout the effort of the Premier had been to prevent the resolution as to ordering supplies for Bellamy's from coming before the House. The Premier had objected to the Joint Committee having leave to report; and had left the House Committee without a quorum on the following day, so that no report could be made by that Committee either; and no doubt, if the Premier had not forgotten or overlooked the meeting that had been held that day, he would have been at it for the purpose of objecting to this report coming down.

Mr. Speaker

Mr. J. W. KELLY moved to add to the amendment, "and that the House Committee be requested to report on the matter not later than this day week."

Mr. SEDDON said he would accept the amendment of the honourable gentleman. He deprecated very much the waste of time that had taken place; but who was responsible for it? The honourable member for Patea. There was no doubt the honourable member had taken umbrage at the Joint House Committee saying that the buildings must be under the control of the Government. There was no doubt that was the reason he had moved in this matter, for he had mentioned it himself, and he knew the honourable member so well that he knew what was moving him. The honourable member for Patea desired to pose for the time being as a temperance reformer. Well, he made a present of him to the temperance reformers; but he would do more harm than good to their cause, as he did to every cause he espoused. The honourable member said there was no cause of friction except the question of the charwomen, and he had taken the trouble to refer to that. Now, he would tell the House and the country that, seeing the House had placed the responsibility for the estimates of the department on the Government, the Premier did not consider it derogatory to his dignity or to the dignity of his position, and to what belonged to the position, to act in the case of poor women who were homeless—widows with children, absolutely wanting for bread; whilst there were employed in the building women whose husbands were in the public service getting £3 a week, who had houses and other property. The Premier did not consider it was beneath the dignity of his position to say that it was time these women, who were in good positions and well off, should be retired, and those widows who were in want, and who had five or six children to support, should be given an opportunity to maintain their children. He took the responsibility for that, though he might be held up by the honourable member for Hawera as a most undesirable person for having done it; and, as the honourable member had made that statement at Hawera, he (Mr. Seddon) had taken the opportunity to take the people there into his confidence and to point out that the honourable member had made a mistake. When clergymen in Wellington came to him and pointed out that this was the state of matters, and that there were families in that condition,—and as at that time there were no Parliamentary officers empowered to act,—and the House having cast the responsibility upon the Government, he (the Premier), being the Minister in charge of the Legislative Department expenditure, in doing what he had done had simply done what was right; and, what was more, would be prepared to do it again. Then, during the coming recess, there would have to be alterations made in the building. If there was a Recess Committee, with the honourable gentleman as Chairman, what would be the result? The Minister for Public Works would give instructions to alter the gallery. The Legislative Councillors complained that they could not hear where they sat, and they wanted to go back to their old gallery. The House Committee had left this matter to the Government, and it was his intention to make the alterations in the gallery. For many years the Legislative Councillors had had that gallery. The change had been made without consulting them, and they desired to have it back. If his honourable friend was Chairman of the Recess Committee, the Recess Committee would be resolving in one direction and the Minister for Public Works giving instructions in another direction. The best course, therefore, was to remove the evil, and the root of the evil was his honourable friend the member for Patea. That was the cause of the afternoon being wasted. With regard to the trees, the honourable member had said he had not kept his word. Now, it was a case of "Woodman, spare that tree!" He was asked to spare the macrocarpa—the large tree on the rise—and he had spared it, as honourable members could see; for some of the lower limbs had been removed, and then, on learning of the resolution, he had immediately given instructions to stop cutting it down. He did not think the honourable gentleman was right in saying that he had not carried out his promise. Regarding some of the old willows at the lower end of the ground, the very persons who had asked him to retain them decided, when they saw them left by themselves, that they ought to be cut down, but that the macrocarpa should be spared. He thought every one would admit that the alterations had been very good improvements. Now, he did not want to have this conflict. He had never told the House, because he did not care about bringing trivial matters before it. He had given instructions this session to have the old gallery again set apart for the Legislative Council, but the House Committee passed a resolution that it should not be done; and, sooner than have any friction, he had allowed the Committee to have their way. The House Committee had now passed a resolution vesting the building in the Government during the recess, but this did not interfere with the library or anything connected with it. He thought honourable members would understand the position now. With regard to the Committee reporting: When he accepted the honourable gentleman's amendment, it was with the intention that the Committee should meet at once and report upon this question, and he had accepted the proviso that they should report within a week. If there was one thing that should commend itself to honourable members it must be the necessity that there was for dealing with this question of Bellamy's once and for all, so as not to have it brought up again and again on the floor of the House. They could settle it by passing the Licensing Bill, because to settle it they must have an alteration of the law. If one House passed one resolution and the other House another, there would be a conflict; and the proper course would be to deal with the question in the Licensing Bill, and that was the course he asked the House to adopt.

Sir R. STOUT did not think the House would get rid of this question if it simply referred the report back to the Committee. He thought they should have a straight-out vote on the question, and decide it one way or the other. He did not wish to say anything further, because, from the way the question was put, a decision could not now be obtained; but he was certain that if this report came up within a week they would have another afternoon wasted, and the blame would rest with the Premier. They ought to have come to a vote at once, and, if the majority of the House were in favour of ordering supplies for next year, 4.30. then they should let the order go; if they were against it, the order should not go. It should be decided one way or the other, and they should not have this waste of time. In reference to the charwoman, there was a petition before the House, and one was examined. It was quite wrong to say she was a woman of means. She gave evidence before the Committee, and she had been removed for no fault, and the only excuse for her removal was that she had held the position for many years, and ought to make way for some one who had not held it. If this was to be applied to the Civil Service, and if it was to be the reward for doing work well that the person must be removed on the ground that he or she had filled the office for some time, it was a most extraordinary position. He knew there was a very strong feeling amongst the officers who had been removed that political colour had a great deal to do with their removal.

Mr. COLLINS would not have participated in the debate, but, as a member of the Committee to which the honourable gentleman had referred, he must take the opportunity of saying that the Premier's statements were in accordance with facts. The petitioner had proved by her evidence before the Committee that she was possessed of property. She was merely a casual hand who had been engaged from time to time for a number of years.

Mr. Seddon

Major HARRIS said he had attended the Committee, and all the Premier stated was perfectly correct. All that happened at the meeting in reference to Bellamy's seemed to be in a kind of conversational way, and the Premier took part in it with others. If the Premier had not moved what he did, others would have done so. He (Major Harris) had voted against any measures in regard to Bellamy's that had come before the Committee. He was one of two who had voted against the Premier and stated that there was no occasion to order spirits from Home. He understood that a vote of the House was come to some time ago that they were to have no more after this year, and that it would lie with the Speakers of both Houses to give their sanction before Bellamy's was opened again; and he always thought that in face of the resolution passed by the House the Speaker of this House would not give his assent. There was not the slightest necessity to order spirits, at all events not immediately, until they saw what happened towards the end of the session.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council insisting upon its amendments in this Bill, and Mr. Reeves, Mr. Bell, Mr. Tanner, and Mr. Ward were appointed Managers of a Conference in regard to the Bill.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE brought up the following report of the Committee appointed to draw up reasons for disagreeing with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill, and moved, That the report be agreed to, and be transmitted to the Council:—

"Clause 5: The House disagrees with the amendment made by the Legislative Council because it debars the Governor in Council from concluding a purchase without the recommendation of the Board, and is consequently an interference with the public expenditure of the colony; and the House does not deem it necessary to offer any further reason, hoping that the above may be sufficient.

"New clause 8: The proposed amendment altering the words 'in one complete estate' to 'in one block' may lead to estates being cut up into blocks in order to evade the Act. It is desirable to prevent this.

"New proviso to clause 8: The proposed new proviso is ambiguous; it is desirable to clearly define the exact area which may be selected in each class of land.

"Clause 21, new proviso: The House disagrees with the amendment, because it imposes a limitation on the acquisition of land, and thereby interferes with the public expenditure; and the House does not deem it necessary to offer any further reason, hoping that the same may be sufficient.

"Clause 89: The Committee recommends the House not to press its disagreement with the amendment, which, though it may not be strictly regular, does not materially infringe the privileges of the House, and is otherwise unobjectionable. The Committee recommends that the amendment be agreed to, as it appears that the said amendment furthers the intention of the House."

Motion agreed to.

WAR STORES.

IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That this House empowers the Government to enter into a contract or contracts, for a period not exceeding five years, for the supply of ammunition and warlike stores: the contracts for the ammunition to be under the following terms and conditions:—

Any agreement to be made shall be for a term not exceeding five years.

1. That the ammunition shall be manufactured in the Colony of New Zealand, and be supplied from the powder now in the store at Mount Eden, Auckland. One million five hundred thousand (1,500,000) rounds to be delivered before the 31st March, 1896. The number of rounds shall not exceed one million five hundred thousand (1,500,000) Martini-Henry-Boxer ball-cartridges, to be delivered at the rate of eighty thousand (80,000) rounds per month, commencing four months after the date of signing and entering into the contract. The price not to exceed £5 5s. per thousand rounds.

2. That, after the delivery of the aforesaid one million five hundred thousand (1,500,000) rounds, such ammunition as aforesaid shall be supplied to the New Zealand Government, in such quantities and at such times as may be from time to time ordered, for a period not exceeding five years, ending on the 31st March, 1899.

3. That the price to be paid for the ammunition referred to in paragraph 2 shall not exceed £5 5s. per thousand rounds, this being the current War Office price to contractors for similar ammunition in England, with the additional cost for insurance, freight, and charges of delivery at Wellington, and packing same in service-boxes of six hundred (600) rounds, and such other charges as have been previously paid by the Government. Such price shall be ascertained in London on or before April in each year by the Agent-General of New Zealand, in consultation with the Inspector of Warlike Stores or some other officer to be appointed on behalf of the Government of New Zealand, and the company's managing director in London or some other person appointed by or on behalf of the company. That such price as so ascertained shall be, and be taken to be, the price paid for such ammunition during the then ensuing twelve months.

4. That all ammunition aforesaid manufactured by the contractor shall be of quality equal to that which shall be at such times passed for the use of Her Majesty's Government in England. The said ammunition shall be delivered in such quantities and at such times or time as may from time to time be directed by an order, in writing, signed by the officer authorised by the Hon. the Minister of Defence; such goods to be delivered at Auckland, and the rate of delivery not to exceed eighty thousand (80,000) rounds in any one month.

5. That the machinery in use for the manufacture of the ammunition aforesaid shall be only such machinery as shall be of the same class as, and equal to, the machinery used for the like purpose by or for the use of Her Majesty's Government in England. Further, that the contractor will purchase and take the powder required for the ammunition for the New Zealand Government from the Defence Department at the actual cost to the said Government delivered at the Auckland Magazine.

6. That before the Hon. the Minister of Defence shall be required to accept the delivery of any ammunition he shall be entitled to have the same tested by officers and persons appointed by him from time to time for such purpose; and the Government shall not be deemed to have taken final delivery of any instalment of such ammunition to be supplied until the required tests have been carried out and the ammunition finally approved by a certificate in writing to that effect from the officer or persons aforesaid, such tests to be carried out within one month after delivery. All the ammunition to be supplied shall be of equal material and quality, and of the same dimensions and weights, within the usual manufacturing limits, as laid down for the latest marks in use at the date of any particular order in the Imperial Service or of any approved sample. The test of the ammunition to be supplied shall be carried out as directed by the Hon. the Minister of Defence. The Government to bear the expense of tests made in Auckland, except in respect of such tests as result in the rejection of any lot or lots, in which case the contractor shall bear the expense. That, in the case of any ammunition supplied being rejected on account of its being unable to pass the approved tests, and not being replaced with ammunition fulfilling the required tests within a period of three months from the service of the notice on the contractors or their representatives, the Government shall have the right to purchase ammunition elsewhere at the risk of the contractor, and to terminate the contract.

He might say that some years ago the colony had entered into an arrangement with the Auckland Ammunition Company. The establishment of that company had been of great benefit to the colony. Now that the colony had changed from the Snider to the Martini-Henry rifle, it was necessary, he thought, that an opportunity should be given to the company of manufacturing the ammunition that was required. The company wished the colony to enter into a contract with them for a period of five years, and that there should be an immediate order given for a million and a half rounds. They were told by the Government that there was no law which would enable the Government to enter into a contract for five years for the supply of this ammunition. He thought the proper course would be to have a clause in the Public Works Bill giving the Government this power. The Committee on that Bill thought it would not be the proper place for it, but that if they legislated for it at all it ought to be in the Defence Act. On consideration, he thought, under the circumstances, the proper course would be to get the warrant of the House, the same as was done for the San Francisco mail-service, to have it extended over a period of three years. As regarded the policy of doing this, he thought it was a wise thing to do. First of all, they would have employment found for a large number of persons in the colony; secondly, we had, in case of any disturbance arising, within ourselves the means of manufacturing our own ammunition. He might say that the other colonies had entered into contracts with the ammunition company for the manufacture of their Martini-Henry ammunition. The terms on which the contract would be based were, he thought, fair to the colony and just to the contractor, and would prove satisfactory to all parties. They took, of course, power to manufacture the ammunition under such conditions as would not be likely to hamper the contractor. As regarded the price, they had fixed the maximum for the present at £5 5s. per thousand rounds. If there was a reduction in the price at Home, then they would of course regulate this charge by that, plus the charges for freight and other charges. He thought, himself, that, taking the conditions he had laid down in the resolution and comparing them with the contracts made by other colonies, they had an advantage over any other contracts made, and at the same time he thought the company was prepared to contract upon these terms. Upon the strength of the negotiations so far, instructions had been given for the introduction of machinery for the manufacture of this ammunition. He would not give a pledge nor meet the company until he had consulted the House. At the same time he thought it a good thing to do, and he would recommend the adoption of the resolutions, although there was nothing binding or specific. He thought that years ago the company were led to believe that so long as they manufactured ammunition equal to the imported article and at a reasonable price the colony would encourage this very desirable manufacture. He thought it a very desirable thing to do, and he had every confidence that the contract would be carried out to the advantage of the colony.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked, at what price was the powder to be supplied to the contractors?

Mr. SEDDON said the Government bought it at Home in the English market from the best manufacturers. It was considered wisest they should do that, so that the very best powder should be available. There was a lot of powder on hand at the present time. It would be sold to the contractors at the price they paid for it at Home, together with freight and any other charges. There was no loss to the colony upon the powder.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said his inquiry was as to the powder imported some years ago, and now in store at Auckland. Was he to understand that the powder was to be taken by the contractor, and, if so, at what price?

Mr. SEDDON said that, for the moment, he could not state the exact price per pound for the powder, but the Government had got rid of the old powder. The contractors took the powder from them, and it was sold to them at cost price.

Mr. ALLEN thought it would be satisfactory to the Volunteers of the colony if the honourable gentleman could give some further assurance as to the supply of Martini-Henry rifles. He was aware that five hundred rifles had been ordered, and had arrived, but it would be very unsatisfactory to the Volunteers unless a sufficient number of Martini-Henry rifles were obtained for the whole of the Volunteers of the colony. Therefore he thought it advisable that orders for these supplies should be given at once. With regard to the price, he supposed the price set forth in the resolution was the maximum price.

Mr. SEDDON.—Yes.

Mr. ALLEN fancied the price now paid for ammunition was somewhat less than the maximum set forth in the resolution.

Mr. MEREDITH would like to ask a question re ammunition. How were the quality and the price of the locally-made article to be compared with the quality and price of the imported article?

Mr. SEDDON said he would refer to the matter in his reply.

Mr. BUDDO said it was very important they should take great care as to the quality of the ammunition which was supplied to Volunteers. It was, in his opinion, a step in the right direction to establish a local factory. He might say that in the shooting during the intercolonial match of last summer the quality of the ammunition was very good indeed, and it was found to stand on a par with the imported article. It seemed to be a rather long contract for that ammunition: still, they must take into consideration that Captain Whitney had to get the factory put in order, and it would be poor encouragement if they shortened the term of the contract. He did not suppose the machinery could be put up for any shorter contract than five years. He thought the Defence Department were very dilatory indeed in the issue of Martini-Henry rifles. There was great dissatisfaction throughout the colony at this; and, practically, he might say, no encouragement was given to the Volunteer movement. They kept on buying torpedoes and submarine-mining material at great expense: but if any enemy ever came to attack us they would not attack us at the front door; they would try to get in by the back door, and the colony would have then to depend on its Volunteer Force. He hoped that every encouragement would be given to the Volunteer movement, as upon the efficiency of the Volunteers depended in a great measure the safety of the colony generally.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. CROWTHER said it afforded him very great pleasure to support this motion. He knew the district, and he knew Captain Whitney very well. He was enthusiastic and enterprising in this business. He had already got a large factory, and members would see by the sample-case, which had been in the lobby for some time, that he had entered very largely into this business already, and he (Mr. Crowther) was quite certain Captain Whitney meant to follow it out, beyond a doubt. The Government seemed to him to have made the position on behalf of the Government absolutely safe. In the first instance, with regard to the supplying of the powder, they knew that it was to be first class. That would, no doubt, be a guarantee of the quality of the material. Captain Whitney had a large factory, and he was pleased to see the Government were prepared to offer him this encouragement. It was, to his mind, absolutely necessary that they should, with all their strength, knowledge, skill, and money, help every industry of this description.

Major STEWARD said the last speaker had referred to the matter as from the point of view of the local manufacturer. The honourable member for Kaiapoi expressed the opinion that it might be desirable to give a five years' contract, because the proprietor would not be able to buy machinery without having a fixed term of contract. He apprehended, however, the Minister had framed these resolutions pretty much on the recommendation of the Volunteer Conference, which had recommended that there should be a contract for a term of years, not in the interests of the contractor, but because of the desirability of insuring the certainty of obtaining supplies of ammunition for a fixed period. In view of the matters which were transpiring in Europe, that was of great importance. The term asked for was only a reasonable one, and he thought the House would do well to pass the resolutions submitted to it by the Premier.

Major HARRIS said he could bear testimony to the good quality of the ammunition locally manufactured. Some firing had been going on amongst the members of Parliament here in Wellington recently, and not a single cartridge missed fire out of the whole lot.

Mr. WILLIS was much pleased to find the Government alive to the necessity of providing sufficient ammunition to the Volunteers, and he hoped the Government would be as fully alive to the necessity of supplying the Volunteers with Martini-Henry rifles. During something like ten years the Volunteers had been put off from time to time with a promise that these rifles should be supplied to them. It was a standing disgrace that the Volunteers of New Zealand should be in possession of an arm that in any other country in the world, however small, would be regarded as a very inferior article.

He doubted whether the Chinese were not better armed. He believed the number of rifles coming out was only five hundred, and when they came a great deal of jealousy would be created as to how they were served out. It would be far better to keep these five hundred in store until there was a sufficient number, so that the whole of the Volunteers could be supplied together. He was afraid that a good deal of jealousy would be created if particular companies were selected to be armed with the new rifles. In his own district, which had the reputation of being one of the best shooting districts in the colony, it would be very disheartening if other companies, which were perhaps not such good shooting companies, got supplied because they were in more favoured centres. He hoped the Government would at once see that a sufficient number of arms were ordered from England, so that the whole of the Volunteers might be encouraged by the fact of possessing a weapon they were proud to use.

Mr. SEDDON was very much pleased with the manner in which these resolutions had been received. With reference to the question of the honourable member for Bruce, as to when the Government intended to get more Martini-Henry rifles, he hoped to have the approval of his colleagues next day to send Home an order for a thousand more.

HON. MEMBERS.—Not enough.

Mr. SEDDON said it was all very well to say "Not enough"; but they must remember that money was wanted, and when people were waiting to take up land, and could not get on the land, if they spent £10,000 for rifles while people could not get on the land those people would naturally complain. The money would be better spent in making roads. They must be moderate, while at the same time not disheartening the Volunteers. He might inform the House that there were five hundred Martini-Henry rifles here, and, if they sent ten rifles to each of the fifty companies, that would be the best arrangement to make; and when they received the thousand rifles now to be ordered, and gave twenty to each of the fifty companies, then there would be fifty companies armed with the rifle. It was impossible, with the moneys at their disposal, to arm the whole of the Volunteers at once with the Martini rifle, but the Government desired, with the moneys available, to arm them as far as they could. With regard to the question asked by the honourable member for Ashley, as to the price and quality of the ammunition, the price the Government were giving was simply the Home price, plus freight and other charges; consequently they obtained the Home-manufactured article at a less price than the Victorian. In regard to the quality, a number of honourable members had been shooting this session, and he understood that the local ammunition was very reliable as compared with the imported article, and, this being the case, it spoke well for the local ammunition. The Government would insist, of course, on its being equal in quality to the imported article, and if they could get it superior it would be all the better. He might say that the recommendations of the Volunteer Conference in respect to this and other matters would receive the careful attention of the Government, and he would take that opportunity of stating that he was very much pleased indeed to say that the result of the labours of the Conference was gratifying to himself and would be beneficial to the colony. A number of the recommendations of the Conference might be of a confidential character, and it would be perhaps as well not to let the world know everything in respect to their intentions. He would, however, go into the report carefully, and then decide as to publishing the report or not. For that reason it was a moot point whether the result of the Conference should be laid on the table. After the contract was made he would take the earliest opportunity of laying it on the table of the House. Every session they would have returns as to the amount paid and the result of the contract, and these returns would be laid before the House.

Mr. CARNCROSS asked if there was any probability of the new Defence Act being introduced this session.

Mr. SEDDON scarcely thought it would be possible to bring in a Defence Act this session, considering the state of the Order Paper. He had gone through the recommendations of the Volunteer Conference, and it was his intention to frame regulations on the assumption that the law would support them; and afterwards they could bring the law into consonance with the regulations, if necessary.

Resolutions agreed to, and reported to the House and agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

Mr. McNAB said that in Hansard, Volume 85, page 659, his name was not recorded in the division-list on the Criminal Code Bill when he had voted. He had examined the division-sheets, and he would like to say that he had found his name correctly recorded as having voted amongst the "Ayes." This was the third occasion he had found that the division-list had not been correctly copied into Hansard. He thought that if this division-sheet were compared with the list in Hansard the latter would be found to be very incorrect, and Hansard often did not give a correct account of what took place in respect to divisions.

PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 32.—Cases in which compensation not payable.

Mr. PIRANI moved to add to the clause, "Nothing in this section shall apply to reserves within the boundaries of any borough or town, or any portion of a reserve more than three acres in extent."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SEDDON moved to add the words, "Provided that the powers conferred by this section for resumption without compensation shall not apply to any reserve made or endowment granted prior to the passing of 'The Public Works Act, 1876.'"

Mr. Seddon

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SEDDON moved a further proviso, "Provided, however, that the provisions of this subsection shall apply only to public reserves, or land vested in local authority or trustees for any public purpose by grant by the Crown, or under any Act or ordinance of the General Assembly or of any Provincial Government."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. G. J. SMITH moved to add the following proviso: "and provided further that no such reserve, or any part thereof, shall be taken under this Act without the consent of the local authority in whom such reserve is vested being first had and obtained, where such reserve has been pledged as security for any money raised by such local authority."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the proviso proposed to be added be so added."

AYES, 27.

Buick	McGuire	Saunders
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Smith, E. M.
Duthie	McNab	Stout
Earnshaw	Millar	Te Ao
Flatman	Newman	Willis
Hall-Jones	Parata	Wilson.
Heke	Pinkerton	Tellers.
Hutchison, W.	Pirani	Maslin
Lang	Russell, W. R.	Smith, G. J.
Massey

NOES, 27.

Buddo	Larnach	O'Regan
Carnell	Lawry	Reeves
Carroll	Mackintosh	Seddon
Collins	McGowan	Tanner
Hall	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Harris	Meredith	Ward.
Hogg	Mills	Tellers.
Joyce	Mitchelson	Graham
Kelly, J. W.	Morrison	Montgomery.
Kelly, W.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Allen	Stevens
Buchanan	Duncan
Fraser	Carncross
Green	McLachlan
Mackenzie, T.	Cadman.

The CHAIRMAN gave his casting-vote in favour of the "Ayes."

Proviso added.

On the question, "That the clause as amended stand part of the Bill," the clause was negatived on the voices.

Clause 114.—Local authority may agree as to gates on roads taken through private lands by agreement.

Major STEWARD moved to add, "Provided always that permission to erect a swing-gate across any road shall not be granted unless and until after notice of any application in that behalf shall have been given at least once in each of two consecutive weeks in some newspaper circulating in the district; and the cost-of such notices shall be defrayed by the person applying for such permission."

Amendment agreed to, and clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 116.—Regulations as to gates.

Subclause (3).—"Every person leaving any such gate open shall be liable to the person through whose land the road passes, in the same way as if the road were the private property of such last-mentioned person; and every person damaging any such gate or any fence authorised to be erected across any part of a road shall be liable to the person or body authorised to erect such gate or fence, or at whose cost it shall have been agreed that such gate shall be erected and maintained, in like manner, and any such gate or fence shall be deemed to be the property of such last-mentioned person."

Mr. FLATMAN moved, That the subclause be struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words, 'Every person leaving such gate open,' stand part of the subclause."

AYES, 16.

Buddo	McGuire	Stout
Duthie	Mitchelson	Te Ao.
Harris	Newman
Heke	Russell, W. R.	Tellers.
Lang	Saunders	Mackenzie, T.
Massey	Smith, G. J.	Montgomery.

NOES, 35.

Buick	Kelly, J. W.	Parata
Carnell	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Carroll	Mackintosh	Pirani
Collins	Maslin	Reeves
Crowther	McGowan	Seddon
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Graham	McNab	Thompson
Hall	Meredith	Willis.
Hall-Jones	Millar	Tellers.
Hogg	Morrison	Lawry
Hutchison, W.	O'Regan	Mills.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Allen	Stevens
Buchanan	Duncan
Fraser	Carncross
Green	McLachlan
Hutchison, G.	Cadman.

Majority against, 19.

Words struck out.

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the words to "person; and" be struck out.

Amendment agreed to, and remainder of subclause retained.

Clause 167.—Rights - of - way and traffic where railway made along or across road on a level.

"Where a road or street crosses a railway on a level, the public right-of-way at such crossing shall cease whenever any engine or carriage on the railway is approaching and within a distance of a mile from such crossing; and shall at all other times extend only to the right of using such crossing in accordance with the by-laws for the management of railways open for traffic for the time being in force."

Mr. McNAB moved to insert the word "half" before the words "a mile."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word 'half' be inserted."

AYES, 82.

Buchanan	Heke	Saunders
Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Smith, E. M.
Buick	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Carnell	Maslin	Steward
Carroll	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Crowther	Mills	Te Ao
Earnshaw	Montgomery	Willis
Flatman	Parata	Wilson.
Fraser	Pinkerton	Tellers.
Graham	Pirani	Dunoon
Hall-Jones	Russell, G. W.	McNab.

NOES, 21.

Collins	Mackenzie, T.	Russell, W. R.
Hall	Massey	Seddon
Hall-Jones	McGowan	Stout
Hogg	McKenzie, J.	Ward.
Joyce	Meredith	Tellers.
Houston	Millar	McGuire
Kelly, W.	Reeves	Mitchelson.
Lawry

Majority for, 11.

Amendment agreed to.

Word inserted.

Clause 253.—Saving of "The Christchurch District Drainage Act, 1875," and other Acts.

Mr. PIRANI moved, That the following words be added to both subsection (2) and subsection (3): "or to authorise any interference by any County Council with any drains or other works under the control of Boards constituted by the said Acts respectively, without the consent of such Boards."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELSON moved the following new clause:—

"Every Road Board within a county where 'The Counties Act, 1886,' is not in operation, or where the operation thereof is suspended, may from time to time make, alter, or repeal by-laws under 'The Road Boards Act, 1882'—

"(1.) For all or any of the purposes set forth in section three hundred and eleven of 'The Counties Act, 1886':

"(2.) For fixing times during which horses or cattle not in harness or yoke, or sheep, goats, or pigs, may not be driven over any county or district roads lying within three miles from the outer boundaries of any borough or town district, or over certain such roads named in any by-law in that behalf; and any such by-law may be made in respect of any county road, notwithstanding the provisions of any Act whereby the control of such road is vested in the Governor."

Clause added to the Bill.

Mr. WILSON moved the following new clause:—

"Any local body having the control of a ferry may let such ferry for a period not exceeding three years."

Clause added to the Bill.

Mr. BUICK moved the following new clause:
 "Whenever it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Governor that any local authority has not made provision for the payment of compensation which would probably be awarded for land proposed to be taken, the Governor shall not issue the Proclamation taking such land until such time as he is satisfied that the local authority has made provision for the payment of such compensation."

Clause added to the Bill.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved the following new clause:—

"In cases where the making of a railway-line has cut off all access to any land other than Crown land, the Government may make such crossing or crossings as may be necessary to give access to such land."

The Committee divided on the question,
 "That the clause be added to the Bill."

AYES, 25.

Buchanan	Harris	Smith, G. J.
Buick	Heke	Steward
Carnell	Mackenzie, T.	Stout
Collins	Maslin	Te Ao
Crowther	McNab	Wilson.
Flatman	Pinkerton
Graham	Pirani	Tellers.
Hall	Russell, G. W.	Montgomery
Hall-Jones	Russell, W. R.	Newman.

NOES, 23.

Buddo	Lawry	Reeves
Button	Massey	Seddon
Carroll	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Earnshaw	McGuire	Ward
Hogg	McKenzie, J.	Willis.
Houston	Meredith	Tellers.
Joyce	Mills	Duncan
Lang	Mitchelson	Kelly, J. W.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Allen	Stevens
Duthie	Cadman
Green	McLachlan
Hutchison, G.	Morrison.

Majority for, 2.

Clause added to the Bill.

Mr. SEDDON moved the following new clause:—

"Wherever the word 'Minister' appears in Part VI. of this Act the same shall mean either the Minister appointed under the Land Act or the Minister for Public Works, and the word 'Minister' in the said Act may mean either the Minister of Lands or the Minister for Public Works."

The Committee divided on the question,
 "That the clause be read a second time."

AYES, 29.

Buddo	Flatman	Joyce
Buick	Graham	Kelly, J. W.
Carnell	Hall	Maslin
Carroll	Hall-Jones	McGowan
Collins	Harris	McKenzie, J.
Earnshaw	Houston	McNab

Meredith	Pirani	Wilson.
Montgomery	Seddon	Tellers.
O'Regan	Ward	Duncan
Pinkerton	Willis	Hogg.

NOES, 13.

Buchanan	Massey	Te Ao.
Button	Mitchelson
Heke	Newman	Tellers.
Lang	Russell, W. R.	Russell, G. W.
Mackenzie, T.	Stout	Smith, G. J.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
McLachlan	Green
Morrison	Hutchison, G.
Reeves	Crowther
Stevens.	Allen.

Majority for, 16.

New clause read a second time.

Bill reported, with amendments, and read a third time.

The House adjourned at thirteen minutes to one o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Friday, 5th October, 1894.

First Reading—Factories Bill—Horowhenua Post-office—Land for Settlements Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Public Works Bill.

FACTORIES BILL.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART brought up the following reasons for insisting upon certain amendments in the Factories Bill with which the House of Representatives had disagreed, and moved, That the reasons be read, and transmitted to the House of Representatives:—

"REASONS assigned by the Legislative Council for insisting upon their Amendments in the Factories Bill with which the House of Representatives have disagreed.

"Section 20, subsection (c): This amendment is open for further consideration.

"Section 54, paragraph 5: This amendment is open for further consideration. It is suggested that it would be difficult in many cases for the employer to carry out the provision objected to, and to impose a penalty on the employer might lead to injustice.

"Section 54 requires some slight amendment to permit work to be commenced at, say, half-past seven, so that the Saturday half-holiday may be made up.

"Section 56: This amendment was intended to meet the case of industries carried on by means of a family in their own home. It is thought that in such cases children under fourteen might be allowed, with the sanction of the Inspector, to assist during part of the day. It was considered impracticable to make the amendment more definite, but this is open for further consideration.

"Section 63: As soon as provision has been made in the Shops and Shop-assistants Bill for the closing of some shops on Saturday, in the event of any other day than Saturday being appointed under that Act, it is open for consideration whether provision should not be made in that Bill for the closing of a shop on the same day as the factory, instead of the closing of the factory on the shop-closing day, when it is not Saturday. In the event of the Shops and Shop-assistants Bill not being passed, this proviso should be struck out.

"Section 63, subsection (c) of subsection (3): This is open for further consideration.

"Section 64: This clause, which gives to all employes in a factory a half-holiday, is considered an increscence on a Bill intended to deal with the working-hours of women and young persons merely. The half-holiday is generally recognised now without any interference of the Legislature, and it is considered that legislation, when unnecessary, would probably be mischievous. It is thought also that the fact that so many exceptions are necessary tends to show that hardship might arise from some other class of factories not being exempted. In addition to all this, it is pointed out that, if legislation is desirable, the Eight Hours Bill is the proper place for a clause of this sort."

Motion agreed to.

HOROWHENUA POST-OFFICE.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG asked the Colonial Secretary, When the petition of Horowhenua residents re the closing of their post-office, referred to the Government by the Public Petitions Committee on Monday last, will be considered by the Government, as the matter is one of urgency? He was quite aware that the Government had their hands full at the present time, with, perhaps, more than they could attend to, but still he trusted they would give this matter their consideration, as it was one of very great urgency, and also for the reason that this post-office had been closed under the most extraordinary circumstances. There had been a post-office in the district for twenty years; and the Postmistress, having decided to leave that part of the district with her family, did so, and took the post-office with her. The department was notified of this fact five months ago, and no action had been taken by it. When the petition was under consideration by the Committee they took the evidence of Mr. Hoggard, Chief Clerk, and he stated it was now intended to close the post-office at Horowhenua, of which there had been no public notification yet, and to open another at Heatherlea, whither the Postmistress had removed. Now, the fact was, there were between fifty and sixty residents at Horowhenua, and it was about five miles by road from that place to the nearest post-office; whereas Heatherlea, the place to which the Postmistress had removed, and where they were going to open the new post-office, was within two and a half miles of a post-office, and there were only three families there, one family of which consisted of one man. The circumstances attending this matter were so unusual that he felt satisfied if the Government were aware of the facts they would not hesitate for one instant about reopening the post-office at Horowhenua, where it had been for such a number of years; and they would hesitate about opening an office to accommodate, in the aggregate, about six people. He did not blame the Government in this matter at all. The matter was reported to the department at the earliest stage, and the department had taken no action. They seemed disposed to allow this particular person to remove this post-office wherever she liked, on the ground that the remuneration was intended to be a sort of pension to her; and yet she would be insulted if she knew that it was intended to be a pension, for she held a run of several thousand acres, and had several thousand sheep on it. Failing to get any satisfaction from the department, the residents, through him, had petitioned the Legislature for some measure of relief. That petition had been referred to the Government for consideration. He was reminded by the Hon. Mr. Swanson that a large number of Natives lived at Horowhenua. That was true. There were three pas there, and the postal officials at Levin, being wholly European and not knowing the Native language, had some difficulty in distributing the correspondence. The matter was one of urgency, and he trusted the Government would take it into consideration and reopen this post-office, so that the people could have the convenience they had enjoyed for so many years, and that they should not be compelled to walk over bad roads, and probably in bad weather, a distance of five miles, in order to post letters or the sheep-papers, which had to be forwarded in accordance with the law.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the honourable gentleman who had asked this question had not been well informed on the subject. It was true a petition had been presented and reported on, as stated in the question, but that report had not been forwarded from the Council yet. His honourable friend was blaming the department unnecessarily, for the department had not received that communication from the Council.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said the department received notice five months ago.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he was speaking from information which had been supplied to him during the day.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

On consideration of reasons by the House of Representatives for disagreeing with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill,

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY thought he should be consulting the wishes of the Council

if he did not waste time by going into reasons for or against the amendments. There was one reason, however, upon which probably there might be a difference of opinion as between the two Speakers, and the better course would be, he thought, to move formally that the Council do not insist upon their amendments made in the Bill, but refer it to a Conference with the other House. The question could then be debated free from the important question to which he had referred. The question of privilege which had been raised in another place might not be raised then. Therefore he would formally move, That the Council does not insist on its amendments, with the view to a Conference being held.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS doubted whether the course proposed by the Attorney-General was the best one, as the fact was that the Conference was desired by those who had been instrumental in making the amendments. The only point he was in doubt about was whether the Hon. Sir Patrick Buckley's motion would carry out that intention. Whether the Council would say that it would not insist upon its amendments, with the view of having the question referred to a Conference, was a matter which he presumed the Council must determine. If the Hon. Sir Patrick Buckley had simply moved that the Council do not insist on its amendments, an amendment to the motion could have been moved.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—That is what I meant.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS desired to move, as an amendment, That the Council do insist on its amendments, and that a Committee be appointed for the purpose of preparing reasons for so insisting. For the information of honourable members he might say that there was really no question of any importance, except that of getting a Conference so that the differences between the Houses might be settled.

The Hon. the SPEAKER understood the honourable gentleman would be guided by the result of the Council's decision upon this question.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said he would move, as an amendment to the motion of the Attorney-General, That the Council do insist on its amendments, and that a Committee be appointed. He thought that would be in order.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the motion should be put first in the way he had moved it, and then the Hon. Mr. Stevens's amendment could be moved, and if that amendment were carried the result would be a Conference. The honourable gentleman could then move for his Committee, and not before.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said that was the course generally adopted. If the motion, "That the Council do not insist on its amendments," was negatived, the honourable gentleman would be at liberty to propose a Committee, whether his amendment were put or not. The question would be put in the usual way, and those who wished to vote with the Hon. Sir Patrick Buckley would say "Aye," and those who wished to vote to the contrary would say "No."

Question put, "That the Council does not insist on its amendments in the Land for Settlements Bill."

Motion negatived; and a Committee, consisting of the Hon. W. Downie Stewart, the Hon. Mr. Bowen, and the Hon. Mr. Stevens, appointed to prepare reasons for insisting on the amendments made by the Council in the Bill.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Sir, what appears to most people remarkable about this measure is the suddenness with which it has been brought before the public in its present shape, without giving sufficient time for public inquiry, or for public opinion to be expressed upon the scheme now brought before us. Whatever the scheme might have been which was vaguely suggested at the time of the elections, the Bill as presented in another place was one practically for unlimited borrowing. There was no limit whatever to the number of years during which money might be borrowed, to the extent of one million and a half each year. It is true the House of Representatives has nominally limited the power of borrowing to two years; but, at the same time, any one who thinks out the consequences which must follow action taken under the Bill as it now stands will see that practically the scheme is one for unlimited borrowing. If we take a period of ten years—that would not be a very long period, according to the views of the promoters of the Bill—at the end of that time we should have sanctioned an amount of borrowing which, proportionately to population, would entail a burden equivalent to the burden of the National Debt upon the people of England. Of course it has been said that, as in the case of loans for public works and other purposes, there would be an immediate return to meet the interest on these loans; but, Sir, there is an enormous commercial risk and an enormous commercial responsibility incurred by the country in undertaking such business as this, and I say that in taking such a risk we are initiating so absolutely new a procedure that the country should be consulted before it becomes law. My honourable friend Mr. Stevens, in speaking yesterday, pointed out that this was not a scheme like the French Crédit Foncier system, or any other system hitherto adopted. Truly, it has been said that the money lent in France and in Germany and elsewhere is lent under the sanction of the Government. Yes, the Government has given a charter to the Crédit Foncier as well as to the Crédit Mobilier, but that has not prevented both those institutions from making very great losses, which have not fallen on the Government, but on their shareholders. There has been a very severe loss in the case of both those institutions, especially in that of the Crédit Mobilier, and the shareholders, and not the taxpayers of France, have suffered by these losses. That makes a very great distinction between the system of advances on land in France and that now proposed. It has been said, too, that this is a case somewhat parallel to the lending of money in England to landowners for the purposes of drainage. But that, again, is a totally different thing. In that case advances were made in order to promote the benefit of the country, and to carry out certain work which was in the interests of all, but which in many cases could not be carried out by the landowners, who often had only a life-interest in their properties, which were burdened by family charges, and were in many cases heavily mortgaged. The consent of the mortgagees was obtained to permit these loans that were to be made by the State in order to do what it was considered would benefit the country. That was a totally different thing from the proposal to find money on exceptional conditions, as in this case. The amount to be lent in that case was nothing like half of the value of the property. The money was all to be repaid within twenty-five years, and entailed annual payments by the borrower of 7 per cent.; and this in a country where the State borrowed at 3 per cent. I only make these remarks to show that this is a totally new departure, and I do not know of any precedent for such a scheme. It is said by some of the New Liberals that it is our duty in this colony to show the world how to do everything; and we are doing our best in the assumption of that rôle. I am afraid that in many of our new departures we shall make a very ugly exhibition of ourselves. The Hon. Mr. Stevens pointed out one thing that struck me more than anything else in what he said. He pointed out—what has not been so much dwelt upon before—the want of equity in this matter, seeing that such a very large burden was put on the taxpayer at large for the benefit of a very small part of the population. Legislation should be for the relief of the taxpayers generally, and not for the commercial relief of individuals who want the State to give them money cheaper than others can get it. We all should like to get cheap money, and it would be a very good thing, no doubt, for the country, but the pith of the question is, whether the Government are able to make money cheap, and whether any action of this Legislature can interfere with or alter the value of money. I say it cannot, and it is an utter fallacy to suppose it can. Even in the very centre of the money-market of the world—that is, London—I question if the Government could do anything to lessen the value of money, and to make money cheap. It has been said that they can do so, because they have lowered the rate of interest on the public debt by the conversion of the Consols in England. That is a fact; but the conversion became possible because money had become cheaper in England, and it was by the force of economical circumstances that money had become cheaper. The price of Consols had risen to such an extent that it was evident that the Government were paying too high a rate of interest. The public credit had improved, money could be borrowed at a lesser rate, and therefore Mr. Goschen was able to convert. No doubt the success of the conversion of Consols has led to a reduction of interest generally, because it was a proof that money had become cheaper. But money cannot be made cheaper by Act of Parliament; and, if it cannot be done in London, does any one suppose that in a young country like this, which has no accumulated capital, which has been borrowing money for every purpose—can one suppose that we can stem the ebb or flow of the commercial tide; that our little broom can sweep back the waves of the Atlantic? This Bill will do more to raise the price of money than to decrease it in New Zealand, because we cannot undertake a system of borrowing, and raise for that purpose large sums of money in the London market, whether directly or indirectly, without affecting the whole of our securities. It has been said that the whole of our securities are at an abnormally high price now. That is because we stopped borrowing, because we proclaimed that we intended to adhere to this policy; and when it was understood in England that New Zealand had stopped borrowing, and had announced its intention not to borrow for a long time to come, the value of our securities went up at once. If, however, we issue debentures and float paper to the extent of many millions for the purpose of lending money, is it to be supposed for a moment that our securities will remain at their present high price? We shall not be able to borrow money year by year at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or anything like it; I am perfectly satisfied that this system will bring down our securities, and will therefore increase the price of money. It is only by means of competition that money becomes cheaper. There is no other way of cheapening it. How is it that money has come down in this country from 10 per cent., which many of us will remember was the price not so very long ago, to 6 per cent.? It has come down in consequence of competition, and because it has been found possible to import foreign capital. There is a great deal of foreign capital competing for good securities, and so in this way the price of money is brought down to the lowest rate at which it will pay to send it to the colony and incur the risks of business. There are men of high standing and credit interested in this business in London who can borrow money there just as cheaply as, or perhaps more cheaply than, this colony will be able to borrow it for this purpose. Therefore this scheme will not cheapen money, but will place the burden and responsibility of commercial business on the Government, without doing any good to the people of the country. So far as it goes, it will tend to lessen competition, and thus raise the rate of interest to all outside the favoured borrowers from the State. It may be that to promote a system such as this will gain a certain support for a time. There was a remark made by the Hon. Mr. Rigg on this head which I wish to refer to. He said that this was a great step in State socialism, and that he highly approved of State socialism, and he also approved of paper money, which the honourable gentleman said was only a sort of accommodation, and that if we had paper money we could pay all our debts.

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—Not all our debts; but we could assist the farmers without going on the London market.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—I think, if the honourable gentleman would pay as much attention to the history of what has been attempted in different countries with paper money, and of what has been the result of those attempts, as he pays to those curious and interesting dreams of an advanced State socialism in the future, he would find that all experience proves that paper money leads to ruin and repudiation. However, it is not necessary to discuss the question of paper money now. I will only say, in reference to all these schemes of so-called State socialism,—schemes for making the Government undertake what it is the business of individuals or of societies to undertake,—that all these schemes are tending towards a system of slavery, and nothing else—a system under which every individual interest and every social interest will be hampered, where freedom will be unknown, and by which all men will be brought to one level, the level of slaves. It is strange that so often vehement democratic agitators have leant on the one hand towards autocracy and on the other towards slavery. There was a curious instance some two hundred years ago of the latter tendency. That celebrated and fierce Republican, Fletcher of Saltoun, a man who was very stern and dour in defending his own liberty, while taking, I think, very little care for the liberty of others, or even for their lives, proposed deliberately, in order to get rid of the vagrants in Scotland, who, perhaps, numbered two hundred thousand, that they should be distributed amongst the different landowners in proportion to the extent of their estates—not as slaves—he would make the use of the word “slave” penal—but they were to be servants of the landowners, to be subject to compulsory labour, to be hereditary servants; and the owner of the land might alienate the services of their children—that is, sell them. That was the scheme of a man of very advanced ideas in his time. The honourable gentleman, as I understood him, said that the money which was liberated from mortgages by advances under this Bill would go into manufactures.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—Either one of two things. Either it would be invested in some form of industrial enterprise or it would leave the colony.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—I do not think any of that money would be devoted to manufactures in New Zealand at present. Manufactures and all industrial pursuits have been pretty well fettered and handicapped now, and I do not think any one will put money into them. The tendency, unfortunately, is to try to withdraw money so invested. The money will find its way back to England; there is very little doubt about that. I alluded just now to paper money. The Government do not propose, I hope, to go as far as the honourable gentleman would like, but there is a certain instalment of what he wishes in this Bill, because the land-bonds are distinctly a form of paper money; and if there is any system that would be more certain to reduce the value of our securities in London it would be the irregular but gradually increasing supply of these land-bonds finding their way through the banks into the London market without any proclamation of borrowing, or any definite limitation as to quantity or time of issue. I cannot conceive any scheme which would more certainly depreciate our securities. However, I have a good deal of doubt as to how far, if this scheme be tried, those land-bonds could be issued and negotiated. But they are provided for in the Bill, and we must consider what the effect would be if they were relied on as aids to revenue. In any case, the whole question ought to be fairly considered by the country; and I think the Government themselves ought to weigh more carefully the details of their Bill, when they are initiating an absolutely new system, and proposing to plunge the country into such large indebtedness. I am quite sure no members of the Legislature, when they came to Wellington this year, had the least conception that such a large scheme would be put before us. I hope that this question will be relegated now to a later period, and that the country will have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon it.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down said the Government could not make money cheap. I agree with him with regard to that—that the Government cannot make cheap money. That article, like other commodities, is governed by the law of supply and demand. But the Government, representing the colony, can borrow much cheaper than individuals can borrow. The Government in that way can certainly make it cheaper for the smaller borrowers in the country: that is, small borrowers can, through the agency of the Government, obtain money at a cheaper rate than they otherwise could get it. That is exactly what has happened with regard to supply and co-operative companies. The small purchasers of goods cannot buy cheaply; but when the small purchasers join together, and form themselves into a society, they can buy at wholesale prices, and distribute the goods in small amounts at nearly wholesale prices. That is, I think, what will be done under this Bill. The Government, acting as the agent of the people, will obtain money in the cheapest market, and supply it to the smaller borrower at a low rate of interest. I do not think it is a matter of any consequence whatever whether it is called State socialism or not. Of course it is a matter of opinion what State socialism is. To some minds, many functions which are now carried on by the Government are State socialism, and, if that is so, this is State socialism also, because it is simply an extension of the functions which the Government at present perform. The only question, to my mind, is whether the measure as it stands will operate for the good of the people of the colony. Of course, that is open to argument. I do not state dogmatically that it will work for the good of the people of the colony. I say that is a subject for the people of the colony to consider. I think, myself, it will do some good if properly administered. It is not altogether new even in this colony. I recollect that some years ago Titokowaru's raid along the west coast of the North Island produced great disorganization and loss to the settlers in the Patea district. After that war was over I had the honour to introduce into the Legislature a Bill to enable £10,000 to be advanced to these settlers in order to reinstate them in something like their former position on their farms. That measure was exactly on these lines. The Government advanced the money to the settlers at a cheaper rate than they could otherwise have obtained it, and were content to be repaid the actual amount. I think the interest at that time was fixed at 5 per cent., with a sinking fund of 2 per cent. The settlers were restored to their farms; the money so advanced was paid off, and not a penny was lost on the transaction.

Hon. Mr. Bowen

An Hon. MEMBER.—A special case.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—It was applied in that case without any loss to the country, and with great advantage to that district. It appears to my mind that cheap money, if it can be got, will be nothing but an advantage to the colony, because cheap money means cheap production. It means a greater expansion of trade in every direction, and therefore it must be a great benefit to the colony. It was said by the Hon. Mr. Stevens that the present is a wrong time to introduce anything of this sort, because it is a time of great depression; and the honourable gentleman instanced the low prices of many of our staple products, such as wheat and other articles of that character. He said there was a loss to the people of the colony of some £400,000, after deducting from it the rise in other products. That may be true; but still he did not give credit for the advantages received from cheap food, so that, even if there was a loss of £400,000 or £600,000 by low prices of exports, the people of the colony reaped the advantage of cheap prices in other parts of the world by buying imported goods cheaper. The loss is therefore made up in that direction. I think the honourable gentleman took rather a gloomy view of the state of affairs in this colony. It may be as he said in the South Island, where they largely depend on the production of wheat and on shipping that article to the Home markets; but that does not apply to the North Island. If the production of wheat is not paying—and I do not see how it can pay the individual or the colony to ship wheat to London and receive then only 2s. a bushel—I think it would be better for the wheat-producers to turn their attention to other industries of a more productive character. Now, with regard to the North Island, I find that in our district—in fact, all down the West Coast—where dairying is in operation, there is no depression whatever. The dairy farmers are in a state of prosperity. We cannot realise the gloomy views which come from the South Island. I will give an instance of what has happened there with regard to dairy factories. I know a case where a co-operative society of farmers was formed two years ago. They furnished no capital; they simply gave their names to a banking institution and got what capital they required at 7 to 8 per cent.; they built a dairy factory, and the result has been that they have received 8d. per gallon for their milk, and have paid off nearly the whole of the borrowed money. Now their factory is free, and they will receive the total results of that industry during the next season, which will probably equal 4d. per gallon. That shows that what the colony was losing on the one hand by the production of wheat it was gaining on the other hand by the dairy industry. That industry therefore should be encouraged as much as possible. In Taranaki alone two hundred thousand pounds' worth of butter was exported last year, and that amount would have been doubled if the roads admitted of the farmers getting their produce to the market readily. In that way there is a great opening for the future of this colony, if proper provision is made for the opening-up of the country by roads. It was said that this was not a time for initiating such a scheme; but we know very well that it is in times of depression, and especially in times of panic, that money ought to be most freely advanced on good security. That is an axiom recognised by all financiers. I think, in the present state of affairs in the colony, these advances, if made by the Government, would be beneficial. Then, the question arises that it will cause a "boom" in the price of land. I do not think it will do anything of the kind. What raises the price of land is a rise in the price of produce. Whenever a high price is got for wool or butter the tendency is for the value of land to rise in the market. Of course, "booms" may bring about an artificial price for land, but that can only last for a short time, and then the depression is greater than ever. But where there is a rise in the price of produce the value of land rises steadily, and will continue to rise within certain bounds. Now, with respect to this dairy industry in Taranaki, I can give another instance of the benefits which have been brought about by it: I need only state that, in consequence of the establishment of this industry, in one district the selling price of land has increased from £1 to £2 per acre. Farmers can get a steady income month by month, and therefore they will give a higher price for the land to extend their operations. The question then arises, To whom should we lend the money? Well, I think it should, in the first place, be almost entirely confined to country properties, because the securities are greater there: the land, with its improvements, cannot be done away with. There may be artificial prices affixed to it at times beyond its real value, but that it would be the business of the valuer to correct. But if the money were largely lent on property of a perishable nature, such as buildings and manufactories, the risk would be greater. To my mind, there would be a very great risk in lending on property such as manufacturing establishments or dwelling-houses, or property of that sort, because such property depreciates immensely; and, with regard to manufactories, the value depends not on the machinery and buildings, but on the ability of the man who has these in charge. One man may make a good profit, and if the business gets into the hands of another man a loss may be incurred. Then, with regard to the money which would be released if the Government competed with private lenders, of course the money so released could be invested on other properties. The Government would have the pick of the best securities; and the private lenders, who are said to be more skilful than Government departments in financial management, could lend on town properties and on second-class securities, or to the larger borrowers. The amount of £1,500,000 is small compared with £30,000,000 already lent on private properties, which amount is constantly increasing. If the colony is to progress, if our waste lands are to be profitably settled in small holdings, money must be found to aid our small hard-working settlers in permanently and profitably establishing homes on lands which are now unproductive.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Sir, I had not the advantage of being present last night and listening to the speech of the Hon. Mr. Stevens, which I very much regret, and perhaps in the very few remarks I shall address to the Council I may repeat something he said; but as my remarks shall be very few indeed I do not think that I shall call on the patience of honourable members to a greater extent than they can afford. It is claimed that this Bill is one of the policy measures of the Government, and that the country was promised at the last general election a scheme for the relief of farmers in the shape of lending them cheap money. That is partly true. Some mention was undoubtedly made by some candidates of such a proposal; but there was nothing more fully stated and nothing more firmly established as the result of the general election than that the country was averse from borrowing. A clear majority of the popular branch of the Legislature was elected as opposed to any scheme for increasing our indebtedness. It is also claimed that this kind of borrowing is not like ordinary borrowing; that borrowing for the purpose of lending the money so borrowed on good security, either freehold or leasehold, cannot be considered to be borrowing in the ordinary sense of the word. The same argument has been used for years past. Ever since the establishment of the public-works scheme in this colony it has been pointed out again and again to the objectors to our large indebtedness that our loans have not been spent, as most loans have been, for the purpose of war and for the purposes of destruction, but that the money has been spent on reproductive works, and therefore there is no danger in increasing our indebtedness. Now, if that were a complete statement of the case, that would to a very great extent be an answer to those who object to our still borrowing. But what is the fact? That we were promised at the initiation of the public-works policy that the railways built by means of the money borrowed would pay for themselves and interest, and that the colony would not be called upon at all, or to a very slight extent, to furnish from revenue the interest on those loans. We know that expectation has proved to be a false one; we know it is entirely fallacious, and that in no one year since the public-works policy was adopted have the railways or other works paid interest. And it is not very difficult to predict a similar fate for the scheme that is before us. The scheme seems to be this: that we should borrow on our credit at Home, at a rate below 4 per cent., probably 3½, or even below, and should advance the money at 5 per cent. to those who may need it, and possibly make a profit for ourselves in aid of revenue. Now, Sir, a margin of 1½ per cent. will surely be insufficient. Lending companies have existed among us for many years, and the rate at which they lend in nearly every case exceeds the rate at which they borrow by more than 1½; and yet what has been their fate? It is a long tale of failure. We have lately seen company after company withdrawing funds from the colony because of want of success. Every one of us could find quite readily the names of companies which have recently become bankrupt through failing in that very business which it is now proposed the colony should undertake; and many others have failed entirely to make such a profit as would justify the establishment of other companies on similar lines. The expenses of administration will not be more than paid by the difference between the borrowing and lending rates, to say nothing of the possibility—nay, the certainty—of losses. There is certainly provision for setting aside 10 per cent. of the interest for an Insurance Fund; but who can believe that 10 per cent. will be sufficient to meet these losses? No person who has any knowledge at all of the history of such businesses in the past in New Zealand will believe that that amount will be adequate. Then, these businesses have been carried on by persons who are far more expert than a Government department can be expected to be. Not only have valuations been obtained by persons to the utmost degree competent; but even in cases of individual lenders who have carefully examined every security which has been offered to them, and which they thought worthy of examination—have examined those securities in every aspect, have visited them personally, and have calculated the prospective values in the neighbourhood—notwithstanding all the care lavished, the result has been very frequently, as all of us know, that the individual lender has lost; and the same loss has also been remarked in the case of lending companies. I know myself a few years ago a friend of mine had to pay several thousands of pounds because, as trustee, he had consented to the lending of a sum of money which was in the hands of himself and his co-trustees. He lent that money, as the Court held, without sufficient examination having been made, although I know personally that no fewer than three well-known valuers had reported in favour of the money being lent, and that the value was quite sufficient. If these are the results of the doings of private lenders in this respect, I would ask, can we hope for any better result from a Government department managing such a concern? We know that Government departments are not managed with the same care and attention, not to say the same knowledge, as private undertakings are. It is also held out to us that the need for this measure is very great—that the farmers are now oppressed by the high rates which prevail. No doubt, in the present condition of the markets for our produce, that is true to some extent. But it is not true as a result of any scarcity of money to be got on good securities in the country. The rate of interest, as every one of us knows full well, has lessened year by year. As was pointed out by the previous speaker, the rate when he came to the colony was 10 per cent.; it went to 8 per cent., which was the established rate of interest allowed by the Courts for years; then it went to 7, then to 6, and it is within my knowledge that money has been borrowed lately as low as $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If it is the tendency, as everybody knows it is, not only in New Zealand, but all over the world, for the price of money to lessen, ought we not to forbear any interference in a matter so dangerous to the State? I have not a doubt myself that in the course of twenty years hence it will be difficult to get even 2 per cent. for money lent. I think no case at all has been made out for the Government interference, and that the colony will be undertaking a very great risk, and I hope the Council will not give its sanction to this proposal. Then, another danger in connection with the scheme is that the Government will gradually become the national creditor. This I regard as a very great danger. I will not mention the political danger of having a Government in power which has almost the lives of the people in their hands, and controls the management of affairs which will arise under the set of circumstances which are contemplated by this Bill, although there is conceivably very considerable danger from that side; but the danger to the State from undertaking such a business as this is that, as it goes on increasing, in the course of years it will establish a number of debtors in the colony amply sufficient to affect elections, and, through elections, legislation. If the debts are not repudiated, which there is a possibility of—if the debts are not repudiated the state of things which will arise in New Zealand will resemble that which arose in Egypt when Pharaoh took advantage of the seasons of scarcity in such a way that the whole of Egypt became his property. Well, Sir, the answer to that, no doubt, will be that if the State owns the property it will be a very proper proceeding, and that the State—as, I understand from the newspaper this morning, the Hon. Mr. Rigg informed the Council—ought to extend its operations in this way, and that an increase of State interference in every department should be encouraged rather than discouraged. Sir, I am glad indeed that the honourable gentleman made the avowal which I understand he did make—namely, that he viewed everything from the standpoint of a State socialist. With that knowledge, we can understand the arguments which in future may be advanced by him. Well, I for my own part am an individualist. I think that the Empire to which we belong has become great because of individualism, because of the free course allowed to personal energies and to individual initiative; and I think it will be a sad day, a day of decadence, when State socialism which is now advocated is adopted as our policy.

Hon. Mr. Kelly

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY. — We all see that this is an exceedingly important Bill. I can understand very well that such an important Bill as this, coming for the first time before Parliament,—though it has been before the country in its essence,—should be received with a considerable amount of caution by both Houses. Before speaking on the Bill, and what I think are the advantages which it holds out, I wish to refer to what my honourable friend Mr. Stevens put before the House yesterday in what appeared to me to be a very carefully prepared speech. Sir, he commenced that speech by showing what an enormous amount Parliament and the Government proposed to raise this year by way of loans, and he added to that the Bank of New Zealand's two millions. Now, I can quite understand that that is a matter that requires to be taken into consideration. But, Sir, that was a necessity to avert a dire calamity. There is no man that I know of who would say that it would have been better to have let the Bank of New Zealand go down than to do as we did. Therefore I think that that should be left out of the calculation of what has been undertaken in the shape of loans, as it was a necessity. But we have the Land for Settlements Bill, £250,000; the Consols Bill, £500,000; possibly £611,000 for the Midland Railway; besides this Bill of £3,000,000. Now, my honourable friend, in order to impress on us the necessity for caution and prudence, drew a very gloomy picture. My honourable friend says, "Hear, hear." Now, I say that, while it is true that caution and prudence are great virtues, pessimism is not a virtue—it is not good; and my honourable friend, I think, has shown a very decided leaning towards pessimism, and I think that is not the best frame of mind for a legislator to approach important questions in. He said that in the wildest days of the colony we were never so rash as this—that formerly we had the world before us, but that we have not got it now; and that it appeared to him that many people think all we have to do is to get money from somewhere, and leave the rest to posterity. I think I am not misrepresenting what the honourable gentleman said. But, Sir, my honourable friend forgets that the huge loans of which he speaks were borrowed in lumps of three, four, and five millions. Does he forget that in our youth, when he says we had so much strength and vigour, we never paid our way? Does he forget that in 1878 the Land Fund of Canterbury and Otago was taken for the colony, and that we never had a surplus except in that year—that we always had deficits—that those deficits were met by Treasury bills—and that in 1879 or 1880 this young and vigorous colony funded one million eight hundred and twenty thousand pounds' worth of deficiency bills and added them to the public debt? Those were the times when we were vigorous and reckless; but we did not meet our engagements by putting on taxation and living economically; and, Sir, when the Administration of 1880 came in there was more borrowing, and at the end of that Administration there was again a deficit. Another Ministry came in in 1884, and at the end of that Administration there was another deficit. Again, the next Ministry—I am not speaking in a party spirit at all, I am merely giving the history of our financial management and condition—the next Ministry, having considered the dangerous position arising from these constant deficits, decided that there should be economy and retrenchment and the necessary taxation, and the consequence was that there was economy and retrenchment, and a very large increase of taxation. That Ministry acted in accordance with the opinion of the people of the colony, who were becoming wiser than they were during the time when the colony was so vigorous and young, and they left the colony in a comparatively good state, financially. Since that time this comparatively old people, who have not the vigour of youth, have always had a surplus; and during the last year, ending on the 31st of March, notwithstanding that we had put £250,000 of the consolidated revenue into the Public Works Fund, we had a surplus of £290,000. That is what has been done in the comparative maturity of age; and I say we are now better able to estimate the errors of the past than we were in the days of our youth, and, if we are now about to bring in this Bill for cheap money, for what we consider to be the advantage of the country, I say we do it in the light of the experience we have gained—experience which, I venture to say, has been very painful to most of the people of the colony, but it is experience we may safely rely upon. Now, my honourable friend pointed out that our position was very different now from what it was in the past, and from what it was two years ago, in 1891; and he thought it was necessary for us to pause, because our exports were decreasing in value. Now, Sir, it is true that the value of our wool has decreased, but it is also true that the quantity we have sent out of the country has increased, and increased enormously. In 1891 we sent out 106,000,000lb.; in 1893 we sent out 109,000,000lb. odd, the difference showing an increase of 3,532,000lb. Does not that increase in quantity show that the colony is progressing? Although we cannot command the world to give the prices for wool that were given formerly, do not those figures show that the colony is sound, that it is stable, and is progressing in its commercial prosperity? You might as well say that America was going down because it only gets two-thirds, or not so much, of the value that it formerly got for the enormous quantity of grain it exports to England. We must not say that the colony is going down, or that the people of the colony should dread a measure that is good in itself, because prices in London are less than they were. I should have expected my honourable friend, when speaking about values having fallen, to have said that though values had fallen the increase in the export had been very considerable, and also to have said that the number of sheep in the colony had increased very largely—by 1,252,000. I should also have wished him to let it go forth to the world—because what he said no doubt will be read, for it was a carefully-prepared speech—I should have liked him to show that the quantity of cattle during the last two years has increased in numbers by 53,000. All these things are evidences of our increasing prosperity, and if we, Sir, had got the same prices for our produce that we obtained some years ago the colony would have been in a most splendid position; and I am only astonished that, notwithstanding the bad harvest in the South, notwithstanding the low price of wool—and not only am I astonished, but thankful beyond measure to know it—the people of the colony have been able to surmount their difficulties, and have been able to go on advancing as we have done during the last three or four years. My honourable friend spoke of a better plan for raising money than this; and here I will come to the merits of the Bill. The honourable gentleman spoke of loan companies, which he stated that our legislation had brought into existence in the year 1885.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I did not say anything about loan companies being brought into existence by the Mortgage Debentures Act. The Act was introduced to facilitate the operations of the loan companies, not to establish them.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I am aware of that, Sir. It was to facilitate the operations of syndicates or companies, and to grant to these companies the value of the Registrar-General's certificate. All these securities were to be registered in his office, and he was to give a certificate concerning those securities after a careful survey, and the companies could then issue debentures in the London or any market. It was never intended to give cheap money. Sir, there were one or two remarks made by the Hon. Mr.

Hon. Mr. Montgomery

Bowen to the effect that this would tend to increase the cost of money and the value of securities in London; but I shall not go into that particular aspect of the question here. I think I have shown by the figures I have quoted that the colony, instead of being in a depressed condition, and not able to look forward to the future with some degree of hope and cheerfulness, is really in a sound position, and its condition is better than ever it was. It is sound because the people are bringing the land of the colony into cultivation; because the dairy industry has been brought into operation during the last few years; and because they have learned the great lesson of thrift, which people only learn when they are hard pressed. Now, the question is, Can we do something to assist the farming industry of this colony—can we help them to the money that is required for carrying on that industry? Can we make their lot less burdensome than it has been in times past? I do not mean to say one word against the people who have lent money. They did just as a farmer who sells his grain and wool does—they got what they could for it. But the whole thing lies in a nutshell. The loan companies cannot lend money to farmers at the same rate of interest as the State can. The State can borrow money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or thereabouts. There is considerable truth in what the Hon. Mr. Bowen said, that if you put a loan on the London market the price may fall somewhat. I grant that; but we shall be able to raise money, in my opinion, at about $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and it is proposed to lend it to farmers at 5 per cent. upon undoubted security. The advances are not to be up to more than two-thirds upon agricultural land, or more than one-half upon town and suburban land; and $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for management, $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for insurance, and $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for mortgage duty will bring it up to 5 per cent. Now, no company can lend at or under 5 per cent. They get their money, very largely, by borrowing on debentures, and they cannot afford to lend at 5 per cent., because they have to borrow at 4 per cent. or upwards, and pay their agents; and, besides that, companies will not send money away from England to foreign countries if they are not almost certain of receiving a considerable advance by way of interest above what they could get in England for it. Government can here borrow at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and if they lend it at 5 per cent. the $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will provide all that may be required for machinery for working the Act. At present money is, I believe, lent at from 6 to 8 per cent., according to the security, and to the amount of money lent. I think probably the average is 7 per cent., because, of course, the small borrowers being numerous in the aggregate, the amount is large. However, I think the average is about 7 per cent. If the farmer gets money at 2 per cent. lower than the rate current with the money-lenders surely it is a gain to him. The fact of the matter is that the gain is this: that the country is borrowing at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and it is lending to its own people, and thus saving the difference between $3\frac{1}{2}$ and 7 per cent. As to whether lending on a two-thirds valuation leaves too much or too little margin, that is a matter which the Committee can consider, but it does not touch the main point. If this money is lent upon good security, which is provided for in the machinery, will it not be a great thing for the country as well as for the farmers themselves? It is on those grounds that I think this is a good measure. It is a good thing that the Government should devise some means by which farmers could get money at a cheaper rate. The Bill has passed the other House, and it has now come here, and it has been met by a resolution that it should be read this day six months. Now, I would submit that, if we are going to throw this Bill out without considering its details at all in Committee, we are simply saying that we object altogether to providing cheap money for the farming community. Sir, I trust that this amendment will not be carried, and I trust the Bill will go to Committee, and will be considered in all its clauses. If there are amendments required, in the wisdom of the Council, then those amendments will be considered; but I trust that the proposition to read the Bill six months hence will not be carried, and I trust that the desire of the people of the colony will not be treated with indifference. My honourable friend Mr. Stevens says that if this loan of three millions is raised those who did not get any of that money would apply for it, and the Government would have to raise more. Well, I think when we have had the experience of the next two years, and we find that the securities obtained are absolutely good, there can be no shadow of doubt even in the minds of those who have given utterance to such dire forebodings that we should be justified in raising even two or three millions more. What we have first to consider is, is the colony safe in lending this money; and is it its desire, in the second place, that the money should be lent? I ask honourable members to read this Bill a second time, in order that it may go into Committee, and that the clauses may there be considered. If it is possible to improve it it will be improved, and I trust we shall not deny the wish of the people, and the wish of the representatives of the people, to have cheaper money for the farmers than they can get in the colony at the present time.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—What may be the result of the discussion on this Bill it is difficult now to foresee, but I do not look upon the Bill with the great amount of suspicion that some honourable members do. I can easily understand how this measure came before us, for it is well known that a large amount of money that has been lent by lending companies has been called up in that portion of the colony where the Colonial Treasurer resides, and that honourable gentleman's connection with business will enable him to know that this is so. I presume he has brought forward this Bill with a view of trying to meet the withdrawal of those moneys, and to replace them by moneys raised in this way, believing that the same withdrawing of money may be going on throughout the colony. So far as this principle of lending by the colony is concerned, it is no new principle that the Government is bringing in. We are lending money now from the Insurance Fund, and we are lending from the Trust Office; and I do not see much in the objection as to this Bill not having been brought before the country properly as a policy measure. The same principle is in existence at the present time, the only difference being that it is proposed to go to London to obtain the money for the use of the farmers. As to whether this is a wise proceeding or not different people have different opinions; but, so far as the Bill goes, whatever its fate may be, should we read it a second time and let it go into Committee, it will require considerable amendment, especially in its provisions for the lending-out of the money. Those provisions, or some of them, are such as no one in his senses would ever put into a Bill of the kind, and I do not know why they were inserted. I see in the Bill that small grazing-runs are included amongst the classes of lands upon which money may be advanced. Well, Sir, it is well known that people laboured under the delusion that the squatters have been making a lot of money out of their runs, and when the runs have been cut up people have given enormous rents for them. But, Sir, there are some runs that never have paid, that never will pay, and can never hope to pay; yet, under the delusion that they are going to make a lot of money out of sheep, people have gone into these small grazing-runs. I know of a case in which a man spent £800 in fencing his section, and then he could not raise money to put his sheep on it. Now, supposing this man came before the Board, he would say that he had spent £900 on his land, and he wanted an advance of so much. Would any one lend him money who knew he was paying such a rent as must weigh him down? That is one of the class of investments that I think should be struck out of this Bill. There is also in the Bill a provision for land-bonds. It would be better for this colony that there should be nothing but debentures. We should keep to them, for the mere mention of the name land-bonds is like the mention of greenbacks, and it should be taken out of the Bill. My honourable friend the Colonial Secretary made a great point as to the exorbitant rate of interest the monetary institutions were charging, but I venture to say that money can be got now as low as 6 per cent., and anybody who has got land can borrow at that price. I question very much whether the farmers would not rather pay an extra 1 per cent. to private people than go to the Government to get their money. I am quite sure they will do so; and as far as these exorbitant rates are concerned, of which the Colonial Secretary speaks, why, the banks are lending already at low rates. It is only on overdrafts that people have to pay the increased rate, and it suits people to do this; they may have an overdraft one day and nothing the next: and is it not far better and more profitable for a man to pay a higher rate of interest on an overdraft that he only wants temporarily than to borrow money that sometimes will have to lie idle, and on which he will be paying interest all the time? That is the difference between borrowing from the bank and paying interest at a high rate for short periods and borrowing under these proposals, under which a man may be burdened for a long period with continuous interest, when he will but want the money occasionally. Therefore to ascribe the high rates to the banks is a misstatement.

Hon. Mr. McLean

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I never said banks.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—You said "monetary institutions," and banks are monetary institutions. Taking the amendment that the House is asked to vote on, it starts off with a wrong statement. It reads, "Whereas this Bill proposes to initiate a policy of unlimited borrowing." The Bill itself says that the amount is to be confined to three millions, and it is limited to two years, and it cannot be unlimited borrowing if it is limited to two years, and a million and a half for each year. I think if the Government lend out £500,000 the first year, they will do very well. I think the amount is far too much as an experiment, and I am very doubtful as to its success. One does not wish to stand in the way as long as the people wish it. The banks do not fear this scheme. If the farmers can get cheap money, all the better for the banks. Supposing a farmer borrows £500 a year: if he goes to a private individual he pays 6 per cent., and if he goes to the Government he gets it at 5 per cent., thus saving 1 per cent., or the price of one cow each year. I do not think that the farmer would prefer to go to the Government, even if he did save sufficient to buy an extra cow. There is a good deal to be said for and against the Bill. I have no desire to prevent its having a trial, and I am going to vote against the amendment.

The Hon. Captain MORRIS.—I should like to say a few words on this Bill, and I cannot agree with the Attorney-General that it has been referred to the country. It certainly has been spoken of in the country, but it has not been referred to the country as a Bill in the true sense of the word. There was a general mention of the fact that some measure of this kind would be brought forward, but no scheme was formulated. However, I feel inclined to vote for it, although there are some provisions in it which I do not agree with. For instance, there is the matter of advances being made up to £5,000, and also the proposal to advance money to people in the towns. I think all the advances should be confined entirely to the country, and to those applicants who desire to effect improvements on their lands. With these restrictions, I do not think the Bill can do very much harm. We hear on the one hand that the Bill will bring about a most frightful catastrophe, and on the other that it will do good to the country. I take a medium view of the matter, and I think that, with the restriction I have mentioned, the Bill will not do very much harm, and I shall vote for the second reading.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—Sir, I do not feel disposed to let an important measure like this pass without saying a word or two in regard to it. I feel that it is of very great consequence, and that it has received a good deal of consideration throughout the colony. It has been stated here during the course of this debate by several speakers that the party or Government now in power went to the country with what they termed a self-reliant policy. That may be so, but I should just like to draw attention to a speech made by the late Premier, Mr. Ballance, at Wanganui in the latter part of 1891. Speaking in that place in regard to the policy of his Government in relation to borrowing, he said,—

“As to borrowing, the position he had taken up at the general election he had not once departed from. It would not be safe for this country to go into the Home money-market for some years. It would injure our credit and do no good to ourselves. Money was wanted for the purpose of carrying on important works, and settling people upon the land; but the money wanted could be provided in the colony itself, and obtained at a reasonable rate of interest. He was far from saying that the work of settlement could be stopped, and nothing, in his opinion, would be more disastrous to the country than the stoppage of the execution of all public works. People were now leaving the country for want of employment, and many people were clamouring to go upon the land, and were stopped from doing so for want of roads and bridges. It was absolutely impossible that we could stand still in these matters. The colony must go ahead or must retrograde, and he held that we must continue to go ahead, though our progress must be slower, and we must use the money raised amongst ourselves with care, and see that it was expended only upon reproductive works and aids to settlement, which were absolutely essential to the progress of the country. Keeping within these safe lines, he maintained we must borrow.”

Those were the words of the dead Premier, and I do not think that, taking his own words for it, any opponent of the present Ministry could possibly say that the Government were not prepared, if it were necessary in the interests of the colony, to raise money for the purpose of carrying on reproductive works in this colony. The position is simply one, as it appears to me, of reaction or reform—whether we shall stand still or go backwards. That is simply the question, as it appears to my mind. I know that—particularly in the district that I come from—there is a strong feeling over this Bill; yet, so far as I am concerned, notwithstanding the fact that a petition has been presented against this measure, I hold that the Government are the best judges of the situation and of the requirements of the colony, and that they know what they are about, and are safe in going on with a measure such as this. It also appears to me, Sir, that it is a question with a good many people, when the raising of money is concerned, as to what party may be in office; and Shakespeare was not wrong when he wrote,—

That in the captain's but a cholerick word,
Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy.

It appears to me that if what is termed the Liberal party talk about raising money for productive works, or for advancing the welfare of the people, it is all wrong, but if what is termed the Conservative party goes in for it it is all right. An honourable gentleman in another place, who is termed the leader of the Opposition, in making a speech a few years ago, said he was in favour of raising a sum of twenty millions, for the purpose of lending money to farmers and going on with such works as would be necessary in the interests of the colony.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who is that?

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—Captain Russell. And the gallant captain also pointed out, so as to indorse his own policy, that it was not by any means a new measure for the Government to advance money to settlers, and he proved that in England it had been done with great advantage to the farmers, and with advantage to the Government. Perhaps I had better give the captain's exact words. He said,—

“There could be no reason, he thought, urged against the Government lending money to improve the soil. Hundreds of struggling settlers, who were unable to improve their properties owing to the high rate of interest they had to pay, would, under his scheme [that is, raising £20,000,000] be able to employ quantities of labourers, with benefit to themselves, the labourers, and the colony. Undertakings which could not be now thought of, because capital was practically unprocureable, would be commenced, and an era of prosperity such as they had never enjoyed before would be before them. The amount of money retained in the colony would be great, for, taking the debts at £20,000,000, and the difference between the interest payable at 2 per cent.—that was, between 6 and 8 per cent.—the saving would be £400,000 a year, which would be retained in the colony and expended in productive labour, which would in itself be of inestimable value to the colony; nor would the advantages stop there.”

Sir, that makes me think that the quotation I have just given from Shakespeare is a very apt one under the circumstances. My honourable friend Mr. Rigg, in speaking with regard to this question, stated that no other State had ever ventured to go in a direction such as is contemplated by the Bill before us. Well, a similar experiment has been tried with very great success in Germany. Baron von Stein was the initiator of a system of advancing money to agricultural settlers, and it was proved to his satisfaction that it was attended with very great advantage. Perhaps some of the machinery of the Bill may not be all that we could agree to. Personally, I think to advance up to two-thirds of the value of a property is too much. I think, owing to the fluctuations in land-values, it runs the risk of not being successful, and it is therefore open to very grave objection on that account; and if it could be modified in that respect I think it would be advisable for the Government to modify it. Last evening also my honourable friend Mr. Swanson, in referring to the Hon. Sir George Whitmore, objected to money being advanced to agricultural settlers exclusively, and he instanced the miners and also the gum-diggers as people deserving of assistance in a similar way to what this Bill provides for. Well, in reference to the mining industry, the Government has frequently helped that industry in the way of erecting sluices: and, at the present time, urgent appeals are being made from the Thames goldfields to the Government for assistance in the deep-level scheme for working that field. It has been pointed out by another member of the Council that the very system provided for in this Bill, of advancing money to settlers and others, is also carried on by the Public Trust Office and by the Government Life Insurance lending department. So that this is not by any means a new measure at all. One could not help feeling that my honourable friend opposite, the Hon. Mr. Bowen, has a very gloomy and pessimistic way of looking at everything that is going on; and I venture to say that since he has been in the Council that honourable gentleman has opposed, in every way possible, every policy measure that has come before the Council. There has not been a Shop-hours Bill, there has not been a Factories Bill—in fact, there has not been a policy Bill of any character that has come from the present Government but it has been opposed by the Hon. Mr. Bowen. I feared at times we were going to perdition, from the gloomy way in which the honourable gentleman spoke about the colony. While saying that, I would only ask the honourable gentleman to take the same hopeful view of the colony which he had when he was in England two years ago. I find, from the Home News of July 2, 1892, that when the honourable gentleman was at Home he was at a meeting of the New Zealand Trust and Loan Company (Limited), at which Sir Charles Clifford presided. The Hon. Mr. Bowen, in the course of his speech there, said,—

“He believed New Zealand would always be a prosperous country.”—I am glad he held that view.—“He did not mean to say the country would go on by leaps and bounds to the achievement of great wealth, as larger countries might do. After all, it was only a question of time for a revival in the state of affairs. They had a fine country and an excellent climate. New Zealand was a small country, but he thought it would be a profitable one.”

My honourable friend there took a very happy and a very bright view of the colony, and a practical one too, and therefore I ask him not to think the bottom has dropped out of this glorious country yet.

Hon. Mr. Jennings

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—I want to leave the bottom in.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—I do not think the bottom would be left in if the wish of the Chairman of that meeting—that is, Sir Charles Clifford—were attained. The Chairman, in returning thanks, said, “He only trusted that time would bring back to New Zealand its old prosperity. It would afford the directors very great satisfaction to be able to return to their old 20 per cent.” Sir, I hope that the 20-per-cent. business will never be seen in this colony again. It is too much. How can settlers, or any industry, profit by a system under which they pay 20 per cent. for their money? It takes the heart and hope out of the people, and they have really nothing at all to help them if they have to pay such a percentage as that. Sir, I could not help analysing the petition which was presented here yesterday against the Bill; and, while every person has a right to express his views by means of a petition, still I heard honourable gentlemen in this Council last session, when petitions were presented on various subjects, because they did not exactly suit their own particular views, say it was very easy to get up a petition and to induce a lot of people to sign it. There is no doubt that you can get plenty of signatures to petitions of all kinds. It is a very easy matter indeed to get petitions signed. But I have analysed this petition, and I venture to say that any one who is acquainted with the majority of the persons who have signed the petition presented here yesterday will find that 182 of those signatures are those of lawyers and lending and commission agents, and that class of people. I can quite understand that they fear that, like Othello's, their occupation will be gone if this cheap-money scheme is brought into vogue in the colony. Lawyers fear that the high charges by which they have been enabled to make fortunes will no longer be possible. And I say, with no great disrespect for the lawyers, and as one who has had transactions with them—and I speak, I believe, for three-fourths of what are termed the ordinary people in life—that their charges are exorbitant. If you go to raise money on loan, what with the law-charges for deeds, and the interest and other fixtures, such as the procuration-fee, it amounts to a very considerable sum; and I say, if this Government succeeds in passing this measure, it will be a great relief to the settlers in enabling them to get money at a low rate of interest, and the charge for what are termed legal expenses will be minimised to such a great extent that the gain will be reaped by every person in the colony. There is another authority I wish to quote. It is the London Times. I think I should be quite right in quoting that paper as a great financial authority.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—No.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—“No”! My honourable friend from Otago is very quick indeed to use the London Times to back up his own arguments, and therefore I shall quote it to back up my view. The London Times of the 9th August, referring to the subject now before the Council, makes use of the village-settlement scheme as an argument in favour of the Bill. It says, "The number of settlers under the New Zealand State-aided village-settlement system in March, 1893, was nine hundred." The Times, dealing with this scheme for making advances to farmers, speaks of it in a very flattering way indeed, and mentions these facts:—

"The land held by these settlers," it says, "was 22,677 acres. The money then advanced them was £24,625 2s. 2d. The total rent and interest paid by them to the Government was £10,522. The arrears at the same time were £2,346 (£300 of which has since been recovered). The total value of their improvements, carefully estimated, was £61,699. Thus it is seen that the improvements paid for by the settlers themselves represent a sum of £37,074, in addition to the £10,522, paid by them for interest and rent. As the figures stand, the Government gets, in six years, for an expenditure of £24,000, a return of £10,522, the creation of improvements upon the security of the land to the value of £61,000, and the settlement of nine hundred persons as primary producers. It has to be remembered that rent would presumably not have been paid upon those lands unless a certain proportion of capital had been obtainable to meet the expenses of first settlement."

Referring to the present proposals to extend this policy, the same paper says,—

"If the movement prove successful, it will be of an importance which can hardly be exaggerated, not only to the colonies concerned, but to the rising generation of Great Britain. It seems, indeed, to carry with it something not far removed from the settlement of our most pressing social questions."

In the same newspaper there is also a report of a Royal Commission on agriculture. The same troubles appear to exist in England in regard to the agricultural industry as exist in other places. This Commission has been endeavouring to formulate some scheme that will benefit the agricultural population. I might be permitted to refer to a debate which took place in this Council in 1885. The very same scheme was originated in this Council, and was brought forward by the Hon. Mr. Bathgate—that is, advances to settlers. It was received with the very greatest favour. There were certainly some honourable gentlemen in the Council who took opposite views, but when it came to a division the principle was affirmed, and there are many honourable gentlemen now in the Council who voted in favour of that scheme. I cannot but think that the step which the Government contemplate in this Bill to assist settlers is one of the very greatest and deepest importance to the welfare of this colony. There may be faults in the wording of the Bill, but they will possibly be rectified. But the scheme, as formulated, I honestly and sincerely believe to be one which will redound to the credit of the colony, and which will ultimately, if carried out, and if the proper machinery is provided, produce such a state of prosperity as this colony has never seen. If, instead of the millions which have been spent on railroads and other works, this plan had been adopted many years ago this colony would have been one of the most glorious countries on the face of the earth.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It is now.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—There are certain drawbacks at the present time, but if such a scheme as this had been adopted ten or fifteen years ago I think this colony would have been a kind of paradise for agricultural people. I shall support the second reading of the Bill with the greatest pleasure, and I do hope that those who are in the Council at the present time will, at any rate, give the same careful consideration to the proposal which they did in 1885.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—I merely wish to state that I think the honourable gentleman, in introducing the Bill, was somewhat unfortunate in his references to the monetary institutions of this colony in connection with the lending of money. There has been no more disastrous business carried on, in my experience, than the lending of money in connection with these institutions. I know some companies which have lost their capital entirely, and it is a question of making calls not to replace capital, but to pay their debts in respect of debentures issued in the Home-country. I know a company, and happen to be a shareholder in it, in which the whole of the capital has been absolutely lost. I know of another company of which not only all the capital is lost, but the shareholders have had to pay a very large sum indeed to make up losses sustained by the company. I could mention most of the companies that have been engaged in money-lending in this colony during the last fifteen years, and I venture to say that a very large proportion of them have not only suffered very severely, but have practically been ruined. These companies were carried on with as much efficiency and as much economy as it is possible to bring to bear in any Government department. I feel perfectly satisfied that in the case of these companies—all of them, except, probably, one—the administration of their affairs was carried on, apparently, at the time, with the utmost satisfaction and success; and notwithstanding the rates of interest to which honourable gentlemen have referred, and which I know at one time were $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and in some instances 8 and 9 per cent., these companies have not been paying concerns. They took care, I may add, not to advance more than to two-thirds of the value of the property, and in some cases not so much. With all the foresight, business experience, and the exercise of every care possible, these companies have been very heavy losers. I say that the margin provided for in this Bill will not cover the ordinary cost of proper management, and the occasional losses that are inseparable from every money-lending institution. I dare say the Hon. Mr. Montgomery knows that even private investors, who exercise the utmost caution, make losses occasionally in lending money, and if that applies to them it will apply equally so, and possibly more so, to an institution such as is now proposed to be established. The margin of two-thirds I have no hesitation in saying is much too narrow. Property fluctuates so much in value in this colony, and in all young countries, and, indeed, in the Old Country now, that a margin of a third will not be sufficient. We know perfectly well that loans on properties which were supposed to be worth double the amount of the mortgage, or the amount advanced on them, have, when the properties were eventually disposed of, resulted in a loss to the mortgagees. This institution will be somewhat of a political institution, governed by many considerations which do not influence ordinary business. I have no hesitation in saying that unless the department is managed not only with great economy, but with great efficiency, heavy losses will result; and even with economy and good management it seems to me that losses are inevitable. Upon whom will those losses fall? They will fall upon those who are not borrowers as well as upon those who have borrowed. The whole community will be put under obligations to make good the losses made in connection with those particular borrowers. As to the perpetual leases and other leasehold securities mentioned in the Bill at present, no private lender will advance upon them. If a man has a lease in perpetuity or a perpetual lease, or any form of small-grazing-run lease, and he goes into the market, his security is just one of those which ordinary investors will not take up; and yet the Government have selected this class for special favour. I do not understand the reason for it, but ordinary leaseholds—that is to say, those which do not come within the Land Act—are excluded from the operation of this Bill. Why should not a man who happens to have a valuable leasehold property have the benefit of this Bill even if his title is not held directly under the Government? I wish to direct the honourable gentleman's attention to section 69, which provides, "Every person who, having any pecuniary interest in any land tendered as security for a loan under this Act, . . . shall be liable to a penalty of not less than fifty pounds nor more than two hundred pounds." I have referred to the one-third margin, and also to the leasehold; but there are several other objections to the Bill which will have to be considered in Committee if the Bill gets there. One is that not more than £5,000 is to be advanced to any one borrower, and another is that applications for loans not exceeding £500 are to have priority over applications for larger sums. What does priority of application in this case mean? Does it mean priority over all the applications lodged on the same day or during the same month, or between the meetings of the Board, or what? If honourable members knew the very great difficulty there is in escaping loss in connection with the lending of money they would not be so extremely anxious to rush into the business. It is one of the most difficult and critical kinds of business which exist. But what we have to do is to look at the interests of the colony. And it would not be a wise policy to launch into a system of scrambling and grabbing in connection with public money at the present time. What I think we should aim at is this: We should so administer our affairs and so legislate as to inspire confidence among persons of capital to come to the country and settle amongst us. That is the true solution of any difficulty which might exist. If you inspire confidence in the people here it will spread to the Home-country, where capital exists, and that capital will come here and strengthen this country in a way that this system could not do. What is wanted is confidence, coupled with capital and enterprise. I do not know whether this fund is to be liable to the ordinary mortgage-tax of 1d. in the pound—I have not been able to discover. Perhaps the honourable gentleman will tell us when he replies, as that is a very important element in the question. I do not care how economically this Board may discharge its functions, losses are inseparable from the lending of money, and this loss must fall not on the borrower but upon the people of the colony generally.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—What about the profit?

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—There can be no profit in it. The fact is, the so-called profit will be more than absorbed in the administration of the Act. There will be absolutely no profit; and that is the great difficulty. Even if it is administered in the most economical way there will be no profit. By the system of working out the whole scheme there may be no loss. The system is all very well on paper and in theory, but when it is reduced to practice loss will be inevitable; and the Hon. Mr. Rigg will have to bear his share of it, along with every other inhabitant of the colony. It is simply the colony guaranteeing those losses which must arise in the ordinary course of business. If the scheme could be carried out satisfactorily and profitably it might be right enough, but I do not see how it can be carried out satisfactorily, and I anticipate not only a loss, but that the values will not prove satisfactory in many instances. I have known cases in which a valuer has said this sort of thing: "Well, the Insurance Department is only lending up to half the value, and it will stand a special valuation"; and they make their valuation accordingly. The Insurance Department, I believe, only lends up to half the value of the property, and that is a very different thing from two-thirds. It is very often just the difference between loss and no loss. If the Bill goes into Committee there are a number of amendments which I hope the honourable member will consent to have made. It seems to me the whole policy of section 25 is to induce people to take up leases in perpetuity, and to give them money to carry on business at the expense of the rest of the colony. I shall not take up time further, but I may submit that if the Bill goes through in its present shape, and annual returns are made of the result, those returns will not be found at all satisfactory. The Hon. Mr. Kelly was good enough to say that the department could take up good securities and throw the doubtful ones into the hands of private individuals. I do not know what class of security he would offer to the department, but the meaning of it is this: that a certain class is to be selected and favoured by the department, and others are to pay a higher rate of interest owing to the withdrawal of capital, which will be the case if the Bill passes. A large amount of money that is coming out for investment must necessarily be withdrawn from the colony if this Bill passes. Companies will not send their money out to pick up the bad securities the honourable gentleman refers to: that is not the class of security the English money-lender sends his money out for investment on, and if that is the only class available I fancy the doubtful-security holder will find he will have to go to the wall. I warn the Council against passing the Bill, in its present form at all events.

Hon. W. Downie Stewart

The Hon. Mr. KERR.—Sir, when this Bill was introduced into the Council I thought it would pass without much discussion. I thought it was in the interests of a class that deserve every consideration. I thought honourable gentlemen would be prepared to give them the assistance sought for by the Bill. But as soon as the subject had been introduced into the Council the Hon. Mr. Stevens showed at once that there would be a strong opposition to such a measure becoming law; and, although I admit, from the honourable gentleman's point of view, he argued the matter very fully and fairly, I confess it was a melancholy and doleful speech notwithstanding. He seemed to wish to persuade the Council that the passing of this measure would bring disaster and ruin on the colony, and he went on to quote figures to show the falling-off in imports and exports during the last two or three years. I have more faith in the resources of the country than to believe the predictions of the honourable gentleman. I have more faith in the stability of the country than to think for a moment that the measure will cause such a disastrous effect as predicted by him. It also was put forward that this was class legislation; but we have not required to wait till 1894 to find class legislation. I remember that in the early days of the gold-mining a certain amount of class legislation then fell very heavily on the mining community in the part I come from. Those miners, like the settlers, required every encouragement, instead of being hindered and thwarted in every direction. They were there as pioneers of the goldfields, and every one understands the privations those men underwent. Still, after going through all the difficulties and privations and trials of gold-mining, when these men came on an ounce of gold they had to pay half a crown for it. That was class legislation that did not tend to benefit the people, or conduce to the prosperity of the country. While this was going on there was another sort of class legislation going on. There was no taxation upon the enormous quantities of wool exported from New Zealand. The squatter and runholder were exempted from taxation, while the poor miner had to pay his amount towards the taxation of the country. I simply point this out as coming under the head of class legislation. It is said, also, "Why help the settlers more than you would help the manufacturers?" It is well known the manufacturers are helped at present. There is a certain amount of duty placed on goods imported into the country, which enables the goods manufactured in this country to compete, and this is equal to giving the manufacturers an advance of money. We have also a system of class legislation in our co-operative works. There has been a good deal said against this sort of State aid to working-men; but it cannot be denied that it has been productive of much good and vast assistance to a large number of people who otherwise would have been out of employment. Our benevolent societies and charitable institutions would have been brought more into requisition had these co-operative works not been introduced and carried on by the Government. It was not only able-bodied strong men who were out of work, but many men who had grown old and were unable to compete with the strong men. The co-operative system provided small contracts on which they could work, and make, if not 10s. or 9s. a day, at least what satisfied them, and helped their wives and families. That is another kind of class legislation that I am bound to state the Council will sympathize with and approve of, though the present Government were the means of introducing it. I may state that nearly all the industries of the colony are in a manner assisted by the country. Even sawmillers, by railway communication and cheap rates, are enabled to compete with other colonies. It is not the settlers we are solely trying to pass laws to assist; we have passed laws to assist all these people I have enumerated; and the struggling farmers and settlers, in my opinion, are as much deserving of assistance as any others. It is said this is a borrowing measure. I admit it is to a certain extent a borrowing Bill. But it does not altogether entail a liability on the colony. There are hundreds of farmers who want small advances. We know they cannot get these by themselves at anything like a reasonable rate. The Government step in as a friend would, and say, "We can borrow the money at a much lower rate than you can; we will do so, and lend it out on your security." They take the land as security at two-thirds of its value, and advance money up to that amount. We have not heard any honourable gentleman who has spoken yet, when saying that to advance up to two-thirds was too much, say that he had taken into consideration that an amount was to be paid back annually as a sinking fund, so that the responsibility of the Government every year would become less. Therefore the Government would have as security the ground at two-thirds its value, and the amount paid off annually. The whole amount would be paid off in thirty-six years. I think there is very little danger of the country "going broke" under such conditions as these. I was very much pleased this afternoon to hear the Hon. Mr. McLean state that the difference between the bank and the Government proposition to lend money was simply a difference of 1 per cent. Well, I have always been of opinion that the bankers were not the parties who cried out loudest in respect of this Bill. I believe those who cry out loudest against the Bill, and who put every obstacle in the way of it, are the money-lending institutions and the money-lenders. Many a settler does not know how to go about obtaining a loan. He goes to his lawyer, and is charged so much for advice, so much for looking at him, and then so much for finding a client who will lend him the money, and with one charge and another it is enough to frighten any man from going to borrow at all, and to lead him rather to seek relief in the Bankruptcy Court. The charges, as I have said, are enormous, and it is fitting for the Government to come to the aid of those who want advances when they see such extortionate demands made on them. Sir, it has been said that in a short time the settlers and farmers will be the debtors of the State, and, in fact, it has almost been urged that they will be the slaves of the State. Is it worse to be the slave of the State than the slave of the money-lender? I would prefer myself infinitely to be the slave of the State than to be the slave of any company or individual lending money. You can talk more freely to, and receive more consideration from, the Government than you can from these money-lenders that we have heard about. Therefore, I think, taking all the circumstances into consideration, the Bill is a good Bill, and will do a vast amount of good to the farmers and settlers of the colony. I understand it is the desire of every one of us to see our lands settled. Well, if we would induce men to settle on the land, what better plan is there for settling the land than by this measure, which gives facilities that have never been offered by any Government up to the present time, and which, instead of being disastrous to the country, I believe will place a yeomanry in New Zealand that will be productive of incalculable benefits? Instead of a roving population, which is on the move whenever a rush is heard of, even if it is in Western Australia or anywhere else, by settling these people on the land you will have a steady population, that would consider more their homes and families, and be less inclined to rush after will-o'-the-wisps. Therefore, we can see, the population that has been roving about from one rush to another will have an inducement to settle on the land, and to settle comfortably in homes in this colony. Now, I reckon that these farmers and settlers are very much to be compared with the gold-miners I have already mentioned. They have, no doubt, great privations to undergo; they have to go into the forest and hew out homes for themselves; and it is only when the settler begins to do work such as clearing, sowing, and stocking that he finds how soon the little amount of capital he may have fancied would see him over his difficulties becomes exhausted. Where, then, is he to go but to a paternal Government that has taken more interest in the industrial classes of New Zealand than has ever previously been taken? Sir, I have simply spoken in a general way. I have no desire to hunt up comparisons, or to supply figures showing that revenues are falling off. I think, if we provide farmers and settlers for this country, there will be a different tale to tell in a few years. The working-man has been called the bone and sinew of the country, but I think all will be prepared to admit that after a few years, with the help of the Government, the settled farmer will be the bone and sinew of the country. I trust the Council will pass this measure, and show that it has every desire to settle New Zealand, and to raise up a peasantry and yeomanry that will do credit, in a few years, to this measure.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—Mr. Speaker, money is very cheap, and yet it is very hard to get: hence this Bill. There is no doubt just now that, although the holders of money are willing to accept a very low rate of interest, they are very exacting as to the nature of their security. Therefore I have no doubt at all that this Bill, primarily at any rate, is intended for the purpose of finding money for those who cannot get it anywhere else, and I may, myself, say that if that were the only object and effect of the measure I should look upon it with greater favour than I do now. I think if this Bill were altogether intended for the purpose of helping people over the initial difficulties of settling the country there would be a great deal more to be said for it than can be said for it now. I would approach it then in the same spirit that I have in former years approached measures relating to and in aid of the settlement of the country, such as revaluation Bills, advances to miners, and proposals of that sort. As far as I can judge, however, this is simply a wholesale scheme for the purpose of buying and selling money; and, although to-night the statement of the Hon. Mr. Stevens was questioned when he described it as unlimited in its amount, I contend that it is practically unlimited, because, although it is nominally limited to two years in its wording, we all know perfectly well that at the end of two years no results as regards loss or profit can possibly be ascertained, and, therefore, if once commenced, it must go on indefinitely. I look upon the limitation of two years as practically useless. I consider that we cannot possibly retrace our steps if once this departure is made. Now, I look upon this departure as the most important that has been brought before the Council for many years; and, if I had no other reason for voting against the Bill, I would do so in order to postpone it until the country has had a full opportunity of considering it. It is our duty, and we are expected, to stand in the way of hasty legislation; and no possible harm, in my opinion, could come of delaying this for another year. Now, referring to the opinion held about this Bill throughout the colony, discredit has been thrown upon petitions that have been presented, asking the Council to throw it out. Well, of course, I know that it is very easy to get up petitions for or against anything under the sun, but still I have no doubt—of course I may be partial, but I have no doubt in this case that these petitions are genuine, especially as they are backed up by a protest coming from the district which I represented for many years—the Waikato. I had the honour of representing that district for many years, and this subject was brought up over and over again—the subject of providing cheap money for settlers. That was at a time when money was very dear, not when there was every indication, as there is now, of its becoming cheaper every day. Well, I would have nothing to do with it, and I am thankful to say it never became what may be called a burning question. Now, we have that very same district, as represented by its County Council, all composed of small farmers—the very class, if any, to reap benefit from this Bill, and, I am very much afraid, many of them with mortgaged farms—still unanimously protesting against this Bill. It is quite true that one member objected, but it was on the ground that it was not within the proper functions of a County Council, and not because he approved of the Bill; and, to my knowledge, there are within that Council strong and vehement supporters of the present Government, and the district is represented by a member of the Cabinet—Mr. Cadman. Therefore I say that is strong confirmation of my assertion that the country has not yet decided in favour of this measure, and, if there be no stronger reason for postponing it, that ought to be sufficient. I have said I look upon this as a wholesale scheme for the buying and selling of money. That being so, let us consider what are the advantages to be gained by it. Now, from the position of the colony as a lender let us look at it. We all know what has been the fate of the companies that have gone into this business. We know that a very great number of them have lost a great deal of money. Very well, what advantage has the State over those companies? The colony can borrow at $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., we are told, and long may it continue. Well, companies of any repute can borrow at 4 per cent.: that is, there is only $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in favour of the colony to justify it in going in for all this risk and trouble. Besides, every practical man here knows well the difference there is between men looking after their own money and men looking after the money of the State or Government. However, supposing the companies paid $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—and I know as an absolute fact that good companies have refused it at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and got it at 4 per cent.—but even supposing they gave $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., that leaves only 1 per cent. in favour of the colony, as compared with ordinary financial companies. The other day I was in one of the adjoining colonies, and I know they can get money there on good freehold security at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. even now.

Hon. Mr. Kerr

An Hon. MEMBER.—In Melbourne?

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—No; in Sydney. A banker told me that when I was coming through. So that the margin in favour of the colony is a very slight one; at the very outside it is only 1 per cent., as compared with companies acting as lenders. Now, talking about the price of money, I can state also as a fact that, when I was in London lately, money at short dates could be got at 13s. 4d. per cent. per annum.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Short dates.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—Yes, of course. Now, I have shown how small the advantage is which the colony has over companies as regards the borrowing of money. I now come to the advantage which the borrower gains under this Bill. If it is contended that the purpose of this Bill is to lend money to people who cannot get money elsewhere, then, of course, the advantage is evident, and perhaps from certain points of view it might be a good thing for the colony to go in for it. It might be well to do something of this sort, in the interest of settlement; and, if the Government confined their operations to that sort of thing, then we could approach it from another standpoint. If, however, we intend to deal with those people who have good security, then we are dealing with another question. I think every one knows that upon good security money can be had at 6 per cent., and frequently at $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—I will, at any rate, say 6 per cent. Now, this measure proposes to lend at 5 per cent., with 1 per cent. additional as a sinking fund—6 per cent. in all. Well, we all know that settlers have the hardest fight during the first few years of their taking up land, so that even for the first few years they are annually burdened under this scheme as heavily as if they were borrowing privately. But what happens after that? Every year afterwards, in proportion to the money they have the use of, the burden is becoming enormously heavier. After the first ten years the annual charge they have to pay ranges in amount from 7 to 8 per cent., and up even to 50 per cent., upon the amount of money that is remaining. It is, of course, quite true that at the end of thirty-six years they will have no debt, and their children will reap the benefit; but we are supposed under this proposal to be nursing them and helping them now during their lifetime through their initial difficulties, and yet the annual burden they will have to carry after the first year or two will be heavier by a great deal than if they borrowed privately. Of course the natural result will be this: that when the annual charges amount to more than, say, 7 per cent. upon the money they owe, probably they will borrow elsewhere and pay it off. At any rate, it is evident that under this Bill, as the term goes on, the burden of the man who borrows will be heavier during the thirty-six years than if he borrowed the money privately. My honourable friend Mr. Kelly stated that there was no great risk in lending money on land. I say, Sir, our experience will not bear that out. No great risk in lending money on land! Is it not on land that the banks have lost nearly all their money? Or is it not on land that they have sustained the heaviest losses?

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—I should have excepted the Waikato swamps.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—You might have excepted them, and still there would have been hundreds of cases north and south where money has been lost on land, even in the "Garden of New Zealand"—Taranaki. My honourable friend also quoted a case where settlers had suffered during the war, and in consequence money was advanced to them to reinstate them in their homes: but that is not an analogous case at all. Those people should have got the money as a gift, and if they were driven from their homes they ought to have been recompensed, not simply had the money lent to them. I say there is no analogy between the two cases. As regards the Bill itself, I do not intend to go into details, particularly now, because, if it reaches Committee at all, there will be time enough to do that. There are one or two points, however, which suggest themselves to me. For instance, the same Board is to administer this that is administering other lending departments of the Government, and they will by this measure be brought into competition with themselves. Then, the Colonial Treasurer seems to have a great deal of power. My honourable friend Mr. Stevens referred to the fact that borrowers under this Bill might remain State debtors all their lives. Well, so far as I read the Bill, the Colonial Treasurer can, if he chooses, give these men quittances, and that, it seems to me, may lead to a great deal of favouritism. Then, again, with regard to the land-bonds part of the Bill, I cannot understand why the Treasurer is content to accept a limit of 8½ per cent. within the colony, and asks for a limit of 4 per cent. outside the colony, where money is cheaper. I do not know what that means. However, I will conclude by saying that this is, in my opinion, one of the most important departures that the Council has been asked to sanction for many years, and for that reason alone, if no other, I think we should delay its final consideration for another year.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—Sir, I agree with my honourable friend who has just spoken that this is indeed the most important question that has been before the Council and the country for many a long day, and it is one which consequently requires most serious consideration at our hands. It may be looked upon, and it has been looked upon, in one aspect by many honourable members who have spoken—as a decided advance in the direction of State socialism. Now, of course, there can be no doubt that this important departure is certainly the most decided step forward in the direction of State socialism that this country has yet taken. I am not saying this for the purpose of condemning the scheme, because my attitude towards the question is this: To my mind, the fact that it is in the direction of State socialism is no reason why we should either reject or accept it. On the other hand, I do not go with my honourable friend Mr. Rigg, for instance, who seemed to argue that, because it is in the direction of State socialism, therefore it must be good. My position is this: that the fact that this is a step in the direction of State socialism is no reason for either favouring or opposing it. But the question is this: whether or not it is a proper step to take—that is to say, whether or not this proposal will, in the long-run, prove to be for the benefit of the country. And here let me remark that the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn seemed to me to hardly put the question fairly when he said that because this proposal is in the direction of State socialism therefore it is socialism, because no one knows better than my honourable friend the great difference that exists between socialism and State socialism. I was surprised to hear the Hon. Mr. Rigg accept the definition by the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn of socialism, because he must be aware that there is a wide difference between the two. The question is not whether this is socialism, or State socialism, or whether it is in the direction of the one or the other, but merely whether it is an advantageous thing for the country to do. Now, there are three tests that I have been in the habit myself of applying for the decision of questions of this sort. There is, first of all, this question: Is the proposal one of primary social importance and necessity? Secondly, Has it been proved to be practicable? And, thirdly, Has the proposal been shown to be one which will not tend to diminish self-reliance? Those are the three tests I have been in the habit of applying to such questions, because I consider that all such questions must be decided on their merits. Now, if we apply these three tests to this question, and if we inquire, first of all, whether this proposal involves a question of primary social importance or necessity, I do not think we can say it does so: at all events, it has not been proved to this Council that it does so. The argument used by the Hon. Mr. Whyte a moment ago was, to my mind, conclusive for the purpose of showing that it cannot be proved that there is any social necessity for such a measure as this. No one is better qualified to speak on such a question than the Hon. Mr. Whyte, and he has shown very clearly and succinctly that the rate of interest is to-day lower probably than it had ever been in the colony before, and he also showed that the tendency of the rate of interest is still downward. Where, then, is the necessity for this Bill? This is the first time we have heard of this proposal in anything like a serious form. As has already been stated, it has been discussed a good deal elsewhere; but I shall refer to that further on. It has not been, I say, in any distinct or definite form before the country at all. How, then, can it be contended that this question has assumed such dimensions as would bring it within the category of questions of primary social importance or necessity? Then, if we apply the second test I have mentioned, and ask ourselves whether it has been proved to be practicable, I say it has not. The Hon. Mr. Whyte's argument on this point seems to me to be conclusive. No doubt it is argued, and perfectly correctly, and no one disputes it, that the State can raise money more cheaply than the individual can. Probably the State can raise money, at all events at present, at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and, as the Hon. Mr. Whyte says, "Long may it continue so"; but I doubt whether, if we plunge into this headlong course of borrowing, it can be expected to continue. But, that apart, there is no doubt that the scheme has not been proved to be practicable. The argument of the Hon. Mr. Stewart was as to what the results have been to companies that have entered on this money-lending business. The honourable gentleman will know from his experience as a solicitor and otherwise that those companies have almost uniformly lost money. Many of them have lost nearly the whole of their capital; and how can any one say that the State can undertake, with the slightest prospect of success, the carrying-on of the business of buying and selling money better than the companies whose own interests were involved, and who were looking after their own personal interests? The scheme is not practicable in my opinion. The Hon. Mr. Montgomery has told us that the proposal is to borrow money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to lend out to farmers and others at 5 per cent., leaving a margin of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the expenses of management. This $1\frac{1}{2}$ is supposed to cover not only the cost of management, not only the cost of insurance, but also the property-tax—the mortgage-tax, which comes to almost $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. itself. We have no experience to guide us in this scheme, because, as the Hon. Mr. Whyte has said, this is an entirely new departure in the country. No others have ever adopted this scheme. We have heard of crédits fonciers and crédits mobiliers, but there is no country that has adopted any system of this sort. The system of crédit foncier has no analogy whatever to this proposal, because these schemes are not State schemes, as has been shown by the Hon. Mr. Stevens. They are simply organizations of credit inaugurated by the borrowers or by the landowners themselves for the purpose of lending money out or of receiving money. I think that is the principle of the Crédit Foncier, but it has no analogy to the process proposed to be adopted in this Bill, and the arguments, to my mind, are conclusive to show that this scheme is not practicable. Therefore I consider it does not comply with the second test that I have asked the Council to apply. The third test is that it must not diminish self-reliance. Now, until recent years our farmers had probably been the most self-reliant of men in the country; and farmers probably in every country are, as a rule, self-reliant; but there has been, I think, a considerable change already in that respect since the introduction of our various steps in legislation in the direction of revaluation, and so on. We all know what a demoralising effect that legislation has had on that class. They have, in many instances, become shirkers and dodgers, and they have lost almost entirely the self-reliance which was in former times their greatest and most precious characteristic. And what will be the result of further legislation of this sort? It will simply have a similar effect, only to a very much greater degree. Legislation is very apt to destroy self-reliance, but it is beyond the power of Parliament to restore it. We shall be building up a class of men who will be depending entirely on the State, a class who will look constantly to their own advantage; and we shall probably have a scheme by-and-by for repudiation, because, as the Hon. Mr. Whyte has explained, this scheme will, after the first ten years, weigh very heavily no doubt upon the borrower, and the first borrower in his lifetime will be a slave to the State, because the process by which payments have to be made mounts up at such a rate that it will be an intolerable burden for a lifetime for the first borrower. The result of that one can easily see. We shall have this man looking to the State for further relief; and there will arise, as I have said, a class of men who have lost what had been formerly their greatest, and most important, and most indisputable characteristic—that of self-reliance. I have endeavoured to apply the tests I am in the habit of applying for myself, and I ask the Council to apply these three tests to this proposal, and to say whether or not this scheme is able to stand the tests. It is a matter, however, for the Council to say. I am thoroughly convinced that this scheme is an exceedingly dangerous one; and certainly the arguments that have been adduced by the Attorney-General in introducing the scheme, and by others who have supported it, are to my mind nothing but sheer sophistry. Nothing surprised me more than the arguments used by the Hon. Mr. McLean. He told us that it is not a new departure at all, that there is nothing new in the scheme, and that it is simply a continuation of what we have been accustomed to in the investment of the funds of the Government Insurance, Post Office, and Public Trust Office. Now, my honourable friend is clear-headed enough in matters of finance—his knowledge is more extensive than mine, and I do not profess to be a financier—and I cannot believe that he would seriously urge such a scheme upon this Council, and ask it to attach one-pennyworth of weight to it. There is no resemblance, no analogy, between the investment of the funds of the Insurance Department, and Post Office, and Public Trust Office, and investments under the measure now before the Council.

Hon. Mr. Whyte

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—Not the Post Office.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—We will leave out the Post Office, but take the Insurance Department. Here we have a department which has been established for the purpose of—what? Is it for the purpose of borrowing money, and for lending out money—for dealing in money, as the Hon. Mr. Whyte has said? No; it is an institution established by the State for entirely different purposes—for the purpose of life assurance, and for the investment of money, and for the lending of money accruing from the process of carrying on that business, and which is simply necessary to the carrying-on of that business. And to say that this is simply a continuation and extension of that work, and that it is to carry on business in the same way as the business of the Insurance Department is carried on, is attempting to delude the Council. The same may be said as to the investment of the funds of the Post Office and the Public Trust Office. What is the Public Trust Office? It is established for what purpose? For the borrowing and lending-out of money at a profit? No; it is for an entirely different purpose. It is an office which has grown greatly from small dimensions to large dimensions—to a very large concern—I am inclined to think it is too large; but that is a department established for entirely different purposes, and the lending and investment of money is merely a necessary incident in the carrying-on of that business, and it is pure sophistry to say that this proposed business is an extension of those departments. I confess that the feature of this scheme that struck me most forcibly at the time when the first announcement was made was its tremendous magnitude; it fairly took my breath away; but I have gradually got used to it, as most of us probably have. When the scheme was first propounded I could hardly believe my eyes. Honourable members must be aware that when the proposal was first brought down there was absolutely no limit to the proposal. The proposal laid down in this Bill as originally submitted to the Legislature was one for indefinite borrowing at the rate of a million and a half a year. There was absolutely no limit where we could have stopped the borrowing of this million and a half a year, and it would have been necessary to pass an Act of Parliament to stop it. The Hon. Mr. McLean told us that the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Stevens should be rejected because this proposal has now been restricted to two years. Sir, this is a proposal which, as the Hon. Mr. Whyte has said, it is impossible to restrict; and the so-called restriction of this Bill to two years is simply so much waste paper, because if we are once launched upon this proposal there is absolutely no end. I say it will be impossible for us to pull up in two years, five years, or ten years. The Hon. Mr. Montgomery has told us that the raising of these two millions in two years would be a mere drop in the bucket, and that this amount will not assuage the thirst for cheap money. This is quite true. We might as well expect to assuage thirst by drinking salt water. Nor will it have any appreciable effect on the money-market, and the reduction of interest which is now going on will not be in the slightest degree hastened by this process. But at all events, as the Hon. Mr. Whyte has said, it will be impossible at the end of the two years for us to say how this scheme will end—whether it is going to succeed or not: and at the end of the two years we shall be no wiser as to whether the scheme is practicable or whether it is not. It is absolutely and indisputably certain that it will be impossible for us at the end of two years to put an end to borrowing for this purpose, because the three millions that will have been raised by that time will have been a mere sprinkling amongst those who will expect to derive benefit from it, and those who have been disappointed will be ten times more numerous than those who have received anything. Is it to be supposed that we shall be able to pull up and tell those who have not been able to get any money that we are going to have no more borrowing for this purpose? It is pure nonsense, and absolutely impossible; and our motto on this Bill must be "Obsta principiis," because if we let this pass we let out a flood that we can never stop. That is the feature of the scheme which struck me most forcibly when it was first announced; but there is another feature in it which is equally remarkable. A fashion seems to be coming into vogue of introducing into the titles and preambles of Bills deliberate misstatements. I have had occasion before to point out what I consider misstatements in a Bill, and I look upon the title and preamble of this Bill as another misstatement. It professes to be a Bill for the purpose of assisting settlers. The words are, "to enable the Government to assist settlers by advancing money to them on mortgage at reasonable rates of interest," and the preamble goes on to say, "Whereas by reason of the high rates of interest charged on the mortgage of land, and the heavy incidental expenses connected therewith, settlers are heavily burdened and the progress of the colony is much retarded." The Hon. Mr. Montgomery has told us that if we reject this Bill on the second reading we shall be saying to the farmers of New Zealand that we cannot do anything to help them. But this Bill is not a Bill to help the farmers of New Zealand, and it is well that the farmers of New Zealand should know it. I say this is a misrepresentation, and that it is not in any sense a Bill to assist the farmers by providing money for them. This is a Bill for providing cheap money for people who have good securities, whether they are farmers or gentlemen living in the suburbs or in fine mansions in the city. They are all equally eligible as borrowers under the scheme, and the scheme is not in any sense for the purpose of assisting the settlers. It is, in point of fact, a misstatement to say that it is specially intended for settlers. There are one or two further points that ought to be considered. It has been pointed out by the Hon. Mr. Whyte that under this proposal the class of settlers who require assistance most will not get it under the Bill. The proposal in the Bill is to advance money up to £5,000. Now, one would think that a settler who required £5,000 cannot be a settler who is very much in need of assistance, and, at any rate, he is not the man, par excellence, who strikes one as requiring and deserving assistance. The truth is, as has been said before, he is a man who has got more land than he ought to have, and more land than is good for him, and the credit of the State will, in many cases, be used improperly; and those settlers who require assistance the most will not get any under a Bill of this sort; and the struggling settlers who are just settling upon the land—the men who are taking up land, and are not in a position to borrow money from the money-lenders in the ordinary way of business—will not be assisted. It has been said that this scheme has been before the country in various ways, and has been discussed a good deal; but will anybody undertake to say that this scheme, or anything like the scheme embodied in this Bill, has been before the country in any shape? I am certain that the impression abroad before this Bill was published was that it would be a measure to provide for assistance to the smaller men, who could not in the nature of the circumstances get the necessary money at a low rate of interest in the ordinary way. I am quite sure that it is a complete delusion to say, or to imagine, that there was any idea in the country that any such scheme as this was to be brought before this Parliament. I am quite sure that whatever ideas were abroad were entirely different from the ideas embodied in this Bill; and I am sure that they were of a much more modest and simple nature than the proposal we now have before us. Now, we have been told—and here again I must refer to the Hon. Mr. McLean—that it would be a very good thing for the banks if the farmers were to get cheap money in this way. I have no doubt at all that in some ways it would be a good thing for the banks, and I have no doubt also that it would be a good thing for some companies which have made large advances to farmers. We have been also told by my honourable friend Mr. McLean that probably this Bill has taken its origin from the special circumstances of Southland, which is specially within the knowledge of the Colonial Treasurer. He has told us that in Southland—I do not know whether it is specially the case of Southland or not—the foreign companies have withdrawn a large volume of capital in recent years from the farming community. Now, that volume of capital must have been replaced somehow, and probably some other companies have found it necessary to invest in the place of the capital so withdrawn. I can perfectly well conceive that banks, or loan companies, or agents of that class, which have advanced large sums of money to farmers in Southland and elsewhere, and are wishing to get it back, would welcome a scheme like this, by which the farmers can obtain money from the Government in order to pay off the advances that they have received from loan companies and banks such as my honourable friend has described. But that, I think, is not the sort of thing that justifies so sweeping and so far-reaching a measure as the one now before us, because it is impossible for us, in the absolute absence of anything in the nature of experience to guide us in the working of the scheme—it is impossible for any human being to say what the ultimate results and far-reaching consequences of any such measure as this will be: it is absolutely impossible to conceive the ramifications and consequences of so important a measure as this. I shall not detain the Council any longer. It has been said that this proposal has been before the country in various ways; but, as I have explained, I do not believe it. I do not believe that the scheme has in any sense, except in the very vaguest sense, been before the country at all. It has certainly not been before the country in any such sense as would justify us, far less require us, to pass such a measure simply because it had been before the country. If any individual member of the Council is convinced in his own mind, if he has arrived at the deliberate judgment, that the measure is likely to be a good one, by all means let him act upon that judgment. But any member of the Council who feels any hesitation upon that point should not allow the consideration of its having been before the country to have the slightest influence in his mind, because it is absolutely impossible for any living man to say with justice that this scheme has been before the country at all. We have been told by the Hon. Mr. Jennings that the late Mr. Ballance indicated in 1891 that his Government would before long probably have to borrow; but even the passage quoted by the Hon. Mr. Jennings did not give the slightest hint or indication of such a scheme as this. The reference in that passage was entirely to a proposal to borrow money for the purposes for which money has been formerly borrowed, for the legitimate purposes for which money should be borrowed, and for which money has been borrowed in the past—namely, advancing colonisation, making roads and bridges for opening up the country. But not a single word or syllable is said in the passage which the honourable gentleman quoted to show that any such scheme was even thought of as the one we are now considering. We have been told of the very large amount for which the credit of the colony has been pledged since this Parliament met. I think five and a quarter millions was the sum the Hon. Mr. Stevens mentioned. In that sum, however, is included the two millions guaranteed to the Bank of New Zealand. Now, I am bound to say that the answer of the Hon. Mr. Montgomery as to that point seemed to me a perfectly fair one. That was a special matter, and the Legislature recognised the absolute necessity of that guarantee in the special circumstances. So that, although undoubtedly it is, as the Hon. Mr. Stevens said very justly—and the sooner we recognise it the better—an absolute liability to the extent of two millions, still it was unavoidable, and was done with the consent of everybody. We have, however, the fact that we have now pledged the credit of the colony for various purposes, and most of them probably legitimate purposes.

Hon. Mr. MacGregor

The Land for Settlements Bill, for example, as most of us recognise, has a legitimate purpose; the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill we also recognise as quite legitimate; and the making of roads and bridges for the purpose of opening up the country we likewise recognise to be perfectly legitimate and proper: but when we are now asked to launch upon a sea of borrowing—for this is literally a proposal to launch upon an unknown sea of borrowing—it is high time we should say “No,” and any such compromise as my honourable friend Mr. McLean has suggested to this Council would be entirely unworthy of it. To say that this Bill may be modified—that it may be rendered almost innocuous—is no proper footing on which to treat a Bill of this importance. The only proper way to treat it is to say, “No; we will not have it at all.” This Bill is one of very far-reaching importance, because it is one of so novel a nature that the only proper thing to do with it is to send it back to the country, and let the country then say whether or not this proposal, or anything like the proposal embodied in this Bill, is such a proposal as would meet the requirements of the electors of the colony. We shall then know what position we are in; but at present we must act on our individual judgment, and my judgment is that this would be a most momentous mistake and cause irreparable mischief to the colony.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—Sir, the last speaker in his concluding sentences said it was impossible to say what the results of this measure may be. I agree with him: but, whereas he thought the result would be evil, I think the result will be highly beneficial to the colony. The whole tenor of his speech, and, I may say, the tenor of the speeches of most of the honourable members who have spoken in opposition to this measure, has been that the result was going to be disastrous. They have taken a most gloomy view of the whole of the surroundings.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—Gloomy prospects of the colony; dangerous action of the Government in introducing this Bill; and they left the impression on the minds of honourable members that, even if there were anything to be said in favour of this measure, there certainly was not anything in favour of the administration of it being intrusted to the present Government.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No; any Government.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—That is the impression left on my mind from the speeches I speak of—any Government, and especially the present Government—because it is a plunging system of financing. The Government, I have no doubt, are pleased with the debate that has taken place upon this measure. Good speeches were made by the Hon. Mr. Stevens, the Hon. Mr. Bowen, and the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn. The speakers had certainly given a good deal of consideration to the question. I propose to refer to a few of the opinions they have expressed, and the arguments in support of the objection they have taken to the scheme, their view of the whole of the surroundings and possible results of this measure. The Hon. Mr. Stevens said, in speaking of this loan or borrowing scheme, that there might have been some excuse for borrowing in the olden days, and he wished he were able to say our position was as good in the present day as in the olden days, but it was not so now.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—No. What I said was that at the time when our experiments in borrowing took place we had an immense undeveloped territory, and my expression was, “all the world before us.”

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—Quite true; you said we had all the world before us, and the impression left was that we were then in a much better financial position than we are in at the present time. That would be a fair inference to draw from your remarks. You said, also, we were entering now upon a reckless scheme of borrowing.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—And, further, that it was a bad time to borrow.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—You also made a great point of the fact that it would be unfair to give advantages to a section of the community—that is, pledging the credit of the State to benefit a few, and not to benefit the majority.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—Therefore, because all could not be benefited, none should. And you were certainly convinced that great loss would result from the effect of this scheme. The Hon. Mr. Bowen's greatest objection to the scheme was that it was a new scheme, and that there was no precedent for the Government entering upon such an undertaking, therefore that it was new; and, although he did not say so, any one would infer that he meant a new scheme must be a bad scheme.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—I said it should go to the country.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—You certainly said that; but you also said it was a new scheme, and without any precedent, and therefore you allowed us to infer, of course, that a new scheme is not a suitable or a proper scheme for the Government to take in hand.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Before referring it to the country.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—The honourable gentleman, I admit, said further that before undertaking such a scheme as this it should go to the country. The Hon. Mr. Pharazyn took, of course, even a more gloomy view of the situation than either of the honourable members I have referred to. I am sorry to say that he usually does take a gloomy view when financial matters and the doings of the present Government are discussed. He thought it was very wrong for the Government to enter into such a speculation—that the Government were not likely to succeed where financial companies had failed. He said the most dangerous thing of all would be that it would create a large number of tenants of the Crown, who would before long bring influence to bear on the Government to get a reduction of interest, and that probably they would not repay the money. That is a very gloomy view to take of the present and the future, and of the settlers of the country. I do not think the surroundings justify those views. The Hon. Mr. Stevens commenced his speech by saying that, even if he admitted the country had given consent to such a scheme being entered upon, it had not given approval of further borrowing. I should like to ask the honourable gentleman if he used the word "borrowing" in the sense that borrowing has been generally accepted in this colony. Borrowing in the past, I consider, is quite different from the borrowing scheme we are now discussing. Borrowing in the past was for the purpose of constructing railways, public works, or defence works. I would ask the honourable gentleman if this proposal is similar to that.

Hon. Mr. MacGregor

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I used it in the sense of adding to the public liability.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—My opinion is that the borrowing which we are contemplating now is not adding to the indebtedness of the colony. I would ask the honourable gentleman—because he has a good knowledge of financial matters—if, a financial company having money and intrusting it to a gentleman as agent in this colony to invest it, the money is invested in land on good security, will the company consider that the agent has borrowed, and it is not to get its money back again—that the money is being put into such a position that it cannot get it back? Borrowing in the olden days was for permanent works. The money was invested in the country, and the borrowers were not to get the money back in any form. But the borrowing under this Bill which the Government are undertaking, and also in the case of the company I have referred to, is quite different. The money is lent and invested upon certain terms. What are the terms? That the lenders get interest for the use of the money, and, when they require the principal, that they shall get it back. The money is given that it may be lent to others. But the agent of a company, or the Government under this Bill, cannot be said to be borrowing in the same sense as we understand borrowing in this colony. The same thing is in operation every day. We are all familiar with the operations of building societies. The funds of a building society are contributed by a certain number of persons who have money to spare. That money is lent to other persons who want money—on what terms? The terms are somewhat similar to those proposed under this scheme. The Government are going to lend money to farmers. They will require them to pay interest on their money, and a 1-per-cent. sinking fund, which, in the course of thirty-six and a half years, will repay the whole loan. That is exactly what the building society does. It does not run for thirty-six years, but to any number of years—seven or ten years, as the case may be. The interest and the loan by a building society are paid back in the time agreed upon, and principal and interest will be paid back to the colony under the proposals laid down in this measure. I cannot see that there is anything new in this scheme; and I think that will answer the Hon. Mr. Bowen's contention that it is a new scheme. As I have said, it is exactly, to my mind, on the same footing as the operations of a building society. Most honourable members say that a great loss is to be sustained, and they instance the fact of great numbers of financial companies having made losses. Therefore, they say, it follows that the Government is going to make a loss also. Now, the best evidence that the Government are quite qualified to carry out such a scheme as this is the fact that they have already, to a very great extent, carried out schemes of lending money upon mortgages, and they have not lost money by the transactions. The Treasurer stated that the Public Trust Office had lent over half a million of money, and has lost only £1,000, and that the Government Insurance Department has advanced a large sum of money, and has only lost about £2,000. The very Board of Management which it is proposed shall deal with the scheme under this measure has been dealing with the funds of the Insurance and Public Trust Offices, and that Board has not lost money. I fail to see why, because certain financial companies have lost money, it follows that the Government should necessarily lose money, under such a scheme as that laid down in this Bill. The Hon. Mr. McLean objected to banks being included under the term "financial companies." Why have banks and financial companies lost money? Because they have not stuck to their legitimate business of lending money. They have been investing money in land, and have lost their money in that way. The Hon. Mr. Stewart has referred to such companies. If he will turn to the balance-sheets of any such companies he will find that the whole cause of their losing their capital has been that they have gone in for speculation, instead of keeping to their proper business of lending money and seeing that they had good security. The Hon. Mr. Bowen said that the Government lending money would not affect the rate of interest at all, but he immediately afterwards said that the rate of interest was affected by competition. I was struck by the contrast in those two statements. I should think that the Government, lending a million and a half a year, would be a very strong competitor in the money-market, and I believe that the very prospect of this measure being brought into law has had the effect during the last three or four months of bringing the price of money down, for now we hear that money can be got at 5 and 5½ per cent. Money-lending institutions and private men who have money to lend will be driven to take up good securities at the same rate as the Government propose under this Bill. They are quite right to secure the best investments by offering money at reduced rates before their strong competitor comes into the market. The Hon. Mr. MacGregor delivered a very impassioned speech. He was very positive that nothing else than ruination would follow such a scheme as this. I am convinced that quite the contrary result will follow. I am quite convinced that it is legitimate for a Government to foster and help settlers who have taken up land. Honourable members will admit that it is universally believed that settling on the land will be the salvation of the country. We are giving land away; we require in some instances no rent for a number of years; the State is willing to lie out of its money for a time; it is willing to help to pay the survey-fees—for what purpose? To help the struggling settler. And I say it is quite a legitimate expenditure of public money. The Government propose to go a little further under this Bill. They are willing to advance money upon good and reasonable security to struggling settlers. That is legitimate, in my opinion. Objection has been taken to that part of the measure giving preference to persons requiring less than £500. These will be the poorer class of people, whose improvements will not be very valuable. But this is the very class which the Government are anxious to help. The large borrowers, men with ten thousand pounds' worth of security, can very well look after themselves; they cannot be called struggling settlers or poor settlers; and they are certainly not, in my opinion, the class who deserve most help from the Government. Therefore I think the provision that preference should be given to those requiring small advances is a legitimate provision. The amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Stevens, I think, is not fair, on the face of it. I should have preferred his taking a vote upon the motion for the second reading—either to read the Bill a second time, or to reject it without giving the reasons stated in the amendment. The honourable gentleman said that this Bill proposes to initiate a policy of unlimited borrowing. Several speakers have called in question the statement which the honourable gentleman has made. The honourable gentleman who last spoke laid great stress upon this point, saying the scheme was one of unlimited borrowing. I say we are discussing a measure dealing with not more than three millions—a Bill proposing to borrow three millions for two years. That is quite sufficient for us to pay attention to. It should not be forgotten that part of this money will be received back yearly. A large portion of it immediately comes back, and is placed in another fund. The Government have it to lend, and it is invested by the Trust Office; therefore it is not losing anything. And for the money lent they have the security of the land, so that no great loss can follow. Therefore it is not fair to say this is introducing a policy of unlimited borrowing which must be attended with great risk and commercial responsibility. It does not at all follow, to my mind, that the operation of this measure, if it becomes law, will involve great risk and responsibility. Of course, great responsibility will be placed on the Government for the good administration of the money; but it does not follow that there will be great losses over it. The honourable gentleman was good enough to say—speaking of his amendment—that this question had not been before the country; and several speakers, especially the Hon. Mr. Jennings, have referred to the fact that Mr. Ballance had stated that it was in his mind to bring forward such a scheme. Mr. Seddon, long before the elections took place, almost sketched out the entire scheme in his speech at Palmerston North. On every platform in the country reference has been made to this scheme. It must have been quite evident to every one who approved of the Government going into this scheme that the State would have to borrow in order to get the money to lend; and, if objection had been taken in the country to the scheme, the reasonable question would have been asked, Where was the money to be got from? But no objection was raised to it. Every one approved of it; and members were elected believing that they would have to give their attention to some scheme the object of which was to find money to be advanced to settlers. So this question has been fairly before the country, in my opinion, and has received the consideration of the country. Honourable gentlemen were quite right in saying that the measure as now before us is not the same as when introduced into the House of Representatives; but we are to assume that it has been improved in its passage through that Chamber, and we are now only dealing with the measure as it is before us. From my point of view, the Government are quite justified in introducing this scheme. I think, after past experience, we have every reason to believe they will administer it faithfully and successfully; and therefore I think, under the circumstances, the Council will do what is right by approving of the measure, and allowing it to be read a second time.

Hon. Mr. McCullough

The Hon. Mr. BOLT.—Sir, I did not intend to say anything on this Bill, although I thoroughly believe in the principle which underlies it. I only rise for the purpose of, in a very few minutes, noticing some of the peculiar, and I may say contradictory, arguments which have been used against it. The principle which underlies the Bill, so far as I can see, is this: that, if possible, the middleman in monetary matters is to be done away with; that the settler, or the man who has ordinary security to give, should come to the Government direct, and deal with the Government, and not with any middleman. This I take to be a thoroughly sound principle. I am not going to say this Bill carries this out in the best way, but it is the only way we have before us at the present time, and therefore, believing in this principle, I intend to support the Bill. But I should like to look at some of the arguments used against the Bill. The Hon. Mr. MacGregor pointed out what he considered to be an essential principle of every Act increasing the functions of the State, or, rather, he said it should have three principles—namely, it should be practicable, it should be a social necessity in itself, and it should not impair self-reliance. With regard to the question of social necessity: Was it a social necessity to have State railways? We could have had railways outside of the State. I would ask, again, is it a social necessity that we should have education under the State? We have held it to be so, but it is a debatable question if in the last resort it is so. Is it a necessity that we should have State telegraphs or telephones? I apprehend all these things could have been obtained without the State, but we have thought, notwithstanding that that was not an absolute necessity, that it was desirable that they should be State property. And on this principle I say, if it is held to be for the benefit of the people that this Bill should pass, it should be passed whether it is a social necessity or not. I was surprised to hear the arguments used by the Hon. Mr. Bowen, the Hon. Mr. Stevens, and the Hon. Mr. Stewart. They have all, I think, looked at this measure from a most dolorous, pessimistic point of view, predicting that almost to a certainty we should lose money by it.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT.—Very well, my honourable friend says "Hear, hear." I took a note of what he said. He contended that this was not a Bill for poor people, that it could not help them, that it was for people who held good securities. Now, if it is for people with good securities, how can the Government lose by it? I ask him to settle that question with his friends the Hon. Mr. Bowen, the Hon. Mr. Stevens, and the Hon. Mr. Stewart. But, unfortunately for the honourable gentleman's logic, immediately after speaking of good securities, he took up the argument that this Bill was intended particularly for Southland, and that it was to meet difficulties among the Southland farmers. If the Southland farmers are in difficulties they could not give the good securities which the Hon. Mr. MacGregor said were to be taken under this Bill. I would just say, with regard to what fell from the Hon. Mr. Stewart about the enormous amount of money lost by financial companies, and notwithstanding what was said by the Hon. Mr. MacGregor, I believe there is a direct analogy between the departments of State, such as the Public Trust, the Post Office, and Insurance—between those three departments lending out money on mortgage securities and the Government lending out money under this Bill. These three departments have public moneys to invest, and have invested them, and I will just point out that, while those financial institutions which the Hon. Mr. Stewart says are so well managed and their funds so carefully guarded have been, as he admits, going to the wall, the three institutions under the Government have been flourishing and growing. I say this: that in all cases of this sort, such as the Government Insurance, you do not have the speculative spirit which enters into private financial institutions, and it is the speculative spirit that dominates them all which is the cause of their losses. The Hon. Mr. Stevens made what he no doubt considered an excellent point when he pointed out that it was not the proper thing to pledge the credit of the State for the benefit of a few of the people. Well, that at first sight appears to be a perfectly logical argument, but I think the action of this Parliament during the present session has shown that there may be occasions when this argument should not be put into practice. I would ask, was it for the benefit of the whole people of this colony that we guaranteed two millions to the Bank of New Zealand? It was merely to guarantee the shareholders and the depositors. How much would it have affected me if the Bank of New Zealand had put up its shutters? The fact is, the credit of the colony was pledged on behalf of those directly interested in the bank; it may have affected, indirectly, all the people of the colony; and the people of the colony will all be indirectly affected by the prosperity which we hope will accrue from this measure. So that it cuts, either way, against the Hon. Mr. Stevens's argument. The Hon. Mr. Oliver, in a prayerful attitude, and with a soft devotional tone of voice, trusted we should never give up our individualism, and never come into a position where we should all become servants of the State. I would ask, are not nine-tenths of the people servants? Who are the "we" that the Hon. Mr. Oliver spoke of? Are not nine-tenths of them in a state of servitude now? And the question which each servant has to ask is, "Shall I serve a syndicate or private employer, or the Government?" It is not a question of servitude, because that is always their lot; it is a question of who is to be the employer; and the larger proportion of the people now say, "We will serve the Government, because, in that case, whatever profits accrue from our labour will come back to us again; we have no power over a private employer or syndicate; if we suffer hardship we have no redress; we can be ordered into the street and can say nothing; but if we are serving the Government and are under a hardship we can bring it before our master, the Government." It is not a question of servitude, because we shall always be servants; but the point is, Who is going to be the employer? And the large majority, who are constant workers, are beginning to think the Government should be the employer. Another point the Hon. Mr. Oliver made was when he alluded to Joseph in Egypt, and to the state of servitude there. I thought that was the most unfortunate argument ever I heard. Just fancy what a state Egypt would have been in at that time if it had been given over to a syndicate! I look on it that Joseph did a work we should endeavour to copy. We must remember he had seven years in which to hoard up, and seven in which to support a famishing people from the frugality of former years. He did it wisely and well, with all the organizing spirit we look for in the State, and that great Premier of past times carried the people over a most disastrous period. I ask, Would that have been done with such organization had it been left to a lot of competing syn-dicates and private men to grasp as much as they could? As has been pointed out, the principle that underlies the Bill is to do away with the middleman in dealing with advances—that there should be only two parties, the State on the one side and the borrower on the other. There was an argument used by some honourable gentlemen—more especially by the Hon. Mr. Whyte—which I think almost amounts to a fallacy. They pointed out that the rate of interest of many companies was so extremely low that there was really very little difference between the rate at which money could be got from private parties and what is offered under the Bill. Why, what honourable gentlemen have omitted to notice in their arguments is the enormous amount that is paid by small people for getting loans—the enormous charges paid outside the interest contract. I have in my hand now a case in point. A poor man wanted £500. There was 2 per cent. commission charged, which amounted to £10, and law-costs, £8; in other words, a charge of £18 on a miserable, small loan of £500. And that only extended over two or three years—for a definite period—and then the whole transaction had to be repeated. That is what small people experience when they treat with outside financial companies or private individuals. Under this measure they would be relieved from these charges, and it is these enormous charges that must be looked to if we want fairly to consider the benefits which the people will receive under this Bill. I remember reading some time ago, in the London Punch, a skit which illustrates this question of interest. It was stated that a boy came up to be examined in arithmetic. The examiner said to him, “If I borrow from your father £500, and agree to pay him back £10 a month, what should I owe him at the end of twelve months?” “£500,” says the boy. “Tut, tut,” says the examiner, “you do not know the first principles of arithmetic.” “Oh,” said the boy, “you don’t know my father.” Sir, it is in the interests of that boy’s father the opponents of this Bill are arguing. I trust that honourable gentlemen will see that this Bill—always providing that it is honestly and efficiently administered—will be of great public benefit to the colony.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—Sir, it is not my intention to detain the Council with any lengthy remarks at this late hour of the evening; but I feel the importance of this Bill, and I have felt great difficulty in making up my mind as to the action I should take on the present occasion. That being so, I think it is desirable I should state why I do propose to take the course I have decided upon. I feel, on the one hand, that the objects sought to be attained by this Bill are most desirable, and yet, on the other hand, I feel very strongly the great difficulties with which the whole question is surrounded. To give aid and relief to small farmers and settlers by direct loan from the Government is an object we must all highly approve of. All of us in the Council have known cases without number where utter ruin and desolation have been brought upon early settlers and farmers by the heavy rates of interest and the heavy charges they would have been saved from by this Bill. It is not so much the interest as the procuration charges and legal expenses which add so enormously to the numerous difficulties with which the farmers have been surrounded. I may also add another to the things enumerated by the Hon. Mr. Bolt, and that is, that it is a common thing, when persons make advances to farmers, for them not only to make full charges, but also to insist that the farmer should first offer his grain to them, as a sort of pre-emptive right, they having, of course, the privilege of taking it or not as they please; but they have practically the matter in their own hands, because, if they do not get the grain at their own price, unless a man has a market in the neighbourhood, he is called upon for a further charge, or to pay up the amount he owes. I have known many cases, as most of us have, in which men have been crushed by that system, and therefore my greatest sympathy is with the Bill. Now, the Hon. Mr. MacGregor, I think it was, was anxious to know what demand there was for this Bill. I ask, has there ever been a time during recent years when the farming interests were at a lower ebb than they are at the present moment? I maintain that if ever there was a time when the farmers required assistance it is now; and it may be prudent and probably safer to make advances to them now, when prices are at the lowest, than it would be if prices were high, with the probability of their coming down. We have been told a great deal about this cheap money that can be obtained. We have been told over and over again that money can be obtained at 5½ per cent.; but I ask any one to look over the list of mortgages that appear from time to time, and see how many farmers are paying 5½ per cent. I do not believe there is one. I think it will be found it is nearer 7, 8, or 10 per cent. Those are the rates they have been paying, and it is not likely they have dropped down all at once, so that farmers can now get money at 5½ per cent. If they could, I would not be a party to supporting the Bill; but when, to my own knowledge, such is not the case, I think we are entitled, at all events, to give the Bill a fair trial, and to allow it to go to a second reading, as I shall do, reserving to myself the right to vote against the third reading, for there are many things in the Bill, I think, that will require very careful consideration. Now, there is another point, that was referred to by the Hon. Mr. Whyte and by several other speakers, and that is that, although there is a limitation to two years, we are told that we must continue this and go on borrowing practically for ever—that we cannot stop, but must go on borrowing and borrowing. I submit such is not the case, but that Parliament must be again applied to, and asked whether it is satisfied with the way in which this is working, whether the circumstances of the colony will allow it to go on borrowing more, or whether the system is satisfactory. I say the matter will be under control, and that it cannot have reached such gigantic proportions that Parliament could be forced to carry it on. The three millions of money must necessarily go into comparatively few hands, and we shall not have such a large body of people concerned as will bring pressure to bear upon the Government of the colony, and it will not be continued unless it is found to be working in a satisfactory way, the advances made on judicious selections, and the instalments regularly paid. Now, there are one or two things to which I wish to refer. As this was intended to give assistance to farmers, I think the operation of the Bill should be confined to country districts. I do not think the town properties should come under this system of advances at all; they are beyond the scope of this Bill. I think that is one direction in which the Bill ought to be amended. Then, I think also, with the view of assisting farmers, the maximum amount is fixed too high. I think £5,000 is too large an amount. We do not want to have the money distributed to those who are well off and can readily get money, possibly at a low rate of interest. What we want to do is to assist the struggling country men to establish themselves in the colony, and to enable them to carry on with advantage to the country. Now, I merely say these few words to give what I consider a sufficient reason for allowing the Bill to be advanced a further stage. At the same time I recognise this: that the crux of the whole thing will lie in its administration. I think we are all agreed upon that. That is the one great difficulty, to my mind—to say whether the Government is capable of administering such an institution as this, or such a system as this, in a satisfactory manner. I recognise that care is being taken in the selection of a Board. I also recognise that companies with very capable men to manage them have made very severe losses, but that has been simply because too high advances have been made from want of discreet valuations. That is one of the chief points, and in the administration special attention must be given to it. One of the most difficult things is to get suitable and thoroughly competent valuers; I do not say honest valuers—I believe plenty of them can be got; but we want men who will have the knowledge and capability of forming a sound judgment, which is a most difficult thing, as any one knows who has had anything to do with advancing money. That is one point, at any rate. Of course, we must admit that there is a great deal of force in what has been said by several honourable gentlemen about the margin of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. between the rates at which the money is to be borrowed and lent. That is a very small margin to go upon. Of course, in the question of administration we have all the departments of the Government practically at our disposal for carrying out this measure. No doubt there will be considerable saving in that; but we cannot get over this: that there must inevitably be losses of some kind. No man's judgment can be perfect, no matter how honest he may be, and therefore we have to see that there is a sufficient margin to cover losses that may arise. There is one other point I must allude to, and that is the fact that these are to be made Crown debts, and to take precedence over all other debts for all time. That is, to my mind, a most objectionable feature, and ought to be eliminated. I think the Crown, when it makes an advance, must accept the position of ordinary advancers. They take security over the land, and they must look to that. It is not fair or just to make it a Crown debt, so as to make the debt a burden upon a man and his family for the whole of their lives. I make these remarks to show why I intend to support the second reading of the Bill, reserving to myself the right to vote against it after it has passed through Committee.

Hon. Mr. Bolt

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, before you put the question I should like just to make one or two remarks. In moving the second reading of this Bill I explained it so far as was possible, and no one seems to have taken exception to the explanation I made of the main features of the measure. Sir, I have listened with very great pleasure to the debate; but I have witnessed with pain a proceeding which has been introduced into this Council, and which, I trust, will not be regarded as a precedent in future. I have noticed the assiduity with which certain members of this Council have endeavoured to obtain pairs, which are not recognised in this Council.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh!

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I say they are not recognised in this Council, and it has been done for the express purpose of killing what I informed the Council was a policy Bill to which the Government attaches very great importance. This illustrates very clearly what has been from time to time denied in this Council, especially to young members—that there is "party" here. Sir, it is a farce to suppose there is no party here. The very phrases have been repeated often, "those on these benches," "on this side of the House"; and yet we are told there is no party here. My honourable friend Mr. Stevens, in the very able speech in which he attacked this Bill, terminated his remarks by a statement which I am surprised to see, coming from one who is so careful in his remarks and in his actions in this Council. He gives as his first reason why this Bill should not be read a second time a reason for which there is absolutely no foundation in fact. He has prepared a kind of preamble which is absolutely incorrect and without foundation. The Bill, Sir, is clear that the borrowing is to be limited; the Bill limits the time and it limits the amount. And yet my honourable friend, with a want of accuracy which is not characteristic of him, has placed upon record a statement which is absolutely without foundation. He says, "Whereas this Bill proposes to initiate a policy of unlimited borrowing, which must be attended with great risk and commercial responsibility, and whereas no opportunity has been afforded to the people of the colony to express an opinion thereon." Is my honourable friend acquainted with the fact that on every platform throughout New Zealand this question of cheap money for farmers was one of the main planks which the present representatives of the people were returned to Parliament upon—that it was one of the biggest questions that were submitted to the people of the colony, and that the Government, in obedience to the voice of the people, have introduced as soon as they could, consistently with the other business in hand, the measure of this character which is now before the Council? It has come from another place, and it has received the sanction of the representatives of the people. My honourable friend Mr. MacGregor did me the honour to say that in introducing this Bill I used a certain amount of sophistry. Sir, I never use sophistry. I speak very plainly—perhaps too plainly sometimes for myself—and I am not in the habit of using anything but the plainest language. But I would say to the honourable gentleman to whose speech I would particularly refer that he used a great deal of sophistry in the manner in which he made his remarks. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Stevens. He says that the object of this Bill is to borrow three millions of money on the public credit and to lend it out to settlers; and while he would not deny the contention that there was a general demand at the last election that this money should be obtained for the people, yet he stated there was a mandate of another character—namely, that there was to be no borrowing. Now, how on earth could the people suppose that we are going to obtain money for lending to settlers unless it is borrowed from some quarter or another? Do they suppose that it is to drop like the manna that fell in ancient days upon the ground? We must get it from somewhere, and there is no question that, notwithstanding the sophistry I am accused of using, there was a wish expressed by the people that there should be money obtained at a low rate of interest. Who are the people who are so much against this measure? Sir, it is the financial institutions of the colony; and I say there is no single other person who has opposed this measure except those connected with or interested in the financial institutions, which have been the curse of the country. I stated, in moving the second reading of the Bill, that the people of the country were suffering intolerable burdens from the grinding rates of interest they have had to pay; and before I sit down I will give an instance to honourable members that has come within my own knowledge as to the way in which interest used to be charged in the past, and the way in which interest is charged at the present day. I am sure this Bill will have a beneficial effect in reducing those rates of interest, and will enable the people to employ their energies in the farming industry right through the country. My honourable friend took exception to the statement made with regard to the manner in which the people of Germany and France are assisted by the State, and then, in the same style of sophistry, he referred to the crédit foncier system, and he told us that it was an association of money-lenders. Well, I am aware that it is; but at the same time I have no hesitation in telling my honourable friend that Germany has on many occasions assisted people of the farming class; France has done the same; and I may also tell my honourable friend that the country which is probably the most prosperous on the face of the earth—Belgium—through its Government, assists the farmers in every possible way. I have seen myself the farmers there get the use of the cavalry horses to do their work. When they have no other means of getting in their harvest they go to the barracks and get the horses on certain conditions, and afterwards return them to the barracks; and if that is not assisting the farmers I do not know what is. And my honourable friend tells us that there is no such thing as this prevailing in other countries! Then, he tells us that this Bill is to be used for the benefit of the individual borrower and for the benefit of those who may be fortunate enough to get the money. Let me ask my honourable friend, who derived the benefit from all those large sums of money that have been squandered in the past? Were they not supposed to be for the benefit of all? Have the people not borne part of that burden, which has been crushing them, to pay the interest on the moneys that have been raised by loan and squandered in the past? And whom have they benefited? The rich landowners of the country, who got the railways run almost to their very drawing-room doors; and the people have had to suffer in consequence of that squandering of money, to which the Government of which my honourable friend was a member largely contributed.

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—What about the district railways?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—They were just as bad, and you had as great a hand in that as any one else. Then, my honourable friend, with the same ingenuity, goes on to talk about the millions which have been passed through this session, and I am thankful to my honourable friend Mr. MacGregor for the manner in which he dealt with that subject, which I shall therefore not refer to again. Then, the honourable gentleman compares the position in the past with the present. He says we had then the world before us—we had everything before us, and now we have nothing. Sir, we had chaos before us on that occasion, when we were developing the resources of the country. We have more before us to-day—a brighter future than we had then, notwithstanding all the millions that have been squandered, and I venture to say that there is a brighter prospect before New Zealand to-day, although she has had all those millions of money, than there was on the occasion to which my honourable friend refers, when he says we had the world before us. My honourable friend is not an old man yet, and I trust that he may live very much longer, and long enough to see that these opinions I am expressing are the proper ones. Then, he told us we were letting out a floodgate of borrowing, and he compared the position of New Zealand in 1887 with her position at the present day, and I called the attention of my honourable friend by way of interjection to the fact that at the time he was referring to our bonds were at 96. Sir, they are to-day, notwithstanding the statements of my honourable friend and others, at a higher rate than any other colony can boast of: they are at the rate of 109—a rate that no other colony can claim to have. That, Sir, is the result of the legislation of the last three years. The people at Home are satisfied that the administration of the present Government is a good one; they are satisfied that we are not going to launch the colony into reckless borrowing; and the result is that the securities are at a higher rate, notwithstanding the reckless administration which certain honourable members say has taken place in the past. Now, my honourable friend talks about the recklessness of the legislation of this session, which he says will bring disaster upon us. If anything would bring disaster upon us it is the lamentations which we have heard from the money-lenders in this Chamber—it is the lamentations which we have heard from time to time spread all over the world, with everything else that could possibly be done to injure the credit of the colony. The colony is safe, however, notwithstanding these lamentations, and the result is that our position in London is secure. Let me just give an instance of the operations of some of these money-lending people I have known, because there are some members in this Chamber who know similar cases. I knew of a case in which a man had left with a merchant several thousand pounds, for which he received 2 per cent. at call, his intention being to look round and purchase Crown land. Having done so he drew upon the merchant, and was astonished to find that he was charged 10 per cent. for the money and 2½ per cent. commission, as the merchant had regarded the money as his own. Upon making inquiry, however, he was allowed 2 per cent. interest, which was graciously deducted from the 12½ per cent. He was, in fact, charged 10½ per cent. for getting the money back. That is a well-known fact. Now, we know of other cases where interest was made payable. A man wanted, say, a loan of a few thousand pounds for a station. He got the money at 15 per cent. This he had to pay regularly, sometimes half-yearly and sometimes quarterly. In those days the facilities for carrying produce were not very good, and, of course, the man did not get a return for eight or nine months, with the result that he was not able to meet the quarter's call for the loan, and the consequence was that the price of the money was raised. As the money was borrowed from a merchant, he was compelled to buy his stores from him, and all the proceeds of the sale of stock passed through the merchant's books; and for this he was charged commission. My honourable friend laughs, but he knows it is a fact. I am not speaking without a knowledge of what I am saying. I myself have seen some similar transactions, and I assure you that the gentlemen who received the benefit are now rolling in wealth, while the farmer who worked the land, and has had to pay the interest, is to-day without house or home. It is a feeling of compassion for that man that induces me earnestly to press this matter in the Council, because I am satisfied that the bone and sinew of this country is the farmer, who should be more encouraged; and the more he is encouraged the more prosperity you will have in the country. One honourable member says that this will lead to a large number of unemployed, and that the trouble of the country just now is that the farmers cannot employ labour, because the prices of produce are so low, and because of the bad harvests. But give the farmer cheap money, and his energy will be rapidly quickened, and the country will flourish as it ought to do. Then, the honourable gentleman says there is no time worse than the present for increasing the burdens on the colony, and that we are galloping to a deficit. We have heard that old story before; but what has been the fact? We have not had a deficit yet—it has been rather the other way. My honourable friend knows about such things in connection with the Government of which he was a member, and I will undertake to say that I remember when he had to pass a million of money in one night, and directly it was passed it was found to be all wrong, and we were obliged to amend the measure.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—There was a deficit when we came into office, but we changed it into a surplus.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Yes, and you spent a good deal of that. I think I need not trouble the Council any further with my honourable friend. If I do not refer to the speeches of other honourable members it is because I wish to save their time. However, there is one other honourable gentleman to whom I would pay a little attention, and that is my honourable friend Mr. Pharazyn. He, with his usual characteristic utterance, described this as an infamous piece of legislation. It was a bad Bill, and dangerous in every respect; and he used some very nice epithets towards the Government, and went on to read some extracts from a petition, I think—from a speech of a member of the National Association. Sir, that is the most hostile association to the present Government that could possibly have given expression to that speech, and I venture to say that if my honourable friend knew the individual who wrote that very nice remark to which he paid so much attention he would not have been one to take his advice upon any financial question. He has too much sense for that. My honourable friend was good enough to call us “jubilee plungers,” “sly borrowers,” and “a pawnshop Government.” Now, I know that honourable gentlemen are wont to take illustrations from actual associations. My honourable friend, it is quite true, did not belong to an establishment which hangs out three balls, but I will undertake to say that in some of the institutions with which he was connected there were some fine operations going on inside, although there were not three balls hanging outside. Well, I think, Sir, that nothing I can say more on this subject is likely to alter a single vote; and I notice that there is a certain amount of care taken to get every possible vote for the purpose of carrying this amendment, but I trust the Council will not allow any such thing to take place here, but will give expression to the views of the representatives of the people, and that it will read the Bill a second time. My honourable friend Mr. Stevens stated that no such measure had ever been introduced, so far as he was aware, in any Legislature; but I have now before me a Bill, which I got through the merest accident, from Western Australia, in which the Treasurer has prepared a measure on the very same lines as the Bill now before the Council, and in clause 5 will be found a provision stating that

"The Colonial Treasurer for the time being of the colony may issue from time to time mortgage bonds which shall be in the form set out in the Schedule to this Act, or in such form as shall be approved by the Colonial Treasurer, for the purpose of raising any sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of one thousand pounds, for the purposes of this Act."

That is an indication of what has already been done in another place, and I wish to call my honourable friend's attention to the fact.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Where is it?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Western Australia.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Oh!

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I should like to be allowed to make an explanation, and I shall not occupy the time of the Council. I rise to contradict a statement the Colonial Secretary made. The honourable gentleman stated that I had been a party to saddling the colony with the district railways.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I did not say anything of the kind. I said you had as much to do with it as anybody else.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—The honourable gentleman must remember how he fought and the means he adopted on a particular occasion, and under very particular circumstances, to secure the passing of the District Railways Bill through this Council, and that I was almost the sole opponent to his wishes.

The Council divided on the question, "That the words 'the Bill be now read a second time' stand part of the question."

AYES, 14.

Baillie	Jenkinson	Montgomery
Bonar	Kelly	Rigg
Buckley	Kerr	Taiaroa
Dignan	McCullough	Whitmore.
Feldwick	McLean

NOES, 13.

Acland	Peacock	Stewart
Barnicoat	Pharazyn	Swanson
Bowen	Reynolds	Whyte
MacGregor	Stevens	Williams.
Ormond

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Bolt	Oliver
Jennings	Shrimski
Kenny	Grace
Morris.	Holmes.

Majority for, 1.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the second time.

The Council adjourned at five minutes to ten o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, 5th October, 1894.

New Zealand Consols Bill—Native Land Court Bill—Licensing Bill—Adjournment.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council stating that they had passed this Bill with amendments, in which they requested the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPEAKER intimated that the amendment in clause 4 was one which he considered to be an infringement of the privileges of the House. As the Bill passed the House, repayments were to be made within forty years. That provision had been altered by making the repayments take place within twenty years. The Legislative Council had no power to make that amendment, in his opinion. There was a further amendment in the same clause making the places where payments were to be made to be places within the colony. He did not take exception to that on the score of privilege, seeing that the places fixed by section 30 were the Treasury in Wellington and any post-office money-order office throughout the colony. As these were places within the colony, this amendment did not strike him as being an infringement of the privileges of the House.

Mr. WARD moved, That the amendments be disagreed with, and that Mr. McGowan, Mr. Morrison, and the mover be appointed Managers to draw up reasons for so disagreeing.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Treasurer if any arrangement had been made by which the amount of money to be borrowed should be reduced by bringing down a message from the Governor with an amendment to that effect.

Mr. WARD said the Committee which was about to be appointed would interview the representatives of another place, and, if the reasons for disagreement submitted by the House of Representatives were assented to by the other Chamber, then a Governor's message would be brought down submitting a proposal to the House agreeing to reduce the amount from half a million to an amount not exceeding £250,000 a year.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked, would the message include such an amendment as had been made by the Legislative Council—namely, reducing the period from forty to twenty years?

Mr. WARD said No; he disagreed with that.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON understood the honourable gentleman disagreed with that because it was an infringement of the privileges of the House; but otherwise it seemed a desirable amendment.

Mr. WARD said there was a Conference to be appointed, and he thought it would, perhaps, be as well to wait until the deliberations of the Conference were announced.

Sir R. STOUT thought it an extraordinary thing to say that amendments which were moved in that House, and which could not be made in another place, were to be approved of by the Ministry by Governor's message. That was a peculiar form of legislation.

Mr. SEDDON said surely those who proposed those amendments in the House of Representatives ought to be very much pleased to see the course now being taken.

Sir R. STOUT merely said it was a peculiar form of legislation.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked whether, if this House decided to disagree with the amendments of the Council, honourable members would on a future occasion have an opportunity of expressing their opinions.

Mr. SPEAKER said the matter would come up again when the reasons for disagreeing were drawn up and submitted for the approval of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Subsequently, the following reasons were submitted for disagreeing with the Council's amendments:—

"Clause 4: (1) Because the first amendment alters the time when deposits are repayable from forty years to twenty years, and consequently interferes with the financial proposals of this House; and the House does not deem it necessary to offer any further reason, hoping that the above may be sufficient. And (2) because the second amendment, with regard to the place of payment of interest, is better defined by section 30 than by the amendment."

On the question, That the reasons be agreed to, and be transmitted to the Council,

Sir R. STOUT said that, as to the first reason, he did not say that it was not right to disagree with the amendment, because that might be an infringement of the privileges of the House; but he understood when the Bill was in Committee the Treasurer said he did not want the forty years' term—that he only put that as the extreme limit. It was true that the clause, as it left the House, said "not more than forty years," and the Council's amendment simply limited it to "not more than twenty years." As to the places for payment being made "places within the colony," the object of that, no doubt, was to prevent—what, he thought, was perhaps necessary—the conversion of the stock. That was the object of this amendment: to make it clear that the stock could not be converted, and that the principal of the bonds should be payable here.

Dr. NEWMAN thought that Messrs. Morrison and McGowan, who had been able in so very short a time to draw up this document giving reasons for disagreeing, should step forward and give to the House their reasons why they disagreed. The House would like to know those honourable gentlemen's reasons for having this elaborate document presented to the House.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said the reasons were quite obvious. The Treasurer was the person who could best inform them of the reasons. He took it that the Treasurer did not offer objection to the second amendment, as to the places for repayment being places within the colony, on the ground of infringement of the privileges of the House. He (Mr. Hutchison) understood from Mr. Speaker that this second amendment was not necessarily an infringement of the privileges of the House; and, he submitted, it was desirable that this amendment by the Legislative Council should be on its merits adopted by the House, because it would be seen that clause 30 did not necessarily cover the same ground as clause 4. Clause 30 dealt only with the interest, whereas clause 4, as amended by the Council, provided that principal as well as interest should be payable in the colony. So it would be as well to have Mr. Speaker's ruling upon this point. Perhaps Mr. Speaker's attention had not been directed to the point. Clause 30 dealt only with the payment of interest, whereas clause 4 dealt with the question of the repayment of principal as well as interest. If that amendment was not an infringement of the privileges of the House he thought it a desirable change, so that the principal should be repayable within the colony.

Mr. SPEAKER observed that he had said that he did not consider this amendment to be an infringement of the privileges of the House, and did not desire that it should be objected to on that ground; but of course it could be objected to on the ordinary grounds, that it was not a desirable amendment.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON moved, That the House does not agree with the second reason just submitted,—because he thought that the principal should be repayable within the colony.

Mr. BUCHANAN could not see why the Colonial Treasurer should object to this amendment by the Legislative Council. Upon the second reading, and at every opportunity since, the Government had impressed upon the House and the country that their desire was to place the means of investment provided by this Bill at the disposal of people within the colony, who did not require to have the payment of either interest or principal made in London. He (Mr. Buchanan) and others had pointed out time after time that unless the Government insured the exclusion of the wicked foreign money-lender the Government would virtually be paying 4 per cent. to him under this Bill, instead of the $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. at which he was ready to lend his money. He hoped, therefore, the Colonial Treasurer would enlighten the House upon this point, and indicate the why and wherefore of his change of front upon this matter, because if this Bill was intended for the purposes stated by the honourable gentleman and other members of the Government they could not well object to the amendment made by the Legislative Council.

Mr. WARD said the honourable member was apparently labouring under a misapprehension. If he would be good enough to look at the Bill he would find that the amendment which he was now defending was objected to because it was unnecessary. If the honourable gentleman would look at clause 5 of the Bill he would find that the deposits to be made under this Bill were to be made in New Zealand; and if he would look at clause 30 he would find that the payments of interest were to be made at the Treasury in Wellington, or at any post-office money-order office throughout the colony. That being so, how could the honourable member suppose that, if the people in the colony invested in these Consols under clause 5, it was necessary to have an amendment such as was suggested to prevent repayments of the interest or principal from being made except at the place where deposits were to be lodged within the colony—namely, at the Treasury or at any post-office money-order office in the colony?

Mr. BUCHANAN said that did not affect the money-lender in London.

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman was now changing his ground; and, in fact, he very conveniently shifted his ground when it suited his purpose to do so. The point he urged was that owing to the proposed amendment the places for payment would be only those within the colony, so that, as he said, the honourable member was now changing his ground. He seemed to forget what had taken place with regard to this Bill altogether. In Committee he (Mr. Ward) repeated frequently that it was intended that these Consols should be purchasable at the different post-offices fixed by the Bill, and at the Treasury in Wellington, and at those places only. If the honourable member put in the amendment he suggested it would not meet the objection he had raised. He held that the amendments proposed were unnecessary, and that it was tantamount to saying that they did not intend to do this. Clause 5 showed that the money could be contributed in the colony.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What about the principal?

Mr. WARD said the principal was confined only to the colony, and the interest was payable only in the colony; and what more did honourable members want, and what more could be obtained by the insertion of the twenty years by the Legislative Council in that direction? He ventured to say that even those who were opposed to the Bill could scarcely see the necessity for the Legislative Council amendments.

Mr. BELL.—They will not do any harm.

Mr. Buchanan

Mr. WARD said that was the old story, and he did not think the honourable member was serious in making that remark. Only the other evening the honourable member himself opposed an amendment that was proposed by the honourable member for Wellington City on the ground that it would do no harm. The honourable member opposed it as being unnecessary. He (Mr. Ward) did not believe in the no-harm principle. If the Bill clearly indicated what was intended, that was sufficient. With regard to the forty years, he did not say that he did not want that time. What he said was that forty years was the maximum time, and that would in all probability be the period of the Consols, and he explained that there might be instances in which forty years might be desirable. He had also stated that this Bill was to a great extent an experiment, and every member of the House must admit that, when such a new system as this was being tried, to some extent the result of that trial must be a guide as to what should be done in the future in connection with it. He thought the objections taken by the Legislative Council were such that every honourable member ought to support the motion before the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked if the Bill as it now stood compelled the payment of principal within the colony and not outside.

Mr. WARD would read clause 5, which was as follows:—

“Deposits under this Act may be made at any time, and from time to time, and for any amount, and may be lodged either at the Treasury, Wellington, or at any post-office money-order office in the colony.”

That was the principal, which was payable in the first instance in New Zealand. Clause 30 read as follows:—

“Interest on Consols is payable at the Treasury, Wellington, or at any post-office money-order office throughout the colony.”

Mr. BUCHANAN said what he referred to was the repayment of principal at the end of the forty years.

Mr. WARD said, if in the first instance the principal was payable at the post-office or at the Treasury in the colony, he assumed that in the ordinary course it must be repaid in the colony.

Motion agreed to.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 135.—Dealings with Native land prohibited. (Government right of pre-emption.)

Mr. SEDDON moved the insertion of the words “except as provided in Part IV., Division II., of this Act.”

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the words “as has been acquired by a Native or Natives from the Crown or from Europeans” be struck out after the word “land,” and the following inserted: “acquired by way of purchase, gift, or testamentary disposition from any person or persons, or by purchase from the Crown.”

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON moved the addition of the following words: "or granted under the New Zealand Settlements Acts."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PARATA moved, That the following words be added: "Provided that nothing in this Act shall preclude the leasing of lands situated in the Middle Island, subject to confirmation under section fifty-three of this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

AYES, 34.

Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Button	Lawry	Pirani
Carncross	Mackintosh	Reeves
Carnell	Maslin	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	McGowan	Saunders
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Green	McNab	Smith, G. J.
Hall	Meredith	Stout.
Hall-Jones	Millar
Harris	Mills	Tellers.
Hogg	Montgomery	Collins
Hutchison, W.	O'Rorke	Tanner.

NOES, 19.

Crowther	Massey	Te Ao
Duthie	McKenzie, R.	Thompson
Fraser	Newman	Willis.
Graham	O'Regan
Houston	Parata	Tellers.
Kelly, W.	Russell, W. R.	Heke
Lang	Smith, E. M.	McGuire.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Allen	Buick
Buchanan	Cadman
Buick	McLachlan
Cadman	Morrison
McLachlan	Ward.
Morrison
Ward.

Majority for, 15.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 146.—Committee may alienate.

Mr. HEKE moved a proviso to the effect that a Committee cannot alienate, lease, or mortgage until after having obtained the consent in writing of the owners.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 14.

Crowther	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Duthie	Massey	Te Ao.
Fraser	McGuire	Tellers.
Green	Newman	Heke
Kelly, W.	Parata	Stout.

NOES, 40.

Buddo	Hall-Jones	McGowan
Button	Harris	McKenzie, J.
Carncross	Hogg	McKenzie, R.
Carnell	Houston	McNab
Carroll	Hutchison, W.	Meredith
Collins	Joyce	O'Regan
Earnshaw	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Flatman	Larnach	Pirani
Graham	Mackintosh	Reeves
Hall	Maslin	Russell, G. W.

Russell, W. R.	Steward
Saunders	Tanner
Seddon	Thompson
Smith, E. M.	Willis.

Tellers.
Mills
Montgomery.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Allen	Buick
Buchanan	Morrison
Mackenzie, T.	McLachlan
Mitchelson	Ward
Stevens	Lawry
Wilson.	Cadman.

Majority against, 26.

Amendment negatived, and clause agreed to.
Clause 65A.—Mode of securing payment of survey-fees.

Mr. BUTTON moved to add these words to the clause: "Every such mortgage shall, unless otherwise ordered by the Court, carry interest at the rate of five pounds per centum per annum from such date as the Court may appoint."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 15.

Allen	Lang	Parata
Buchanan	Larnach	Wilson.
Carnell	Mackenzie, T.	Tellers.
Crowther	Massey	Button
Houston	McGowan	Russell, W. R.
Kelly, W.

NOES, 37.

Buddo	Mackintosh	Russell, G. W.
Carncross	Maslin	Saunders
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Smith, E. M.
Earnshaw	McNab	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	Meredith	Stout
Graham	Mills	Tanner
Hall	Montgomery	Te Ao
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Willis.
Heke	Newman
Hogg	O'Regan	Tellers.
Hutchison, W.	Pinkerton	Duncan
Joyce	Pirani	Kelly, J. W.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	Buick
McGuire	Harris
Mitchelson.	Ward.

Majority against, 22.

Amendment negatived.

Sir R. STOUT moved the addition of the following new clause:—

"All lands disposed of by sale under this Part of the Act by the Land Board shall be disposed of by auction."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the addition of the following new clause:—

"Subject to confirmation under the provisions of section fifty-three of this Act, any land held by a Native in severalty may be alienated as heretofore."

Clause read a second time.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause be added to the Bill."

AYES, 20.

Allen	Heke	Mills
Buchanan	Kelly, W.	Newman
Carroll	Lang	O'Regan
Crowther	Mackenzie, T.	Te Ao.
Fraser	Massey	Tellers.
Graham	McGuire	Houston
Harris	McKenzie, R.	Thompson.

NOES, 34.

Buddo	Lawry	Reeves
Button	Mackintosh	Russell, G. W.
Carncross	Maslin	Saunders
Carnell	McGowan	Seddon
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Earnshaw	McNab	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	Meredith	Stout
Hall	Montgomery	Tanner.
Hall-Jones	Morrison
Hutchison, W.	O'Rorke	Tellers.
Joyce	Parata	Hogg
Kelly, J. W.	Pirani	Pinkerton.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	Buick
Hutchison, G.	Larnach
Mitchelson	Ward
Russell, W. R.	Stevens
Wilson.	Duncan.

Majority against, 14.

Motion negated.

Clause not inserted.

Mr. SEDDON moved the addition of the following new clause:—

"Where a person has acquired from the owners a valid lease for a term one-half of which shall have expired on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, and such person is in actual beneficial occupation of the land demised, it shall be lawful for him, if the owners consent, within one year after the passing of this Act, to obtain a renewal of his lease for the whole or part of the land the subject thereof for a further term not exceeding fourteen years, upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the owners and the lessee, and be approved by a Judge of the Native Land Court: Provided no lease shall in all exceed the term of twenty-one years from the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five."

Clause agreed to.

Mr. SEDDON moved the addition of the following new clause:—

"Wherever any land is charged by way of mortgage to secure payment of the cost or portion of the cost of any survey made prior to the passing of this Act, the Court may include in such cost such sum by way of interest as to the Court shall seem fair and reasonable, but such sum shall in no case exceed five per centum per annum, computed from one year from the date of the order of the Court granting such survey lien, and in no case shall interest be allowed for more than five years."

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments.

LICENSING BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 2.

Mr. GRAHAM moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 26.

Allen	Heke	O'Regan
Buchanan	Hogg	Parata
Button	Houston	Russell, W. R.
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Smith, E. M.
Collins	Lang	Steward
Crowther	Mackintosh	Te Ao.
Fraser	Massey	Tellers.
Green	McGuire	Graham
Hall	Mills	Mackenzie, T.

NOES, 29.

Buddo	Maslin	Reeves
Carnell	McGowan	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Earnshaw	McKenzie, R.	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	Meredith	Stout
Harris	Montgomery	Tanner
Hutchison, W.	Morrison	Thompson.
Joyce	Newman	Tellers.
Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton	Hall-Jones
Lawry	Pirani	McNab.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	Buick
Hutchison, G.	Larnach
Mitchelson	Ward
Russell, W. R.	Stevens
Wilson.	Duncan.

Majority against, 3.

Motion negated.

Clause 3.—Saving of persons.

Mr. McNAB moved the insertion of the following words: "except when the sale of liquor is prohibited under a national option poll taken under this Act as hereinafter provided for."

Mr. BUCHANAN moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 16.

Allen	Houston	O'Regan
Crowther	Lang	Steward.
Fraser	Mackintosh
Graham	Meredith	Tellers.
Heke	Mills	Buchanan
Hogg	Montgomery	Smith, E. M.

NOES, 36.

Bell	Kelly, W.	Parata
Buddo	Lawry	Pinkerton
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Pirani
Carnell	Maslin	Reeves
Carroll	Massey	Seddon
Collins	McGowan	Smith, G. J.
Earnshaw	McGuire	Stout
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Hall	McKenzie, R.	Thompson.
Hall-Jones	McNab	Tellers.
Harris	Morrison	Joyce
Hutchison, W.	Newman	Russell, G. W.
Kelly, J. W.

PAIRS.
For.		Against.
Duthie		Cadman
Green		Buick
Hutchison, G.		Larnach
Mitchelson		Ward
Russell, W. R.		Stevens
Wilson.		Duncan.

Majority against, 20.

Motion negatived.

Mr. ALLEN moved, That strangers be ordered to withdraw.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 21.

Buchanan	Lang	Parata
Carncross	Lawry	Reeves
Collins	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McGuire	Steward.
Fraser	McKenzie, J.	Tellers.
Heke	Montgomery	Allen
Houston	Morrison	Massey.
Kelly, W.

NOES, 30.

Bell	Hutchison, W.	O'Regan
Buddo	Joyce	Pinkerton
Carnell	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Mackenzie, T.	Seddon
Earnshaw	Maslin	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Stout
Graham	McNab	Thompson.
Hall	Meredith	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Mills	Pirani
Harris	Newman	Tanner.
Hogg

PAIRS.

For.		Against.
Duthie		Cadman
Green		Buick
Hutchison, G.		Larnach
Michelson		Ward
Russell, W. R.		Stevens
Wilson.		Duncan.

Majority against, 9.

Motion negatived.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 17.

Allen	Hogg	O'Regan
Carncross	Houston	Parata
Crowther	Kelly, W.	Steward.
Fraser	Mackintosh	Tellers.
Graham	Mills	Lang
Heke	Montgomery	Smith, E. M.

NOES, 31.

Bell	Joyce	Pirani
Buddo	Lawry	Reeves
Carnell	Mackenzie, T.	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Maslin	Seddon
Collins	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Earnshaw	McGowan	Stout
Flatman	McGuire	Tanner.
Hall	McKenzie, R.	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	McNab	Morrison
Harris	Meredith	Pinkerton.
Hutchison, W.	Newman

PAIRS.
For.		Against.
Duthie		Cadman
Green		Buick
Hutchison, G.		Larnach
Mitchelson		Ward
Russell, W. R.		Stevens
Wilson.		Duncan.

Majority against, 14.

Motion negatived.

Mr. MCGOWAN moved, That the Chairman leave the chair.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 7.

Carncross	O'Regan	Tellers.
Houston	Steward.	Buchanan
McGowan		Smith, E. M.

NOES, 33.

Bell	Lawry	Pinkerton
Buddo	Mackenzie, T.	Pirani
Carnell	Maslin	Reeves
Carroll	Massey	Russell, G. W.
Collins	McGuire	Seddon
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Smith, G. J.
Earnshaw	McNab	Stout
Graham	Meredith	Tanner.
Hall	Montgomery	Tellers.
Harris	Morrison	Flatman
Hogg	Newman	Hall-Jones.
Kelly, W.

PAIRS.

For.		Against.
Buick		Green
Button		Russell, W. R.
Kelly, J. W.		McKenzie, J.
Mills		Hutchison, W.
Mitchelson		Cadman
Willis.		Millar.

Majority against, 26.

Motion negatived.

Mr. W. KELLY moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 14.

Allen	Hogg	O'Regan
Buchanan	Houston	Smith, E. M.
Carncross	McGowan	Tellers.
Crowther	Meredith	Fraser
Graham	Montgomery	Kelly, W.

NOES, 28.

Bell	Joyce	Pirani
Buddo	Lawry	Reeves
Carnell	Mackenzie, T.	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Massey	Seddon
Collins	McGuire	Stout
Earnshaw	McKenzie, R.	Tanner.
Flatman	McNab	Tellers.
Hall	Morrison	Maslin
Hall-Jones	Newman	Smith, G. J.
Harris	Pinkerton

PAIRS.

For.		Against.
Buick		Green
Button		Russell, W. R.
Mills		Hutchison, W.

Mitchelson	Cadman
McKenzie, J.	Kelly, J. W.
Willis.	Millar.

Majority against, 14.

Motion negatived.

Mr. ALLEN moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 14.

Buchanan	Houston	O'Regan
Fraser	Kelly, W.	Smith, E. M.
Graham	Massey	Tellers.
Harris	McGowan	Allen
Hogg	Montgomery	Carncross.

NOES, 22.

Buddo	McKenzie, R.	Smith, G. J.
Carroll	McLachlan	Steward
Earnshaw	McNab	Stout
Flatman	Meredith	Tanner.
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Tellers.
Joyce	Pinkerton	Russell, G. W.
Mackenzie, T.	Seddon	Collins
Maslin		Pirani.

PAIRS.

For.

Against.

Buick	Green
Button	Russell, W. R.
Carnell	Lawry
Kelly, J. W.	McKenzie, J.
Mills	Hutchison, W.
Mitchelson	Cadman
Reeves	Newman
Willis.	Millar.

Majority against, 8.

Motion negatived.

The Committee divided on Mr. McNab's amendment.

AYES, 20.

Bell	Massey	Seddon
Buddo	Meredith	Smith, G. J.
Earnshaw	Montgomery	Stout
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Tanner.
Joyce	O'Regan	Tellers.
Mackenzie, T.	Pirani	Flatman
Maslin	Russell, G. W.	McNab.

NOES, 18.

Allen	Harris	Pinkerton
Buchanan	Hogg	Smith, E. M.
Carncross	Houston	Steward.
Carroll	Kelly, W.	Tellers.
Collins	McGowan	Fraser
Duncan	McLachlan	McKenzie, R.
Graham

PAIRS.

For.

Against.

Buick	Green
Button	Russell, W. R.
Carnell	Lawry
Duncan	Wilson
Hutchison, W.	Mills
Mackintosh	Duthie
McKenzie, J.	Kelly, J. W.
Mitchelson	Cadman
Reeves	Newman
Willis.	Millar.

Majority for, 2.

Words inserted.

Mr. McNAB moved, That the words "bona fide" be inserted in subsection (2) before the words "for medicinal purposes."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 35.

Allen	Hall-Jones	Morrison
Bell	Harris	O'Regan
Buchanan	Hogg	Pinkerton
Buddo	Joyce	Russell, G. W.
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Seddon
Carroll	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Collins	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	McGowan	Steward
Earnshaw	McNab	Stout.
Flatman	Meredith	Tellers.
Fraser	Mills	Pirani
Graham	Montgomery	Tanner.

NOES, 3.

Kelly, W.

Tellers.

McKenzie, R.
McLachlan.

PAIRS.

For.

Against.

Buick	Green
Button	Russell, W. R.
Carnell	Lawry
Hutchison, W.	Pere
Mackintosh	Duthie
McKenzie, J.	Kelly, J. W.
Mitchelson	Cadman
Reeves	Newman
Willis.	Millar.

Majority for, 32.

Words inserted.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 19.

Allen	Houston	Pinkerton
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Smith, E. M.
Collins	Massey	Steward.
Fraser	Meredith	Tellers.
Graham	Mills	Buchanan
Harris	Montgomery	Mackenzie, T.
Hogg	O'Regan

NOES, 21.

Bell	McGowan	Saunders
Buddo	McKenzie, R.	Seddon
Earnshaw	McLachlan	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	McNab	Stout.
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Tellers.
Heke	Pirani	Hutchison, W.
Joyce	Russell, G. W.	Tanner.
Maslin

Majority against, 2.

Motion negatived.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved, That the Chairman leave the chair.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 10.

Carncross	Kelly	Tellers.
Carroll	McGowan	Buchanan
Duncan	McLachlan	Mills.
Houston	Steward.

NOES, 30.

Allen	Hutchison, W.	Pirani
Bell	Joyce	Saunders
Buddo	Mackenzie, T.	Seddon
Collins	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Earnshaw	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Stout
Fraser	McNab	Tanner.
Hall-Jones	Meredith	Tellers.
Harris	Montgomery	O'Regan
Heke	Morrison	Russell, G. W.
Hogg

Majority against, 20.

Motion negatived.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 21.

Allen	Hogg	Meredith
Carncross	Houston	Mills
Carroll	Kelly, W.	Montgomery
Collins	Mackenzie, T.	Smith, E. M.
Duncan	Massey	Tellers.
Fraser	McGowan	Buchanan
Harris	McLachlan	Duthie.
Heke

NOES, 21.

Bell	Morrison	Steward
Buddo	O'Regan	Stout
Earnshaw	Pirani	Tanner
Hall-Jones	Russell, G. W.	Te Ao.
Hutchison, W.	Saunders	Tellers.
Joyce	Seddon	Flatman
Maslin	Smith, G. J.	McNab.
McKenzie, R.

The CHAIRMAN gave his casting-vote with the "Noes."

Motion negatived.

Mr. DUTHIE moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 23.

Allen	Hogg	Montgomery
Carncross	Houston	Pinkerton
Collins	Kelly, W.	Russell, W. R.
Duncan	Mackenzie, T.	Smith, E. M.
Duthie	Massey	Steward.
Fraser	Meredith	Tellers.
Harris	Mills	Buchanan
Heke	Mitchelson	Graham.

NOES, 22.

Bell	Maslin	Saunders
Buddo	McGowan	Seddon
Button	McGuire	Smith, G. J.
Carroll	McKenzie, R.	Stout.
Flatman	McLachlan
Hall-Jones	McNab	Tellers.
Hutchison, W.	Morrison	Earnshaw
Joyce	Russell, G. W.	O'Regan.

Majority for, 1.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the House, at its rising, do adjourn to half-past two o'clock on Monday.

The House divided.

AYES, 23.

Bell	Heke	Pirani
Buddo	Hutchison W.	Saunders
Button	Joyce	Seddon
Carroll	Maslin	Smith, G. J.
Collins	McNab	Stout.
Earnshaw	Meredith	Tellers.
Flatman	Morrison	Massey
Hall-Jones	Newman	Mitchelson.

NOES, 27.

Allen	Houston	O'Regan
Buchanan	Hutchison, G.	Pinkerton
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Russell, G. W.
Duncan	Lawry	Russell, W. R.
Duthie	Mackenzie, T.	Steward
Fraser	McGuire	Tanner.
Graham	McKenzie, R.	Tellers.
Guinness	McLachlan	Montgomery
Harris	Mills	Smith, E. M.
Hogg

Majority against, 4.

Motion negatived.

The House adjourned, at a quarter to eleven o'clock a.m., to half-past seven o'clock p.m. on Monday.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Monday, 8th October, 1894.

Sunnyside Asylum—Personal Explanations—Land for Settlements Bill—Shearing at Benmore Station—Switchback Railways—New Zealand Consols Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—New Zealand Consols Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUNNYSIDE ASYLUM.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. JENKINSON, it was ordered, That the return laid on the table on the 3rd instant, relative to the expense of building at Sunnyside Asylum, be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said he had to claim the attention of the Council on a matter of privilege. Last week there appeared in a portion of the newspaper press of Wellington some comments on the vote he gave on the second reading of the Consols Bill. Those comments touched his honour and the honour of the Council. His honour was dear to him, and the honour of the Council, on which depended its usefulness, was dear to all of them. He regarded it, therefore, as a solemn duty to declare that he had never in his life given a more simply straightforward vote than that which he had given on the occasion to which he referred. He had had no communication, direct or indirect, with any member of the Government on the subject of that Bill, or on any other Bill, or measure, or business; nor had any member of the Council asked him to vote for the Bill, nor had the way he was going to vote been the subject of conversation with any one. The reason which induced him to vote for the New Zealand Consols Bill was simply that he attached little importance to it, being quite willing that the experiment should be tried, believing, as he did, that it would prove inoperative. The Council was justly jealous of the character of its members, and he had claimed their attention, believing it to be his duty to repel an imputation touching its honour, the retention of which unsullied was a most precious possession.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN quite approved of all his honourable friend had said, but he felt that he had been attacked in the Press much more than his honourable friend had. Still, he did not lay any stress upon that. The Press was quite welcome to make any remarks it chose about him. It would not cause him to deviate one iota from the course he intended to pursue. He agreed with his honourable friend that the Press should not make these remarks; but still he had not the slightest objection, so far as he was concerned, to their making any remarks they thought fit. If it did them any good, it certainly would do him no harm.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY wished to make a personal explanation with respect to some remarks he had made on the second reading of the Middle District of New Zealand University College Bill, in reference to the attendance at the University College classes in Auckland. He had used these words: "We have already three universities, and I question whether, with our limited population, we shall find students to fill another. I am told that there are very few students in Auckland—only two or three in some classes." Well, the authorities of the Auckland University College felt aggrieved at that statement, and, though it was technically correct, it might lead to an interpretation he never intended his words to have. It was very true that the students attending some of the classes were few in number, but those were confined to students who went in for honours. He found, from statistics with which he had been supplied, that there were 127 students—67 males and 60 females; and in physical science especially the classes were very well attended, reaching to 27 or 28; while in mathematics and chemistry the attendance was from 20 to 24, and English language and literature 17 to 19. Therefore the interpretation he wished to put was that, though in some of the classes the students were few in number, the University was, on the whole, doing very good work.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. STREVS brought up the following reasons for insisting on the Council's amendments in this Bill:—

"Clause 5: That clause 4 contemplates the making of an agreement between the Board and the owner or lessee including the price, without any interference by the Minister beyond a direction to negotiate. It therefore seems reasonable that the view of the Board as to price should guide the purchase in all cases.

"Clause 8: The term 'one complete estate' is not defined in the Bill, and requires to be made clear, and it is submitted that the term 'block' does this.

"New proviso to clause 8: It is considered that this constitutes a sufficient direction to the Council.

"Clause 21: The amendment merely places beyond doubt what is understood to be intended by the House."

Reasons agreed to.

SHEARING AT BENMORE STATION.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS asked the Colonial Secretary, Whether the correspondence between Mr. Thomas Middleton and the Commissioner of Police, which appeared in the Wellington Evening Post of the 4th October, is correct? If so, and if there is any other correspondence on the subject, will he lay it on the table? He moved, That the correspondence be read.

Motion agreed to.

The CLERK read the following correspondence:—

"Benmore Station, 27th August, 1894.

"DEAR SIR,—Shearing will begin here first week in December, and I should like if you could arrange so that the men who are coming to work may not be subjected to insult or violence while passing through Kurow or on their way up the river. Friends inform me that the 'rash spirits' amongst the members of the Shearers' Union advise strong measures being taken to prevent shearing commencing here peaceably. Judging by what is being committed by the unionists in Australia against those whom they choose to injure, and from the fact of the failure of their mischievous attempt last season to prevent the shearing here, there may be sufficient in the rumour to conclude that there is trouble in store for me. Over and above protection for the men, I think it unjust that any attempt to destroy property on the station should not be guarded against by the authorities. I need not point out to you the helpless position we should be in on the station in the event of any preconcerted disturbance arising, say, on the day shearing begins, and without police protection. I have known in past years to have had nearly one hundred men gathered upon the station more than were required. At this time there may not be more than three or four permanent hands at the homestead—the shepherds are invariably fifteen or twenty miles away, on the ranges. Then, again, there is no telegraphic communication with the nearest police-station (forty-five miles distant): so that I earnestly trust you will take measures whereby we shall be protected from illegal molestation.—Yours, &c.,

"THOS. MIDDLETON.

"Constable Bradshaw, Kurow."

Hon. Mr. Oliver

"Police Department
 "(Commissioner's Office),
 "Wellington, 21st September, 1894.

"SIR,—Your letter of 27th ultimo to Constable Bradshaw re police protection for Benmore Station during shearing-time has been duly submitted to the Hon. the Defence Minister, who has directed me to inform you that, from inquiries made, it appears that, if there is any disturbance, it will undoubtedly arise from your injudicious action in arranging with an Oamaru shearer now in New South Wales to bring over sixteen shearers from that colony, and therefore in this matter you must take the responsibility of your own actions; but the Police Department most distinctly decline to assist in bringing about a quarrel between shearers and employers, and therefore you must not depend upon the department for protection under those circumstances. From all that can be learned, it appears that this Oamaru shearer has not, for some time past, been on good terms with the workers' union, and it appears to be well known in New Zealand that you have commissioned him to bring over sixteen men; and therefore this department cannot acquiesce in or support dangerous actions, which may lead to very grave difficulties all over the colony.—I am, &c., "A. HUME,

"Commissioner of Police.

"T. Middleton, Esq.,

"Benmore Station, Oamaru."

"Benmore Station, Oamaru,
 "1st October, 1894.

"SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 21st ultimo. It is surely an extraordinary state of affairs that the head of the Police Department should intimate to any citizen that, because he has ventured to employ what he considers the best and surest method of getting his work efficiently done, he must consider himself beyond the pale of police protection, and that if lawless men choose at their pleasure to attack, and perhaps kill, himself and employes the police will not interfere, and he must take his chance. I have done no wrong. I was worried and annoyed over my last year's shearing almost beyond endurance, and my employes were subjected to very considerable loss, and this through the action of men many of whom I had employed year after year at the shearing here. And this year, simply because I have taken steps to prevent my employes and myself being at the mercy of these same men, I am to be told that I must not look to the police to afford me or my men any protection. Surely things have come to a pretty pass in New Zealand when, notwithstanding all the people pay annually for protection of life and property, they are told by the police, 'You must not depend upon us for protection, because you have ventured to employ a man who is not on good terms with the workers' union.' Sir, I call upon you to do your duty in this matter. If the lives of men who are coming to earn a living at peaceful avocations are to be endangered by lawless spirits, even though they do belong to workers' unions, it is your duty to protect them, and if you fail to do so the consequences will rest on your head. In calling your attention to the threatened danger I am only doing my duty, and if you will not protect myself and my employes you must be held responsible for the consequences, if we are driven by your refusal to protect us to take the law into our own hands and protect ourselves.—I am, &c.,

"THOS. MIDDLETON,

"Manager.

"The Commissioner of Police, Wellington."

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had made inquiries of the department, and had received an answer to the effect that the correspondence which appeared in the Post was correct; and it would be laid on the table with other correspondence on the subject.

SWITCHBACK RAILWAYS.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON said he had that morning brought under the notice of the Colonial Secretary an account of a very serious accident that had taken place in Christchurch on a show called a switchback railway. There was a considerable amount of machinery in connection with these shows, and he wished to know whether the Government Inspector had inspected this machinery in Christchurch and passed it. He saw that a show of the same sort was being constructed in Wellington, and was to have been opened last week, and it was commonly reported that it was some serious derangement of the machinery which had prevented it from being so opened. It would be well if these shows were inspected by direction of the Government.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said immediately his honourable friend had spoken to him on the subject he had sent for the Inspector of Machinery to make inquiries with regard to the so-called switchback railway—which was a misnomer—that was being erected here. The Inspector had informed him that it was within his jurisdiction, and that he would not allow the proprietor in Wellington to have any performance until he had passed it. He had not yet done so, but the proprietor would not be allowed to proceed until he had inspected it. The Inspector had also told him that he would get from the Inspector in Christchurch a report as to the position of affairs there, and he hoped to have it that day; and as soon as he (Sir P. A. Buckley) had it he would inform the Council.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in asking the Council not to insist on its amendments in this Bill, said he hoped to be able to show that he was doing what would probably meet the views of honourable members. The first reason of the House of Representatives for disagreeing with the Council's amendments was as follows: "(1.) Because the first amendment alters the time when deposits are repayable from forty years to twenty years, and consequently interferes with the financial proposals of this House; and the House does not deem it necessary to offer any further reason, hoping that the above may be sufficient." He took it that this was a question of privilege, which probably a Conference might not satisfactorily settle; that, however, was, of course, in the hands of the Council. With regard to the second of the reasons—namely, that the second amendment, with regard to the place of payment of interest, is better defined by section 30 than by the amendment—if honourable members would refer to section 30 of the Bill he thought they would find it was much more definite.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said it did not refer to the principal there.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he thought it did. It was exceptionally clear, and section 30 was to be preferred to the amendment. He was satisfied that the question in regard to the first reason was one of privilege, and he would be sorry to see that question raised at the present time. He was equally satisfied that the place of payment of the principal was sufficiently defined by the clause intended to be amended—better defined than in the amendment, because, after all, in the payment of interest the original document must be produced. For these reasons, he would move, That the Council do not insist on its amendments.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN hoped, on the contrary, that the Council would insist on its amendments. His honourable friend said that this was a question of privilege, and that possibly it would not be advisable to raise it now. He, on the contrary, thought that it would be advisable that the question should be discussed and settled, because it was evident they would have many questions raised similar to this if Bills of this sort were to be introduced into the Council. They were a new departure in legislation, and precedents could not be found in English practice for cases of this sort. When they could not find precedents they must fall back on the principle underlying all the precedents. The principle on which the Commons House of Parliament insisted upon having the sole control of money Bills was that the representatives of the people could alone make grants to the Crown on behalf of the people by way of supply or aid, or pass Bills to tax the people. Now, it could not be said that there was in a Bill of this sort either appropriation or taxation. In the clause in question there was no question of that kind; and his honourable friend said, in introducing the Bill, that there was no appropriation of the funds which were to be raised—that the Bill was one to promote thrift amongst the people of New Zealand. This, in fact, was the statement made in the preamble to the Bill. He thought if they gave way in this case it would remove almost every Bill from amendment by the Council. If money was borrowed for public works it might be said that the Council should not discuss how these public works were to be carried out, because the money had been appropriated by the House. The fact was, this money was borrowed without stating what it was borrowed for, and the Bill only provided that the money might be deposited for a time and invested for that time—that people might deposit their money and the Government might issue certificates acknowledging the deposits.—all for the convenience of the people who deposited the money. Surely that could not be said to be appropriation. He was satisfied that honourable members could not find any precedent in any English authorities for such a Bill as this being treated as a money Bill. Therefore he hoped the Council would stand upon the principle, which none of them disputed, that the questions which the Legislative Council was debarred from dealing with should be strictly questions of appropriation or taxation. And, looking at this Bill, he was satisfied that the clauses amended by the Council were not clauses of appropriation or taxation. As this was not the time for discussing the matter at length, he would move, That the Council disagree with the reasons given by the House of Representatives, and that a Committee be appointed to prepare reasons for so disagreeing.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR hoped the Council would not agree to the motion of the Attorney-General. The question raised with regard to the amendment made by the Council in clause 4 of the New Zealand Consols Bills was a very important one, and the Council, by yielding to the contention set up with regard to that amendment by the House of Representatives, would be allowing what seemed to him a very serious interference with its powers and privileges. The expression used in the reasons given by the other House was that it interfered with the financial proposals of the House. So far as he was aware, there was no authority at all for the proposition implied in such a statement, that the Council had no power to interfere with financial proposals. The doctrine as to the power of the Council with regard to money Bills should be very strictly limited in accordance with practice and precedent, and, as far as one could gather, that practice was limited entirely, as the Hon. Mr. Bowen had said, to ways and means and appropriation of revenue. He did not think it could be seriously contended by any one that this clause in the Consols Bill fixing the term of Consols—the term within which the principal was repayable—in any way came within that definition. It was neither in any sense an appropriation Bill nor in any sense a Bill imposing taxation. To yield on a point of that sort would be giving up so much that the power of the Council would be gone to amend in almost any part a Bill which the House of Representatives chose to call a money Bill. There seemed to be an impression, and, he thought, a very erroneous impression, that the Council had no power to amend in any part what was called a money Bill. There was no authority at all for the proposition that the clauses even in a money Bill which were not appropriating or taxation clauses could not be amended. But a very important question arose beyond that, and that was, whether the Bill was, in the strict and proper sense, an appropriation Bill at all, or a Bill levying taxation. It was unnecessary at present to discuss that question; but to accept the motion of the Attorney-General and yield that point would be a very serious matter indeed. He hoped the Council would not accept the motion.

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

The Hon. Mr. KELLY said, with regard to the question of privilege on money Bills, he did not see how a Committee of the Council could settle it even after bringing in a report. It was laid down by the Constitution Act and "The Parliamentary Privileges Act, 1865," what their powers and privileges were, and, if the latter Act was to be ever amended by way of diminution or extension with regard to the powers of the Council, surely that must be done by statute, and not by report of a Committee.

An Hon. MEMBER.—A Conference.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY said a Conference could not settle the point. What was really wanted was a proper definition of the powers of the two Houses by statute, and that would be best brought about by a Joint Committee of both Houses sitting early during the session and submitting a joint report.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR thought the only way by which they could arrive at a settlement of the question was to have a Conference, in which the interpretation of the Act under which they were constituted should be defined, and he thought it was absolutely essential for the well-being and good of the Council that this thing should be defined now. If they were to be debarred making such alterations as this one, their powers as a Council would be absolutely gone, and they might just as well go home and not attempt to amend anything done by the other House. He thought this was one of the most serious and important matters that could possibly arise, involving as it did the existence and value of the Council as a branch of the Legislature.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE said he always had admitted, and always would admit, that the Council should either reject or accept without any amendment any Bill dealing with revenue or taxation. But in what particular did this clause bring in a question of taxation at all? It could not be said that the money was to be raised from the people by taxation. It could not be called revenue proper; and it appeared to him to be straining the Act under which the Council existed to say that they could not amend such a clause. Their Speaker had ruled in one way. He granted that the Speaker of the other Chamber had ruled otherwise. He thought this was a fair question between the two Houses, and he might suggest, rather than stop the business, under protest, the Council might, if the Conference agreed, recommend that the point be referred Home, as they did on a former occasion, on the application of the other branch of the Legislature. They at that time had come to a position in which they could not get any further forward or backward, and the House of Representatives meanwhile considered the point, and insisted that the Council should refer the case to the highest authorities at Home. That question was settled, and the Council accepted that decision. This being a totally new practice, of treating loans as public revenue raised by taxation, and an inconvenient practice having grown up of putting in clauses which dealt with such loan-moneys, and finding the House of Representatives regarded these Bills as revenue Bills, or Bills dealing with the appropriation of revenue, he thought the time had come when the Council should take a stand somewhere and propose to have the case referred to constitutional authorities at Home; or that they should lay the Bill aside. For his part, he did not wish to see the Bill laid aside, and he should very much prefer to see an authoritative decision obtained upon the point. He could not help thinking that that would be the wisest and most harmonious way of settling the matter—that was, if the House of Representatives, at the Conference, still insisted on their objections to the amendments made by the Council on the ground of privilege. He thought that was the best course to adopt. There was scarcely a Bill which came before them on which the same question might not be raised, and he thought the sooner they got the thing settled the more likely it would be to insure harmonious working between the two branches of the Legislature.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY would like to make an explanation. So far as he was personally concerned, his course was clear. That, of course, was to move the motion which he had moved. That was well recognised as the proper course for any one who sat where he did. At the same time, he was as anxious as any living man to preserve the dignity and the position of the Council. He had always endeavoured to do so, and he trusted he always would do so. He was not at all sure that a Conference would not be desirable, because he was bound to say that the position of the Council was very indefinite. Under an Act, which he could not for the moment remember, there was a peculiar expression—namely, that they had the privileges of the House of Commons—which was probably some mistake; while at the same time there had been a contrary decision given by Sir Erskine May on the subject in answer to a question sent Home from the other House. The Council's position with regard to these money Bills—or he might call them these so-called money Bills—was, he thought, determined, owing to the fact that the Bills were introduced into another branch of the Legislature by Governor's message. That had been the assumption all along. If he might be permitted to refer to what had occurred in another place, he might point out that the Speaker of the other House had ruled that this Bill could not be altered, whereas the Speaker of the Council had ruled that the Bill could be amended. Therefore, with the view of getting a fair decision, or, if they could get nothing else, an expression of opinion, he was not at all averse to a Conference, while he was bound to make the motion which he had moved. He thought a Conference might not do any harm: and he hoped at least it would do good, because he was quite sure that the gentlemen placed on the Conference would fairly represent the Council, and would place before the Conference their position. He was bound to say the position of the Council was unsatisfactory with regard to these Bills, because very often, in moving the second reading of these Bills, one felt that they could not be altered. That was to say, the position of the Council was not sufficiently defined. If occasionally there could be give and take he felt sure the passage of these Bills would be much easier than had been the case in the past. While he moved the motion standing in his name, he should not, of course, resist a Conference. He never had done so, and was not inclined to do so now.

Motion, "That the Council do not insist upon its amendments," negatived.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN moved, That the Hon. Mr. Stewart, the Hon. Mr. MacGregor, and the mover be appointed Managers for the Conference.

Agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 26.—Classes of funds to be invested.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN moved, That subsection (2) be struck out.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 12.

Buckley	Jennings	Rigg
Dignan	Kelly	Stewart
Feldwick	Kerr	Walker, L.
Jenkinson	Montgomery	Whitmore.

NOES, 19.

Acland	MacGregor	Richardson
Barnicoat	McLean	Stevens
Bolt	Morris	Swanson
Bonar	Oliver	Taiaroa
Bowen	Peacock	Whyte
Holmes	Pharazyn	Williams.
Kenny

Majority against, 7.

Subsection struck out, and clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 42.—How advances to be made.

Subsection (3).—"No advance shall be granted for a sum of less than twenty-five pounds nor more than five thousand pounds, and every advance shall be for fifty pounds or a multiple of fifty pounds."

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN moved to strike out "twenty-five," and insert "fifty" in lieu thereof.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 25.

Acland	Buckley	Jenkinson
Barnicoat	Dignan	Jennings
Bolt	Feldwick	Kelly

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

Kenny	Pharazyn	Taiaroa
Kerr	Reynolds	Walker, L.
McCullough	Rigg	Whitmore
Montgomery	Stewart	Whyte
Morris	Swanson	Williams.
Peacock

NOES, 8.

Bonar	MacGregor	Richardson
Bowen	McLean	Stevens.
Holmes	Oliver

Majority for, 17.

Word retained.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN moved to strike out the word "five," with a view to inserting "one."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 14.

Barnicoat	Kenny	Reynolds
Buckley	Kerr	Rigg
Dignan	McCullough	Walker, L.
Feldwick	Montgomery	Whitmore.
Kelly	Morris

NOES, 19.

Acland	MacGregor	Stevens
Bolt	McLean	Stewart
Bonar	Oliver	Swanson
Bowen	Peacock	Taiaroa
Holmes	Pharazyn	Whyte
Jenkinson	Richardson	Williams.
Jennings

Majority against, 5.

Word "five" struck out.

The Hon. Mr. FELDWICK moved, That the word "four" be inserted.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 12.

Barnicoat	Kelly	Rigg
Buckley	Kerr	Taiaroa
Dignan	McCullough	Walker, L.
Feldwick	Montgomery	Whitmore.

NOES, 21.

Acland	Kenny	Reynolds
Bolt	MacGregor	Richardson
Bonar	McLean	Stevens
Bowen	Morris	Stewart
Holmes	Oliver	Swanson
Jenkinson	Peacock	Whyte
Jennings	Pharazyn	Williams.

Majority against, 9.

Amendment negatived.

Progress reported.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN brought up the following reasons for the Council insisting on their amendments in this Bill, and moved, That the reasons be agreed to:—

"1. The financial proposals alluded to in the reasons of the House of Representatives do not deal with questions of appropriation or taxation, and the amendment made by the Council is within the proper limits of the Council's action.

"2. The place of repayment of capital is not prescribed in section 30."

Motion agreed to.

The Council adjourned at five minutes to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, 8th October, 1894.

First Reading—President of the Bank of New Zealand—Licensing Bill—New Zealand Consols Bill—Land for Settlements Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill.

PRESIDENT OF THE BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. WARD.—I desire, Sir, to inform the House that the Government have made the appointment of President of the Bank of New Zealand. The gentleman who has been selected to fill the position is Mr. William Watson, and the salary is £2,250; during good behaviour being a limitation of the appointment. I may state, for the information of the House, that the gentleman who has been chosen is a man of very considerable experience. He is recognised in commercial and banking circles to be a man of undoubted ability, and his integrity is of the highest possible character. I hope and believe he will discharge the onerous and responsible duties devolving upon him with satisfaction to the country.

Mr. LARNACH.—I should like to say this: I think this is another injustice on the part of the Government to the Colonial Bank.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There is no question before the House.

Mr. LARNACH.—Am I not allowed to say anything?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Nothing at present. Probably later on an opportunity will arise, such as on presentation of the terms of appointment.

Captain RUSSELL.—I should like to ask the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer what is meant by "during good behaviour." Is it a life appointment?

Mr. WARD.—No; it is not a life appointment. I may say the terms of the communication clearly indicate that it is not so.

LICENSING BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 3.—Serving of persons.

Mr. G. J. SMITH moved, That the word "wine" be struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 30.
Allen	Lang	Russell, W. R.
Buchanan	Maackintosh	Seddon
Collins	Massey	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McGowan	Stevens
Duncan	McGuire	Steward
Duthie	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Green	McLachlan	Ward.
Harris	Mills	Tellers.
Hogg	Parata	Graham
Houston	Pinkerton	O'Regan.
Kelly, W.

NOES, 22.
Bell	Hutchison, W.	Saunders
Buddo	Joyce	Stout
Button	Kelly, J. W.	Tanner
Earnshaw	Mackenzie, T.	Te Ao.
Flatman	Maslin
Hall	Meredith	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	McNab
Heke	Pirani	Smith, G. J.

PAIRS.
For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carncross	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Morrison
Fraser	Newman
Green	Flatman
Larnach	Hutchison, G.
Pere.	Buick.

Majority for, 8.

Word retained.

Mr. TANNER moved, That all the words in subsection (5) after the words "to any person" be struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the subsection."

AYES, 23.
Allen	Kelly, W.	Russell, W. R.
Buchanan	Mackenzie, T.	Seddon
Crowther	Mackintosh	Smith, E. M.
Duncan	McGowan	Stevens
Duthie	McKenzie, J.	Thompson.
Graham	McLachlan	Tellers.
Hogg	Parata	Mills
Houston	Pinkerton	Steward.

NOE 26.
Bell	Kelly, J. W.	O'Regan
Buddo	Lang	Pirani
Button	Maslin	Saunders
Collins	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Hall	McGuire	Stout
Hall-Jones	McKenzie, R.	Te Ao.
Harris	McNab	Tellers.
Hutchison, W.	Meredith	Earnshaw
Joyce	Montgomery	Tanner.

PAIRS.
For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carncross	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Morrison
Green	Flatman
Larnach	Hutchison, G.
Pere	Buick
Reeves.	Heke.

Majority against, 8.

Words struck out.

Rest of subsection struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That clause 8 as amended stand part of the Bill."

AYES, 38.

Allen	Joyce	Montgomery
Bell	Kelly, W.	O'Regan
Buchanan	Lang	Parata
Buddo	Mackenzie, T.	Pinkerton
Button	Mackintosh	Russell, W. R.
Crowther	Maslin	Saunders
Duthie	Massey	Seddon
Graham	McGowan	Smith, G. J.
Hall	McGuire	Stevens
Hall-Jones	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Harris	McLachlan	Tellers.
Hogg	McNab	Mills
Houston	Meredith	Smith, E. M.

NOES, 10.

Collins	Kelly, J. W.	Tellers.
Duncan	McKenzie, R.	Pirani
Earnshaw	Stout	Tanner.
Hutchison, W.	Te Ao.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carncross	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Morrison
Green	Flatman
Larnach	Hutchison, G.
Pere	Buick
Reeves.	Heke.

Majority for, 28.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4.—Interpretation.

On the motion of Mr. SEDDON the definition of "premises" was struck out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "'Premises' includes any house, place, room, billiardroom, closet, cellar, yard, stable, outhouse, shed, or any other place whatsoever belonging or in any manner appertaining to premises."

Clause 4 as amended agreed to.

Clause 7.—"When a district constituted under this Act, or under any Act hereby repealed, is abolished, and has been constituted into new districts, the poll in force in such first-mentioned district shall remain in force until the time appointed for taking the next poll of the electors under this Act.

"Nothing in this section contained, or in section twenty-one of 'The Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act, 1893,' shall be construed to affect or to have affected any suit or proceeding pending in any Court of law and initiated before the commencement of that Act."

Mr. TANNER moved to strike out the words down to "districts," and insert, "When a district under this Act shall be abolished and constituted into a new district"; also to strike out the proviso, and insert, "Nothing in section twenty-one of 'The Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act, 1893,' shall be construed or be deemed to affect or to have affected the position of the licenses in any proceedings taken regarding them in the Licensing Districts of Addington, Newtown, and Sydenham East, which were constituted under 'The Licensing Act, 1881.'"

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 21.

Duncan	McKenzie, R.	Smith, E. M.
Graham	McLachlan	Stevens
Hall	Montgomery	Ward
Hogg	Parata	Willis.
Kelly, W.	Pinkerton	Tellers.
Mackintosh	Reeves	Collins
McGowan	Seddon	Mills.
McKenzie, J.

NOES, 31.

Allen	Hutchison, W.	Pirani
Bell	Joyce	Saunders
Buchanan	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Buddo	Mackenzie, T.	Steward
Button	Maslin	Tanner
Crowther	Massey	Te Ao
Duthie	McGuire	Wilson.
Earnshaw	McNab
Fraser	Meredith	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Newman	Kelly, J. W.
Harris	O'Regan	Stout.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carroll	Morrison
Duthie	Buick
Green	Flatman
Larnach.	Hutchison, G.

Majority against, 10.

Words struck out, and amendment agreed to Clause 9.—Who may not be members of Committee.

Mr. R. McKENZIE moved to strike out the words, "or in partnership with any such person."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 46.

Allen	Houston	O'Regan
Bell	Hutchison, W.	Parata
Buchanan	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Buddo	Kelly, W.	Pirani
Button	Lang	Reeves
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Saunders
Carnell	Mackintosh	Seddon
Crowther	Maslin	Smith, J. G.
Earnshaw	Massey	Stevens
Fraser	McGowan	Steward
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Stout
Hall	McNab	Wilson.
Hall-Jones	Meredith
Harris	Mills	Tellers.
Heke	Montgomery	Russell, G. W.
Hogg	Newman	Tanner.

NOES, 5.

Collins	Tellers.
Duncan	Lawry
McKenzie, R.	Willis.

PAIRS.
For.	Against.
Buick	Duthie
Hutchison, G.	Larnach
Mitchelson.	Cadman.

Majority for, 41.

Words retained.

Mr. BUTTON moved to add the words, "in any such trade or business."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. COLLINS moved to strike out the words, "who is an auctioneer, commission agent, or broker."

Amendment agreed to, and words struck out.

Clause 10.—Penalties.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE moved, That the words "fifty pounds" be struck out, with the view of inserting the words "five pounds."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 22.

Allen	Hutchison, W.	Pirani
Beil	Joyce	Saunders
Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Smith, G. J.
Carnell	Maslin	Stout.
Earnshaw	McNab
Flatman	Meredith	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Russell, G. W.
Heke	Newman	Tanner.

NOES, 37.

Buchanan	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Button	Lang	Reeves
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Seddon
Carroll	Mackintosh	Smith, E. M.
Collins	Massey	Stevens
Crowther	McGowan	Steward
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Ward
Fraser	McKenzie, R.	Willis
Green	McLachlan	Wilson.
Hall	Mills
Harris	Montgomery	Tellers.
Hogg	O'Regan	Graham
Houston	Parata	Lawry.

Majority against, 15.

Words struck out.

Mr. SEDDON proposed, That the words "twenty pounds" be inserted in lieu of "fifty pounds."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 50.

Allen	Hall-Jones	McNab
Bell	Harris	Meredith
Buchanan	Heke	Mills
Buddo	Hogg	Montgomery
Cadman	Houston	Morrison
Carncross	Hutchison, G.	Newman
Carnell	Hutchison, W.	Pirani
Carroll	Kelly, J. W.	Reeves
Crowther	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Earnshaw	Mackenzie, T.	Russell, W. R.
Flatman	Mackintosh	Saunders
Fraser	McGowan	Seddon
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Hall	McLachlan	Smith, G. J.

Steward	Ward	Tellers.
Stout	Willis	Pinkerton
Tanner	Wilson.	Stevens.

NOES, 5.

Duncan	Tellers.
Green	Lawry
McKenzie, R.	O'Regan.

Majority for, 45.

Words inserted.

Clause 10 as amended agreed to.

Clause 11.—Opinion of member not to disqualify.

Mr. COLLINS moved, That the following words be added to the clause:—

"Notwithstanding anything in this section, no person shall be deemed eligible for a seat on any Licensing Committee who is known as a professional or paid advocate for or against the suppression of the liquor traffic."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 28.

Allen	Lang	Russell, W. R.
Buchanan	Lawry	Seddon
Carncross	McGowan	Stevens
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Ward
Graham	Mills	Willis.
Hall	Montgomery
Harris	Parata	Tellers.
Hogg	Pinkerton	Collins
Houston	Reeves	Smith, E. M.

NOES, 26.

Bell	Mackenzie, T.	Pirani
Button	Maslin	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Massey	Saunders
Earnshaw	McLachlan	Smith, G. J.
Fraser	McNab	Stout
Hall-Jones	Millar	Tanner.
Heke	Morrison	Tellers.
Hutchison, W.	Newman	Buddo
Kelly, J. W.	O'Regan	Meredith.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Buick
Duncan	Wilson
Kelly, W.	Joyce
Larnach.	Hutchison, G.

Majority for, 2.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12.—Constitution of Licensing Committee within ordinary districts. Provisions applicable to all Committees.

Mr. WILLIS moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 30.

Allen	Harris	McLachlan
Buchanan	Hogg	Millar
Button	Houston	Mills
Carncross	Hutchison, W.	Montgomery
Collins	Lang	Parata
Fraser	Mackenzie, T.	Pinkerton
Graham	Massey	Russell, W. R.
Hall	McGowan	Saunders

Smith, E. M.	Steward	Tellers.
Stevens	Tanner.	Crowther
		Willis.
NOES, 23.
Bell	McKenzie, J.	Russell, G. W.
Buddo	McKenzie, R.	Seddon
Carnell	Meredith	Smith, G. J.
Earnshaw	Morrison	Stout
Heke	Newman	Ward.
Kelly, J. W.	O'Regan	Tellers.
Lawry	Pirani	Hall-Jones
Maslin	Reeves	McNab.
PAIRS.
For.	Against.
Cadman	Buick
Duncan	Wilson
Kelly, W.	Joyce
Larnach.	Hutchison, G.
Majority for, 7.
Progress reported.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council transmitting reasons for insisting upon the Council's amendments in this Bill.

It was resolved to take the reasons into consideration at next sitting of the House.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council transmitting reasons for insisting upon its amendments in this Bill.

On the motion of Mr. J. MCKENZIE, it was resolved, That the House disagrees with the reasons; and that Mr. Montgomery, Mr. Duncan, and Mr. J. McKenzie be appointed Managers for a Conference.

The House adjourned at twenty minutes past two o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Tuesday, 9th October, 1894.

Third Reading—President of the Bank of New Zealand—J. C. Retter and Others—Public Works Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—Factories Bill—New Zealand Consols Bill—Adjournment.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THIRD READING.

Foreign Insurance Companies' Deposits Bill.

PRESIDENT OF THE BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Before proceeding to the business on the Order Paper I may say that I promised the Council some time ago that when the appointment of President of the Bank of New Zealand was made I would officially inform the Council of the fact. After considerable anxiety, the Government at last have been enabled to secure the services of a gentleman who, I believe, is in every possible way fitted for the position. We have secured the services of Mr. William Watson, who holds a very high position in a banking institution in this colony. The salary is to be £2,250 a year. I have not the pleasure of knowing this gentleman myself, but I am informed that the nomination is a very good one. There are gentlemen here who know him. I hope the appointment will give general satisfaction.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—May I ask my honourable friend what is the duration of the appointment?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—During good behaviour.

J. C. RETTER AND OTHERS.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. RIGG, it was ordered, That the petition of J. C. Retter and other residents of Horowhenua, together with the report of the Public Petitions Committee thereon, be referred to the Government for its consideration.

PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—This looks a voluminous document which I have in my hand, and which I ask the Council to read a second time. Before I proceed further, perhaps I may state that the Joint Statutes Revision Committee recommended that this Bill be allowed to proceed, with certain amendments. The Bill, as reported by the Joint Statutes Revision Committee, was as nearly perfect as any such piece of machinery could be, and I think it is rather improved, if possible, by the amendments made in another place. I might point out to the Council that this Bill was referred to the Joint Statutes Revision Committee on the 5th July last, and it was from time to time considered by that Committee up to the 16th August, so that it received more than ordinary attention from that Committee, which pays the most marked attention to every matter which is submitted to it. I take this opportunity of saying that I do not believe that any such work has ever been done by any Committee as has been done during the last two years by the Joint Statutes Revision Committee, and I also take the opportunity of expressing my own thanks to it, because very often measures imperfect in shape are brought before it. The ability evinced by the Committee merits the gratitude of everybody who has had to do with it. Several other heavy Bills being before that Committee, it was resolved that this Bill should be submitted to a special Committee. That special Committee consisted of two eminent lawyers—Mr. Bell and Mr. McNab—and they were ably assisted by the experience of a member of this Council, the Hon. Mr. Kelly; and I am bound to say that the labour bestowed upon that Bill deserves the thanks of this Council. The Bill then was referred from the special Committee, after being several weeks before them, to the Joint Statutes Revision Committee, and they produced the measure which is practically in the form now before us. The amendments, to which I will call attention presently, I think are rather improvements. There were probably some things which were overlooked. The Bill is absolutely a consolidation measure. It purports to deal with fourteen Acts dealing with the subject of public works. It repeals these fourteen Acts, with the exception of two sections of the Public Works Act of 1887—sections 22 and 23. The reason why these two sections were not repealed also is that they are dealt with in the Tramways Bill, which has passed through this Chamber and is now in another place. Should that measure become law these two sections will be cut out, of course; but, in order that no difficulty may arise, it has been thought better to leave them here for the present. The clauses to which I wish to call the attention of honourable members are as follows: Clause 5 contains the addition of the following words: "Except as provided in Part VI. hereof." Part VI. of the Act has reference to another matter entirely, and I think it is very wise that this provision should be inserted here. Next as to clause 19. This is a new clause, and is as follows:—

"Whenever it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Governor that any local authority has not made provision for the payment of the compensation which would probably be awarded for the land proposed to be taken, the Governor shall not issue the Proclamation taking such land until such time as he is satisfied that the local authority has made provision for the payment of such compensation."

This is a clause which requires very little explanation. It simply provides that a Proclamation taking land is not to issue until the Governor is satisfied that compensation has been provided for by the local authority. Clause 94, as honourable members will see, is a new clause. As sent from the Statutes Revision Committee, the time fixed was ten years. That has now been altered to fifteen years. Clause 99 is also a new clause, and is simply a definition of the word "Minister." Clause 115 is a clause to which I would call attention. It is a new clause, and is as follows: "Any local authority having control of a ferry may let such ferry for a period not exceeding three years." There was no such clause in the Bill as sent from the Statutes Revision Committee. Clause 117 provides that the local authority may agree as to gates on roads taken through private lands by agreement; and to that clause there is this proviso:—

"Provided always that permission to erect a swing-gate across any road shall not be granted unless and until after notice of any application in that behalf shall have been given at least once in each of two consecutive weeks in some newspaper circulating in the district, and the cost of all such notices shall be defrayed by the person applying for such permission."

That has been considered a desirable amendment. Clause 130 enables Road Boards to make by-laws in counties where the Counties Act is not in force.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON.—Is there not an alteration in clause 119?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I do not think there is an alteration in that clause. The next is clause 171. That is a new clause, and is as follows: "In cases where the making of a railway-line has cut off all access by road to land other than Crown land, the Government shall make such crossing or crossings as may be necessary to give access to such land." I do not think any exception can be taken to that. In clause 253 there are some additions. Subsections (2) and (3) are new. In the original Bill there were only subsection (1) and what is shown as subsection (4). The original clause 293, which had reference to Government railways, has been struck out as being unnecessary. These are the only alterations which were made by the House of Representatives in the Bill, which, as I said, was carefully considered by the Joint Statutes Revision Committee and by the sub-committee. Otherwise the law is exactly as it stands at present; but in this Bill it is better put together and worded than it was before, and the Bill is better now, I think, than when it reached the House of Representatives. As honourable members will recollect, there was a Public Works Bill introduced into the House, and when it reached the Committee it was found not to be in such perfect order as the Committee desired, and it was referred back, and the Public Works Bill (No. 2), which is this Bill, was introduced in its place. I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Is there not some alteration in original clause 32, about compensation?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Clause 32 was struck out altogether. I overlooked that.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I presume these are the alterations as made by the House of Representatives after the Bill came from the Committee. But it would be desirable to know what new matter was introduced by the Joint Statutes Revision Committee.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—No new matter.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—It would have been more satisfactory, I think, if the new matter introduced in the Bill in the other House—that is to say, the alterations made in the present law—had been indicated. That would have been very desirable. But there are two points which I should like to direct attention to. I had not the opportunity of being present very often on the Joint Statutes Revision Committee when this Bill was going through, as I had other Committees to attend to. The Public Works Act was originally introduced for the purpose of enabling the Government to take strips of land for railways and roads, and ordinary public purposes of that kind. But the provisions of this Bill will be incorporated under the Land for Settlements Bill, and it gives the right to take practically very large areas of land—thousands of acres. What would be perfectly proper, perhaps, when the amount of compensation is comparatively trifling would not, I think, be proper or desirable where the compensation may amount to hundreds of thousands of pounds—at all events, to considerable sums. These remarks are directed to section 76, which states that—

“(2.) Such award shall be final as regards the amount awarded, but shall not be deemed to be final as regards the right or title of the claimant or any other person to receive the same, or any part thereof.”

There are many cases in which it would be very desirable, where an obvious mistake has been made by the Court, that the Court should have power to correct the award. At present this Bill would practically place the Court in this position: that, however anxious the Court might be to amend its award, either through discovering some oversight or other circumstances that were not brought before the Court at the time, it would be unable to do so; and I think the Court should have the power, within thirty days after it has made its award, to review it or to alter it to meet any special circumstances which might arise. The other point I wish to direct attention to is this: The two parties in a Compensation Court are what are called the claimant and the respondent. In practice the respondent may have very little interest in the land taken. The land may be under mortgage to such an amount or extent that the mortgagor will not exert himself or go to any expense in getting evidence as to the value of the land; and it seems to me that the mortgagee, or any other person who has an interest in the land, should be entitled to be heard before the Court, and to give whatever evidence he can to satisfy the Court as to the value of the property affected. I am aware that it may be contended that a Court should not proceed to hear compensation cases until all the parties are before it; but in practice the only parties who do come before the Court are simply the complainant and the respondent; and other persons who may be substantially interested in the case are not recognised by the Court at all. I think it would be very desirable that notice should be given not only to the nominal owner of the land, but to all persons who may have mortgages and other charges on the land, and they should be allowed—at the risk, of course, of being liable for costs, if the Court thought proper—to bring forward whatever evidence they can as to the justice of their claim. I should like the honourable gentleman to direct his attention to that, so as to give all parties a right to be heard. The remarks that I have now made would not have been so material if the Bill were confined to its own legitimate object—namely, taking land for roads or railways, or other such purposes. But when the provisions of this Bill are to be incorporated under other Acts, and when large blocks of land may be taken, it seems to me that the provisions do not give those safeguards which should be given in dealing with such large transactions. The Bill is, I think, in many respects a very great improvement on the present law; but I confess I have not attempted to read the Bill through. It would have been more satisfactory, I have no doubt, if the departures from the present law had been pointed out. I believe the Joint Statutes Revision Committee did satisfy themselves as to how far this Bill departed from the present law.

Hon. W. Downie Stewart

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON.—Perhaps the Chairman of the Joint Statutes Revision Committee could tell us whether there is really any new matter introduced into this Bill. I have watched these Public Works Acts in all their various phases since the first introduction of the Act in 1876. In regard to the Bills this session, the first Bill was introduced into the other Chamber, and then the Public Works Bill (No. 2) was considered by the Joint Statutes Revision Committee, and a copy of that Bill I now hold in my hand. I see that the Public Works Bill (No. 2) was altered very largely by the Committee, and, as far as I am able to judge, it has been altered for the better. Still, there are a great many alterations that have been made in the Bill, and I think those alterations should be pointed out to the Council. The honourable member opposite will see that the clause which I referred to has been altered.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Which is that?

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON.—Clause 119. It is not a very material alteration. I should like to know from the honourable gentleman, when he is replying, whether there is any new matter in the Bill. The Chairman of the Committee, I believe, is present, and perhaps he will give us that information.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—I may state that a sub-committee was appointed, of which my honourable friend Mr. Kelly was a member, and he will be able to tell honourable members any little matters of detail which were dealt with by that Committee; but as a question of principle there was no new matter introduced into the Bill. There is one amendment, perhaps the most important, and that is the new clause with regard to the taking of land for defence purposes. That is a most important matter. That provision was not in the Public Works Act before. With regard to the Bill generally, there are a few small amendments which are always made in consolidation Bills, but as a matter of general principle I think, as the Hon. the Attorney-General has said, the principles of the Bill have not been altered. The clause which was referred to just now as having been struck out was the one with regard to compensation. However, that is a matter for consideration when we come to that clause in Committee. To fulfil the intention both of this Council and the House of Representatives, part of the clause struck out should be reinstated.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—The clause which was struck out by the other branch of the Legislature referred to the taking of reserves and endowment lands without compensation. The Statutes Revision Committee erased that clause. Therefore the House only confirmed the decision of the Committee on the matter. With regard to new matter, of course in a large Bill like this there is always a considerable amount of new matter introduced, because many of the clauses are redrafted, and have been put in what we consider to be better technical language. The whole Bill has been readjusted; clauses have been put in their proper places, and under their proper heads. It includes a better definition of "cattle trespassing on roads," provides more effectively for damage done to roads, and gives a simpler and more effective form of notice. It also enlarges the sphere of the local authority, and includes Education Boards. Education Boards may take land for school-sites. Generally speaking, there have been no large amendments made. The Bill, I think, is much more perfect and satisfactory than when it was introduced.

Bill read the second time.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 42.—Advances on mortgages. Amount of advance.

The Hon. Mr. KERR moved, That the word "three" be inserted in lieu of the word "five," struck out, so as to make the amount read "three thousand pounds."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word 'three' be inserted."

AYES, 14.

Barnicoat	Jenkinson	Montgomery
Bolt	Jennings	Rigg
Buckley	Kelly	Taiaroa
Dignan	Kerr	Whitmore.
Feldwick	McCullough

NOES, 18.

Acland	McLean	Richardson
Bonar	Morris	Stevens
Bowen	Oliver	Stewart
Holmes	Peacock	Swanson
Kenny	Pharazyn	Whyte
MacGregor	Reynolds	Williams.

Majority against, 4.

Amendment negatived.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT moved, That the word "two" be inserted.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 15.

Acland	Feldwick	McCullough
Barnicoat	Jenkinson	Montgomery
Bolt	Jennings	Rigg
Buckley	Kelly	Taiaroa
Dignan	Kerr	Whitmore.

NOES, 16.

Bonar	Oliver	Stevens
Bowen	Peacock	Stewart
Holmes	Pharazyn	Swanson
MacGregor	Reynolds	Whyte
McLean	Richardson	Williams.
Morris

Majority against, 1.

Amendment negatived.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN moved, That the word "one" be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 43.—Conditions subject to which advances will be made.

The Hon. Captain MORRIS moved, That the word "two-thirds" be struck out, with a view to inserting "one-half."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 10.

Barnicoat	Jenkinson	Montgomery
Buckley	Kelly	Rigg
Dignan	Kerr	Taiaroa.
Feldwick

NOES, 18.

Acland	McLean	Richardson
Bolt	Morris	Stevens
Bonar	Oliver	Stewart
Bowen	Peacock	Swanson
Holmes	Pharazyn	Whyte
MacGregor	Reynolds	Williams.

PAIR.

For.	Against.
McCullough.	Ormond.

Majority against, 8.

Word struck out.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK moved, That the word "three-fifths" be inserted in lieu of "two-thirds."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 12.

Barnicoat	Feldwick	Kerr
Bolt	Jenkinson	Montgomery
Buckley	Kelly	Rigg
Dignan	Kenny	Taiaroa.

NOES, 16.

Acland	Morris	Stevens
Bonar	Oliver	Stewart
Bowen	Pharazyn	Swanson
Holmes	Reynolds	Whyte
MacGregor	Richardson	Williams.
McLean

PAIR.

For.	Against.
McCullough.	Ormond.

Majority against, 4.

Word not inserted.

Amendment to insert "one-half" agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER moved, That all the words after the word "security" be struck out, for the purpose of inserting other words.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 12.

Barnicoat	Feldwick	McCullough
Bolt	Jenkinson	Montgomery
Buckley	Kelly	Rigg
Dignan	Kerr	Taiaroa.

NOES, 16.

Acland	Bowen	MacGregor
Bonar	Holmes	McLean

Morris	Reynolds	Stewart
Oliver	Richardson	Swanson
Peacock	Stevens	Whyte.
Pharazyn

Majority against, 4.

Words struck out.

Progress reported.

FACTORIES BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives desiring a Conference with the Council on the Council's amendments in this Bill.

On the motion of the Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART, the Hon. Mr. Oliver, the Hon. Mr. MacGregor, and the Hon. Mr. Stewart were appointed Managers on behalf of the Council at the Conference.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives desiring a Conference with the Council on the Council's amendments in this Bill.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. BOWEN, the Hon. Mr. Stewart, the Hon. Mr. MacGregor, the Hon. Mr. Stevens, and the Hon. Mr. Bowen were appointed Managers on behalf of the Council at the Conference.

ADJOURNMENT.

On the question, That the Council do now adjourn,

The Hon. Mr. RIGG suggested that the Council should sit that evening, and then adjourn till Thursday. He might point out that next day was Eight-hours Day, and was a public holiday. There were to be a procession and sports and other amusements, and some of the members of the Council would like to go and take part in the proceedings.

An Hon. MEMBER.—We have nothing to do to-night.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said, that being so, he intended to call for a division on the adjournment, in order to test the feeling of the Council on the eight-hours question.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said they had nothing to do that evening.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG asked if the honourable gentleman would agree to adjourn till Thursday.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said, then he would move, as an amendment, That the Council, at its rising, adjourn till Thursday.

The Council divided on the question, "That the word 'now,' proposed to be omitted, stand part of the question."

AYES, 26.

Acland	Kelly	Stevens
Barnicoat	Kenny	Stewart
Bolt	McLean	Swanson
Bonar	Montgomery	Taiaroa
Bowen	Oliver	Walker, L.
Buckley	Peacock	Whitmore
Dignan	Pharazyn	Whyte
Feldwick	Reynolds	Williams.
Holmes	Richardson

NOES, 4.

Jenkinson	Kerr	Rigg.
Jennings

Majority for, 22.

Amendment negatived, and motion agreed to.

The Council adjourned at five minutes past five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, 9th October, 1894.

First Reading—Second Readings—Third Readings—
Judge Barton Correspondence—Land for Settlements Bill—Audit Office and Public Trust Office—Factories Bill—New Zealand Consols Bill—Native Land Court Bill—Government Railways Bill—Licensing Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Ministerial Residences Sale Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Offensive Publications Bill, Indictable Offences Summary Jurisdiction Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Offensive Publications Bill, Mining Companies Bill.

JUDGE BARTON CORRESPONDENCE.

On the motion of Mr. DUTHIE, it was ordered, That the further correspondence to date with Judge Barton, being a continuation of Return 169g, be laid on the table.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

Mr. J. McKENZIE asked permission to move a motion without notice in connection with a resolution come to at an early hour that morning on this Bill. He thought it was necessary this should be brought down, in order that the privileges of the House might be closely guarded. What he asked the House to do was to rescind the resolution come to that morning in connection with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill. After considering the matter carefully, he thought it was better that this question should be postponed until such time as the question raised as between the two Houses in connection with the privileges of the House was first settled by a Conference, which he understood his colleague would move for immediately. He wished, therefore, to move, That the resolution passed at yesterday's meeting, requesting a Conference on the Legislative Council's message insisting on its amendments in the Land for Settlements Bill, be rescinded, and that the consideration of the message be postponed until the House has dealt with the Council's message insisting on its amendments in the New Zealand Consols Bill.

Sir R. STOUT asked what was the resolution which it was proposed to rescind.

Mr. SPEAKER said that at two o'clock that morning he read a message from the Legislative Council intimating that they insisted on their amendments in the Land for Settlements Bill, which amendments the House had regarded as being an infringement of the privileges of the House. A Conference was unexpectedly asked for; and the Minister, at his (Mr. Speaker's) suggestion, now asked the House to rescind the resolution until such time as the House had considered how it would deal with the numerous other questions of a similar nature raised in connection with other financial measures.

Captain RUSSELL did not offer any objection, but wished to point out that the bringing-down of messages from the Legislative Council, or any other business, when the House was fairly worked out, as it must be at two o'clock in the morning, was prejudicial to the proper conduct of business and to the interest of the country. He therefore again raised his voice against what he must call a scandalous condition of things, under which members were obliged to sit night after night until they got into such a state of exhaustion and confusion that it was impossible to know what was going on. Day after day they found themselves getting more and more into that condition in which it was impossible to know what they were doing, and in which they were unable to give proper attention to the business that they were sent to the House to do.

Mr. SEDDON thought it was only fair, as a reflection was cast by the remarks of the honourable gentleman upon Mr. Speaker, to state that in what they had done at the previous sitting they had only followed the usual custom. Messages came down from the Legislative Council, and the rule was to lay them before the House at the earliest possible opportunity. The moving of the resolution it was now desired to rescind was an oversight, the other Bills not being thought of at the time. There was no harm done, and if it had been done at half-past five instead of at half-past two the same course would have been adopted, and he had no doubt would have been agreed to by the House. He was sorry the honourable member admitted the sad condition in which he was at the present time; but, at all events, he (Mr. Seddon) thought it better that the course should be followed which was indicated by his colleague, and that this question of privilege should be dealt with as a whole, and not piecemeal. There were two or three Bills in respect of which the privileges of the House had been infringed.

Mr. SPEAKER wished to state that the messages from the Legislative Council reached the House when it was in Committee on the Licensing Bill, and he could not communicate these messages until the House resumed. The Standing Orders required that messages from the Council should be communicated at the earliest moment after they were received, which was done on the House resuming from Committee.

Captain RUSSELL said that nothing was further from his intention than to reflect on anything whatever that Mr. Speaker had done. He had merely complained of the business being conducted in such a way as to compel them to inquire into a question of that sort at that time. It seemed to him a rather dangerous proceeding they were asked to agree to that afternoon. The House came to a resolution yesterday, and they were asked now to rescind a resolution of the House by motion brought down without any notice whatever. He did not think that the honourable gentleman should be allowed to ask the House to do this.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was a matter affecting the privileges of the House, and could come on without notice.

Mr. ALLEN said that surely the rescinding without notice of motion of a resolution passed by the House was something more than a question of privilege. If it were done in one case it might be done in a great many others, and the consequence might be extremely serious. A full House might one afternoon or evening pass a resolution, and the next day or the next morning, in an almost empty House, a motion might be brought on without notice and carried rescinding that resolution. It seemed to him unaccountable altogether, and, as he understood the matter, without the consent of every member of the House the question asking the House to rescind the resolution deliberately agreed to yesterday could not be put. He protested against the proceeding; and whether or not the raising of his voice as a "No" against the putting of the question was of any avail, he did so, and did it deliberately.

Mr. BUCHANAN said any one who had taken a part in the proceedings of the House for any length of time must know that Mr. Speaker followed only the usual practice that morning in communicating the message to the House from the Upper House; but the proper proceeding for the Minister in charge at the time was to move that the message be taken into consideration at some later period — namely, when more members were present, and, presumably, in a fit condition to do business, and not, as was the case that morning, with an almost empty House, and members exhausted. The Premier, in his jocular way, expressed his regret that the leader on that side of the House should have pleaded fatigue as an objection to proceeding with business. The honourable gentleman himself was not easily overcome with work, but any one noticing him for the last two or three nights must have seen the inroads which excessive work and want of sleep were making even upon him. The Premier was often asleep, or only half-awake, when the utmost vigilance was absolutely necessary. He joined with the honourable member for Bruce in protesting generally against such methods of doing business. He did not wish to offer any objections to this particular item, but as a precedent it was a very dangerous one, and should be discontinued.

Mr. J. McKENZIE did not think there was any necessity for all this indignation on the part of the honourable member for Wairarapa and the honourable member for Bruce. If there was anything wrong in connection with this matter he took the blame of it at once. The message from the Upper House came there, as was stated, at an early hour in the morning, and he got up and moved that Managers be appointed. That was all that was done. On reconsideration of the whole subject that day in connection with the action of the Upper House in regard to this and other Bills, the Government thought it best this motion should be rescinded. He did not think it at all necessary for those two honourable gentlemen to be so indignant over this matter. If they had been kept there until a late hour that morning the honourable member for Wairarapa had a great deal to do with it, and the honourable gentleman was responsible for a good deal of the delay that had taken place.

Mr. BUCHANAN, as a matter of personal explanation, had no objection to the motion. His objections were of a different character; and he would remind the honourable gentleman that he had said nothing at all on the previous night about the Licensing Bill, but had kept absolute silence.

Motion agreed to.

AUDIT OFFICE AND PUBLIC TRUST OFFICE.

Mr. WARD.—In accordance with notice on Supplementary Order Paper No. 83, I desire to move a motion in connection with this matter. The motion is as follows: This House regrets that the Controller and Auditor-General should, under the circumstances which he has related, have regarded himself as justified in suspending the performance of any duties imposed upon him by statute. I think, Sir, that honourable members will agree with me it is regrettable that there have been strained relations existing between the Audit Department and the Public Trust Office Department for some considerable time past. Although I regret that this is so, I do not think that the Audit Department is justified in suspending the responsible duties of audit which are thrown upon that office by statute in regard to any department with which it may for the time being have disagreed. It appears to me to be necessary in the first place for this House to give expression to its opinion that the audit of the Public Trust Department should be continued. I merely wish to point out what has taken place between these two departments during the last few years. In 1891 a Royal Commission was appointed for the purpose of investigating complaints made against the Public Trust Department, and, as a result of that investigation, the contentions of the Audit Department were not upheld. Legislation followed, removing the control of the Audit, and dispensing with some portions of the system then existing, with a view of effecting necessary reform.

Mr. Buchanan

Honourable members may recollect that for the last three years the Public Trust Office system of accounts has been subject to very strong adverse comments from the Audit Department; and, in consequence of this, the Government considered it desirable this session that a Commission should be appointed for the purpose of investigating the complaints as far as the Public Trust Office was concerned. In the selection of gentlemen to perform that duty the Government purposely selected one who was known not to favour this side of politics—a man who occupied a first-class position as an accountant in this city, Mr. Kember. That gentleman was one of those selected for the purpose of making an investigation, together with an experienced accountant from the Government Insurance Department. The result of that investigation has been placed on the table of the House; and that result, which recommended certain changes of systems, did not uphold the complaints that were made against the Public Trust Office by the Audit Department. The special point to which the Auditor-General has taken exception is the doubt cast upon the veracity of the Audit Department official who has conducted this branch of the business of the department. It is, of course, a proper thing for the Auditor-General to uphold an officer of his department, and particularly to take exception to anything in the shape of a charge against that officer's veracity; but, although the Auditor-General is justified in upholding his officers to the utmost of his ability, I do not think it was ever contemplated by this House that the fact of an officer's veracity being called in question should be a sufficient reason for setting aside the important duties which the Audit Department ought to exercise over another department over which audit inspection was necessary. Inquiry into the officer's veracity would be quite right and fair, but the duties of the Audit should not cease on this account. Now, Sir, it seems to me, in connection with this matter, that, as there is distinctly some friction between the Audit Department and the Public Trust Office, it must, in the interest of both departments, come to an end; and I think it would be an easy solution of the difficulty, and is the common practice in other departments, and in the ordinary undertakings of every-day life, that where undue friction does exist some officer should be changed in order to prevent the continuance of that friction. It would seem to me to have been better had the Audit Department changed the officer conducting the Public Trust Office audit business and given a fair trial to another officer before withholding the examination of the Public Trust Office accounts. I do not think—I do not express any opinion upon the question of the officer's veracity, nor reflect upon him in any way—that the course taken by the Auditor-General was a justifiable one, and I only regret that the Controller has thought it necessary, in the interests of his own department, to adopt it. I am of opinion that [the calling into question of the veracity of one of his officers is not a sufficient reason for withholding the audit of the Public Trust Office accounts. Speaking from my own experience, the Public Trustee is a very able man, a man who devotes himself zealously to the discharge of his duties; and, whatever objection may be taken to his system of conducting the business of his department, he is thoroughly in earnest and is a capable and straightforward man, actuated, I believe, by every desire to do his best for the proper discharge of his important duties. On the other hand, the Controller is an estimable and honourable man, and is, I am sure, animated by the same desire in the discharge of his important duties, and is, I know, anxious to see that the audit of the Public Trust Office accounts should be properly carried out on the lines which he has laid down. But as the result of the Commission's report in 1891 the system of audit was changed by this House, and, that being so, the Audit Department ought loyally and willingly to see that that system of audit was carried out strictly, but without friction. There seems to me not a sufficiency of reasons adduced for a further investigation into the carrying-on of the business of the Public Trust Office, inasmuch as two examinations of its affairs have taken place during the last two years. First, there was the Commission of 1891, which made a very searching inquiry, and recently there was the investigation specially into the accounts of the department. And this is to a large extent a business department, dependent upon the good will and confidence of the public for its support. It is not desirable that the business of a department such as this should be continuously before the country in the way of fault-finding, unless there is something absolutely to justify it; and, if there is justification for such reports about this department, then the officer in control of the Public Trust Office ought not to be continued in the position he fills. I now desire to move the motion notice of which I have given on the Supplementary Order Paper.

Sir R. STOUT.—I understood the honourable member was going to move that the matter be referred to the Public Accounts Committee. You are not going to do that?

Mr. WARD.—No.

Sir R. STOUT.—Then, it is a most unfortunate position for this House to be placed in. Here is this House asked practically to pass a vote of censure on the Auditor-General, without having any inquiry—any evidence or justification. This is simply strangling the Audit Department. What is that department? A department of this House controlled practically by this House. It is beyond the control of the Minister. Its sole duty is to report to this House, and the Minister is not justified in asking us to pass this motion without affording us an opportunity of seeing who is to blame. You are simply destroying your Audit Department. I object altogether to the proposal of the Colonial Treasurer; and I will move, as an amendment, That the whole question of the dispute be referred to the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. WARD.—You agree that the audit should be suspended in the meantime.

Sir R. STOUT.—What would this suspension mean? Suspension for a week: and there is no harm in that. It seems to me that the honourable member has overlooked the position of this matter, as the suggestion he has made censures the Audit Department, and says that the Audit Inspector should be shifted and a new officer appointed. What will happen if you send a further Audit officer to the Public Trust Office? What would any Audit Inspector expect? That, unless he could make things pleasant for the Public Trust Office, he would be shifted also, and there would be further trouble. I say it is the duty of the House to investigate the matter, and that can only be done by sending it to the Public Accounts Committee, and by the taking of evidence in regard to the whole matter. I am not going to deal with the question of the report of the Royal Commission, or of the report of the accountants who lately examined the accounts of the office. I have not examined fully the last report of Messrs. Todd and Kemmer, but that report is not sufficient to enable one to come to any conclusion as to who was right or wrong on the matter in dispute. But I consider that the whole matter in dispute between the Auditor-General and the Public Trust Office ought to be sent to the Public Accounts Committee, in order that the matter may be fully investigated; and, if the Committee is not sufficiently strong in regard to accounts to deal with the question, then it may be strengthened by adding other members of the House to it who have a knowledge of accounts.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I think it must be a matter for extreme regret to find the Colonial Treasurer of this colony taking up his present attitude, and asking the House to carry what is practically a vote of censure upon an officer who for so many years has held such a high position, inside the House and outside of it, as the Auditor-General. Had the honourable gentleman done his duty he would have refused to receive correspondence couched in such language as was sent to him in his position as Colonial Treasurer by the Public Trustee. The Colonial Treasurer should know, if he does not, that the dispute as to the auditing of the Public Trust Office accounts on the present occasion is not the only difference which has arisen between the Auditor-General and the Public Trust Office. On a previous occasion the Hon. Mr. Ballance absolutely refused to receive correspondence of the unseemly character now sent by the Public Trustee to the head of his department, insisting that the tone of it should be altered; and the honourable gentleman should have similarly refused to receive such correspondence as is now laid on the table. The honourable gentleman also referred to the Commission which has lately reported on the accounts of the Public Trust Office. Even "the man in the street" could have told him that the report of the Commission would be in the direction of exonerating the Public Trustee and of condemning the Auditor-General. That this would be so was a matter of confident anticipation amongst all business-men in Wellington who had paid any attention to the subject, and the honourable gentleman should therefore have known that the report would be of the class known as "made specially to order." I regret to have to say so much, but the facts are too notorious to be for a moment in doubt, and many members of this House are perfectly well aware of them. I hope, therefore, that the amendment moved by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) will be accepted, because I think it would be a flagrant wrong to pass what is practically a vote of censure upon the Auditor-General under the circumstances. I am not for a moment saying that the Auditor-General in this matter has taken the best course that could be followed; I scarcely think that he has done so; but I do say that he is not at all deserving of the censure which would necessarily be conveyed by the passing of such a resolution as this. What does the Treasurer fear from a reference of the whole thing to the Public Accounts Committee, in order that they may examine the whole of the facts of the case from the beginning, and present to this House an authoritative report based on the evidence? It is utterly wrong to ask the House to pass this resolution with no evidence before it except that which is contained in the correspondence which was laid on the table some time ago, together with that recently furnished. I therefore hope the honourable gentleman will agree to the amendment.

Mr. DUTHIE.—I regret, with the Colonial Treasurer, that this very important department, the Public Trust Office, has been so much before the public, which must be disastrous to its success; and, if matters are not very speedily improved, it is impossible to expect that people will make wills putting their affairs in the hands of such an institution, unless it is conducted very differently, and so restores that confidence which is essential. So far as this matter in dispute is concerned, the Auditor-General is a gentleman of high standing and experience, a gentleman of historical repute in this colony, and I have nothing to say about him; yet one cannot shut one's eyes to the fact that, as far as my experience in local bodies is concerned, and in regard to the question of such audit, he is a man of a great many "fads." As a case in point I refer to the experience, in bygone years, in the Wellington Harbour Board. This is only a small matter. The Auditor-General, however, is a gentleman who has conscientiously discharged his duties, and I do not intend my remarks in any manner of censure. I further agree with the Colonial Treasurer when he says that the Public Trustee is an earnest and conscientious man; but I think at the same time—one cannot help saying so after reading his correspondence—that he also is a man full of "fads." His correspondence with the Auditor-General shows him to be an exceptionally contentious, not to say a cantankerous man, unfitted for the position of Public Trustee. A man of that disposition would wreck any office.

Mr. Buchanan

If members will closely follow his train of thought in these letters they must be convinced as to how unsuited he is for such a position. The report of the auditors on the dispute is exceedingly weak; it does not go to the bottom of the question. I think, therefore, the Public Accounts Committee ought to look into this department; and it is the duty of the Colonial Treasurer, in the ordinary course, to give that Committee the opportunity of examining this matter closely, as the public interests at stake are large. That Committee has the best means of investigating it, and I hope the Colonial Treasurer will accept the amendment without making it a party question.

Mr. SEDDON.—There are two questions involved in this matter. The amendment deals with one question, and the resolution of the Colonial Treasurer with another. The amendment is that the matter in dispute as between the Public Trustee and the Auditor-General be referred to the Public Accounts Committee. The resolution of the Colonial Treasurer deals entirely outside of the dispute as between the two departments. It deals with the question which I say is of importance to this House, and which I say should be dealt with at once, because we have the fact before us that a most important branch of the service, one in which the greatest public confidence should exist, is not being audited, and, if that department is to remain for an indefinite period without its accounts being audited, I say that such a state of things should not continue. What would be thought if the whole of our railway service and postal service were allowed to remain without an audit, simply because of a query having been raised as to some particular officer's truthfulness, it having been impugned? If that officer, of his own motion, refuses to audit the accounts, is that department to be allowed to remain unaudited for an indefinite period? I am sorry to say notice has been given that no audit is going on; and the question is, Are we to remain here in our places and not take any action? The Auditor-General is a parliamentary officer; and supposing this had occurred after the end of the session of Parliament, what would then have been the position? I say that officer is not justified in taking upon himself under such circumstances to absolutely refuse to perform the duties which devolve upon him by statute, and which, if not performed, may lead to serious difficulty. That is the position now before the House; and I would also say that the honourable member, in moving the amendment, has admitted, so far as the Public Accounts Committee are concerned, that in dealing with accounts of the nature of these accounts it would, perhaps, be required that the constitution of that Committee should be considered.

Sir R. STOUT.—I did not express any opinion.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable gentleman said the Committee would bear strengthening.

Sir R. STOUT.—I said that if necessary it could be strengthened.

Mr. SEDDON.—The Colonial Treasurer stated on Friday that, in his opinion, there should be a Select Committee appointed to deal with the question. That indicates that only such members as would be well up in accounts would be selected for the purpose; and I think, myself, that, of the two courses, it would be preferable to appoint a Select Committee, rather than to strengthen the Public Accounts Committee, as mentioned by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). In the meantime, however, the Auditor-General has refused to go on with the audit of the Public Trust accounts; and I think Parliament is called upon to take action, and, no matter how unpleasant it may be to us, we have to do our duty. I admit that the Auditor-General is an old and deserving officer, and that he has done good service to the colony. I have for him the highest respect, and I would not be one to cause him any pain; but I say that the course he has adopted under the existing circumstances is a mistaken one.

3.30. And as he has taken this attitude we ought to say that we do not approve of this course. We have a right to do that, and then to deal with the matters in dispute. The Auditor-General is not satisfied with the report of the Royal Commission. There is no doubt that is at the bottom of this. I only say that in the selection of the gentlemen who were on that Commission the Government obtained the fullest information, and were under the impression that they were obtaining men in whom the public would have confidence—that they would be conscientious in the discharge of their duties as Commissioners. I do not, myself, think that the remarks made by the honourable member for Wairarapa are justified. I say they contained reflections cast upon two men of standing, two competent accountants, who had, we believe, gone into this question fairly, impartially, and conscientiously, and had sent in their report to His Excellency. I think, when we have men who perform their duties in that way, it is very hard to have it said in this House, without any proof whatever, that “the man in the street” could have told the House, or its members, what the report would be. I say that expressions of that kind—that charges of that kind that have been made, really are such that at all events we should not approve. A statement has been made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie), who has told the House, practically, that the Auditor-General is not fit for his position, and that the Public Trustee is not fit for his. That is what the honourable gentleman has told the House. I think he has told us they are both “faddists.” That is a term that might be applied to many honourable members; but will the honourable gentleman tell the House that they are not fit to be here? I say it may be, and sometimes truthfully is, said that our “faddists” are simply advanced thinkers: and, Sir, I think it is just as well that we should have advanced thinkers in the colony. I myself say that both the Auditor-General and the Public Trustee are competent, and that both men are conscientious; but we cannot have all men cast in the same mould—the same dry, hard, matter-of-fact mould as the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie). Of course, we differ in reading these papers, and in reading the correspondence different men will hold different views. Men of my honourable friend's training and way of thought will think as he thinks; others again will hold entirely different opinions. In fact, I undertake to say that if the honourable member for Wellington City and the honourable member for Wairarapa were to discuss this question they would differ entirely in their opinions as to the relative merits of the Public Trustee and the Auditor-General. But, still, that is outside the present question altogether. Regarding the matter in dispute, I say there is no objection whatever to refer it to a Select Committee; but that is outside the question raised to-day in the resolution. The resolution is, “That this House regrets that the Auditor-General should, under the circumstances which he has related, have regarded himself as justified in suspending the performance of any duties imposed upon him by statute.” Sir, what would be the proper amendment or addition? I say it is, “That this House is of opinion that the Auditor-General should resume his duties, and proceed with the audit of the Public Trust accounts.” That could not be refused. The alternative is to withdraw the amendment, and to carry the resolution. In reading it I hope it does not, and I am sure the Colonial Treasurer does not mean that this resolution should, cast any undue reflection upon the Auditor-General. It expresses regret, but I do not think anything could be nicer or milder than that, at the same time pointing out what we believe to have been a mistake. It is an error of judgment on the part of the Auditor-General to have taken the course he has taken. We have a right to say so, and it is our duty to say so. Then, as to settling the dispute definitely between the two departments, we have now the benefit of the report of the Royal Commission. We can place that before the Committee, as mentioned by the Colonial Treasurer, and, at all events, we should not be brought into friction on the two questions. There is matter for inquiry. If the House is not satisfied with the report of the Royal Commission, well and good. Let it go to a Select Committee, and in the selection of that Committee there should be no haste. It ought to be carefully selected, and composed of members of the House who are competent, and who are experts in the particular duty that will devolve upon them. Of course, I take that to be a matter which my friend the Colonial Treasurer would see to on moving the resolution; but in the meantime I think we ought to say that the Auditor-General has committed an error of judgment in suspending the auditing of the accounts of the Public Trust. If this is allowed to go on it may happen that other branches of the service will come into conflict sometimes with the Auditor-General. There is conflict sometimes between the Audit and the local authorities, but in such a case the Auditor-General would simply apply to this House to protect him. In this case he has simply refused to do his duty, and has told the House that he has not done it; and I say we have a duty to perform, and that is, to tell him that in this matter he has committed an error of judgment. We respect him, and our confidence in him is not shaken, but at the same time there has been an error of judgment committed: in fact, I would say myself he has acted, I think, childishly in this case, and not as I should expect a man with such large and varied experience to act. All the same, we have our duty to perform, and I would ask the House to carry the resolution, and then, with regard to the matter in dispute, to refer that to a Select Committee.

Mr. BELL.—Sir, I am not doubtful, after what the Premier has said, and the way in which the Colonial Treasurer has spoken, that they will see their way to frame this resolution in different terms. The terms in which it has been proposed are such as the House uses to express a vote of censure on one of its members, and, from what they have said, I do not think there is any desire on their part, as I believe there certainly is none on the part of the House, to express anything which might be taken by the gentleman referred to as a vote of censure. That gentleman has been a member of this House. He was the first Prime Minister of the colony. He has served the colony in his present office for, I think, thirty years; and, if he has on this occasion acted hastily and unwisely, we ought not, I submit to the House, to express an opinion in the terms that the Colonial Treasurer has chosen. I am very anxious that this question between the Public Trustee and the Auditor-General should not be used so as to make the Controller and Auditor-General a shuttlecock for the battledoors of the Government and the Opposition. The Auditor-General is an officer of this House—the only officer, indeed, whom this House has outside its own walls. He stands between the Government and Parliament. He reports to Parliament upon the accounts of the Government, and is entirely independent of the Government. On this occasion, a difference having arisen during the session of Parliament between him and a department whose accounts he audits, he has reported the occurrence and asked the direction of the House. This House may give him a direction without the use of terms implying censure. My opinion on the procedure which the Controller should adopt is not of much weight, but I feel bound to express it, as I might otherwise appear to be an advocate of the Audit Department. I do not, myself, think that the audit ought to cease because the auditor is insulted. But this House, as my honourable friend the member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) pointed out, will incur some danger if it acts upon a hasty judgment on the matter so submitted to it, because, inevitably, if a quarrel arises between the Auditor and a department, if the Auditor makes a mistake, and appeals to this House, and the House, at the instance of the Government, immediately rebukes its officer, it will make the officers of the Audit far too careful of giving offence. The Audit officers must necessarily give offence in many cases, and they do give offence. They give offence to the local authorities, to the departments, and to the Government. My honourable friend the Colonial Treasurer must know that between the departments and the Audit constant questions arise, and it is very necessary that this House should not assume hastily that the Audit officers are wrong. I feel bound to admit that both the Colonial Treasurer and the Prime Minister spoke in relation to this matter not at all from the point of view of defenders of the Public Trustee as against the Controller and Auditor-General; and, except so far as the language of the Premier was somewhat disrespectful to the Auditor-General, I should have found no reason on my part to object to what he said. But surely when a question of this kind arises our first duty is to refer it to a Committee. If we proceed to determine it in this way, on so short a notice as has been given by the Colonial Treasurer, and by a resolution, without any inquiry or report of a Committee of this House, we shall be setting a very dangerous precedent. Understand me, I am not suggesting that in this case the matter is one which it is difficult to decide, but the precedent is one which it is dangerous to establish—namely, that where the Auditor-General refers a question to this House, the House should deal with it summarily by resolution, upon the motion of the Government, adversely to the Controller and Auditor-General. Wherever we find reason to differ from the Controller and Auditor-General, I venture to submit to my honourable friends opposite we should do it with the gravest caution, after taking the most careful method of ascertaining what is the exact position. I venture to suggest that something like what was suggested by the Premier in one part of his speech might be adopted by the House—namely, that the motion of the honourable member for Wellington City—that the matter be referred to the Public Accounts Committee—should be passed, with the addition, "That this House is of opinion that in the meantime the audit should be proceeded with." That would avoid any expression of censure, and express the feeling of the House. I should be only too happy to support that; but if it is put in the form proposed by the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer, whether it is so intended or not, it cannot be but that it will convey a censure upon an old and distinguished servant of the colony and of Parliament, which we ought to be very slow to permit. I hope, therefore, my honourable friend will adopt some other language in which to express the resolution.

Mr. WARD.—I may inform the House that there is no intention, in the motion which was submitted, of suggesting anything in the nature of a reflection or that is intended to reflect upon the Controller and Auditor-General. If honourable members will look at the correspondence that reached the Government on the 3rd instant from the Auditor-General they will see that he indicated that it was his intention to cease auditing the Public Trust Office until after an investigation had taken place by the House. The communication from the Public Trustee was not received till Saturday at five o'clock, and, that being so, the time at the disposal of the Government was very short. The Government was very anxious to place the matter before the House, and it has therefore been brought up at as early a date as possible. I admit that the time has been very short. The Government would be very sorry to carry anything in the shape of a reflection upon the Auditor-General, or upon any other officer who is discharging his duties. If it is thought this resolution is in the direction of casting a vote of censure on the Controller and Auditor-General, I would suggest that, now I have placed the matter before the House, if some honourable member would move the adjournment of the debate, I would go further into the matter with a view of submitting a modified resolution, as it is very far from my wish to hurt the feelings of any officer in the service. The matter is, of course, a very important one. If members will look at the correspondence it will disclose the fact that the Controller and Auditor-General is not satisfied with the report made on the Public Trust Office by the two accountants selected to report, and the main point on which exception is taken is the reflection on the Audit officer. I make no remark on that matter, further than to say that that is not a good and sufficient reason for withholding the audit of the Public Trust Office accounts. I should just like to say, in connection with this matter, that I think the honourable member for Wairarapa was very unjust to the gentlemen selected. He could not have read the report of those who reported on the Public Trust Office.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I have read it.

Mr. WARD.—Then, I am very much surprised, because the honourable gentleman stated that "the man in the street" said the report would be made to order.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Allow me to amend my statement. The expression "the man in the street" was perhaps not the most appropriate term. I did not mean exactly that, and I now wish to say that business-man after business-man in Wellington, in the best position to know, voluntarily came to me and predicted what the nature of the report would be; and their prediction has turned out, I am sorry to say, too true.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman has, I think, made it rather worse, because he said before that "the man in the street" said the report would be made to order. Now he says that business experts stated that would be so. Now, I invite the honourable gentleman to look at the report sent in by Messrs. Kember and Todd, and he will find they made several recommendations in the direction of changes in the system of the Public Trust Office. The honourable gentleman says the report was made to order. Now, the two accountants, in the report, made one or two important recommendations in the direction of a change, which were at once assented to by the Public Trustee, and have been carried out ever since. When the honourable gentleman says he was told the report was going to be sent in to order, it would be inferred that it was going to uphold the Public Trustee, whereas in one or two important items it did not do so. On the important complaints of the Audit Office it completely upheld the Public Trustee. I have not met either of those two gentlemen, nor in any way discussed either the department or the report with them, and, this being the case, I think the reflection upon them is unwarranted. All I can say is, that the desire of the Government was to know what the facts really were, and, if the system of accounts was faulty, that we might have it altered. I desire to say, further, the Government has no desire to prevent this matter from being investigated by a Select Committee; and, had the Auditor-General in his last letter, in which he indicated that it was his intention to cease auditing the Public Trust Office, said that he was dissatisfied with the report of the two accountants, and expressed a wish to have the matter investigated by a Committee set up to inquire into the whole matter, the Government would have agreed to it. The Government is anxious that the continual friction existing between the Auditor-General and the Public Trust Office, considering the latter department is an important business office of the State, should cease, and that a proper system should be established. That is all we are anxious to bring about; and the object of bringing the resolution forward was to insure that the audit of the office should continue; and I should then be prepared to move that the whole matter in dispute between the Public Trust Office and the Controller and Auditor-General be referred to a Select Committee to investigate and report to the House, and I am prepared to do that still. I do not think the two matters should be mixed up. The point is, the Auditor-General has indicated to the House, of his own free will, that he has decided to discontinue auditing the department, and I take it the Auditor-General is not justified in telling the House that he will, of his own free will, discontinue what by statute he is called upon to perform. If the matter is adjourned, I will undertake to have the resolution altered in such a way as to insure what is desired by the Government without in any way reflecting upon the Auditor-General, and will endeavour to have the matter finally and satisfactorily settled.

Mr. MILLS.—I move the adjournment of the debate.

Dr. NEWMAN.—I second the motion, and I ask the Colonial Treasurer if he will not refer the matter to the Public Accounts Committee, which all this session has had nothing to do.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—I object to the adjournment of the debate, and I do so because

I think the motion should be entirely withdrawn. That, I think, is the proper way of dealing with the matter.

Debate adjourned.

FACTORIES BILL.

Mr. REEVES moved, That the House disagrees with the reasons of the Legislative Council for insisting on their amendments in this Bill; and that Sir R. Stout, Mr. J. W. Kelly, and the mover be Managers of a Conference.

Motion agreed to.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

Mr. WARD moved, That the House disagrees with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill; and that Mr. Seddon, Major Steward, Mr. Bell, and the mover be Managers of a Conference on the matter.

Motion agreed to.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

RECOMMENDED.

480. Mr. SEDDON moved the following new clause:—

"Nothing in this Act shall enable an appeal to be made from any decision upon a rehearing in pursuance of any order for rehearing made prior to the passing of this Act."

Clause added.

Bill reported, with further amendments.

Mr. SEDDON.—I move, That the amendments be agreed to.

Mr. HEKE.—I wish to move, That the Bill be recommitted, for the purpose of adding the following new clause:—

"This Act shall not come into operation until Her Majesty's pleasure shall have been taken thereon, and the same shall have been confirmed by Her Majesty, with the advice of her Privy Council, and a Proclamation of such confirmation having been given shall have been issued by the Governor and published in the New Zealand Gazette."

There are two clauses in this Bill which are inconsistent with the Treaty entered into between Her Majesty the Queen and the Native chiefs of New Zealand; and I find that the Royal Instructions to the Governor issued in 1892, clause 6, subsection (5), say,—

"Any Bill the provisions of which shall appear inconsistent with obligations imposed upon Us by treaty must not be assented to in Our name by the Governor."

We have in this Bill two clauses—60 and 61—which are inconsistent with the Treaty I have referred to, and which ignore the rights of the Natives entirely. Article II. of the Treaty of Waitangi plainly sets out that the Natives are to have all rights over their lands, which they may hold either individually or in common, and those rights are not to be disturbed at all. Now, clause 65 of this Bill says that when a survey takes place the costs are to be charged against any land the survey of which has been forced upon the Natives, and any surveyor can force his costs to be paid by the Natives, and, if not paid, he can apply to the Native Land Court and have a portion of the block sold without their consent, which is inconsistent with the provisions of the Treaty referred to. It does not matter what objections the Natives may raise, as under the provisions of this Bill the costs are imposed upon the Natives, and they have to accept them. It is an indirect sale, without obtaining the consent of the owners; and I presume the reasons I have given form a sufficient ground for asking this House to agree that the Bill should be recommitted for the purpose of inserting the clause I have read. I do not see any reason why this House should have any objection to allowing the clause to be inserted.

Mr. G. W. Russell

Mr. SEDDON.—I hope the honourable member will not press his amendment, as he must be aware that the original Act we are now amending and consolidating by the Bill now before us was not submitted to Her Majesty, and why we should follow the course proposed in the amendment I do not understand. I might also inform the honourable gentleman that this legislation is in the interests of the Native race, and he is delaying the advantage of it being given to them by the course he is suggesting. He must agree, I think, that free-trade in Native land has been detrimental to the race to which he belongs, and, if the passing of this law is to be longer delayed, that relief and benefit which it is designed to give to the Natives will be withheld. This Bill is to benefit the Natives, and, that being so, the sooner it is passed the better it will be for both races. Delays in this case are, I say, dangerous, and I should think the honourable member for the Northern Maori District would have been the last to propose what he has now proposed. He has proposed a very unusual course. I pay every consideration to recommendations made by him, because I feel assured that he desires to do his duty conscientiously, and to do that which at all events he believes to be in the best interests of the Natives. But I think he is mistaken in the course he has proposed, and therefore, Sir, I cannot accept it.

Mr. GUINNESS.—I would point out to the honourable member for the Northern Maori District that he might just as well withdraw the amendment, because under the Instructions which he read it would be the duty of the Governor, if he finds the Bill is one which has to get the Royal assent, to transmit the Bill Home for that purpose, and not to assent to it.

Mr. SEDDON.—It is not a Bill which under the Royal Instructions has to be sent Home. I do not desire to deceive the honourable member.

The House divided on the question, "That the words 'the amendments be agreed to' stand part of the question."

AYES, 39.

Buddo	Collins	Hall
Carnecross	Duncan	Harris
Carnell	Earnshaw	Houston
Carroll	Flatman	Joyce

Kelly, J. W.	Mills	Smith, G. J.
Larnach	Mitchelson	Steward
Lawry	Morrison	Tanner
Mackintosh	Pinkerton	Thompson
Maalin	Pirani	Ward
McGowan	Russell, G. W.	Willis.
McKenzie, J.	Saunders	Tellers.
McLachlan	Seddon	Hogg
McNab	Smith, E. M.	Montgomery.
Meredith

Noes, 12.

Duthie	Newman	Wilson.
Guinness	Russell, W. R.	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Stevens	Heke
Mackenzie, T.	Stout	Parata.
McKenzie, R.

Majority for, 27.

Amendments agreed to.

On the question, That the Bill be read a third time,

Mr. HEKE said,—I wish to enter my last protest against this Bill. Clauses 60 and 61 are clauses which do not do any justice to the Natives at all. These clauses, as I have said, ignore the rights of the Natives, the original owners of the soil, the people who had their rights confirmed to them by the Treaty of Waitangi in 1840. It is only fair for me to say that I intend to raise a protest in reference to these and to other clauses in this Bill. It is my intention to protest against this Bill when it leaves this House, and when it goes before the Council; and should the Council pass the Bill I intend to send a protest to the Governor, and to call his intention to the provision set out under the Royal Instructions of 1892. The Premier said a while ago that this course was not taken in reference to other Bills touching upon Native matters that were introduced into this House in years past. I may inform the Premier that I find a Bill that was introduced in 1862 was reserved for Her Majesty's assent. The passing of that Act, I may say, was a breach of covenant: the Natives were not consulted at all. Now, when Native Bills were introduced into this House after that this course was not taken, and I presume the reason why it was not taken is not that it was not a proper course to take, but that the Native representatives in this House could not understand that some of the provisions that were set out in the different Bills introduced into this House were inconsistent with the Treaty. Now, it is quite clear that under the Treaty all the rights of the Natives are confirmed in reference to all their properties. In the Royal Instructions to the Governor of New Zealand in 1892, under the heading of "Bills not to be assented to by the Governor in Our Name," section 5 says that the Governor has no right at all to give his assent to any such Bill as appears to be inconsistent with any treaty. Now, this is such a Bill. I refer to clause 65A of this Bill. There it is set out that survey-fees stand a charge on Native lands as a mortgage, and under that mortgage the surveyor can enforce it by applying to the Native Land Court, and have a portion of that land cut off and sold as the Court may direct. When a survey is forced upon any Native land without the consent of the Natives, as set out in clauses 60 and 61 in this Bill, I say that is inconsistent with the Treaty signed in 1840; and therefore it is only fair that such a provision as I had intended to move should have been inserted in the Bill. I will take this opportunity of reading the clause that I intended should be inserted in the Bill:—

"This Act shall not come into operation until Her Majesty's pleasure shall have been taken thereon, and the same shall have been confirmed by Her Majesty, with the advice of Her Privy Council, and a Proclamation of such confirmation having been given shall have been issued by the Governor and published in the New Zealand Gazette."

I will say nothing further with respect to that. What I wish to say now is in reference to the pre-emptive-right clause, and the clauses to allow the Government of New Zealand to act as agent for the Natives. In the first place, with reference to the pre-emptive right, the main objection I have is the unfair prices offered to the Natives for their lands. By way of comparison, I will quote an instance that has occurred in Wai-kato. An area of 500 acres was offered to the Government Land-purchase Agent, and the price he agreed to give the Native was 6s. an acre. The Native, knowing that 6s. an acre was too small a price for that land, inquired whether private individuals were willing to buy it; and private individuals were willing to give him 30s. per acre for the same 500 acres for which the Government officer offered 6s. an acre. The whole price, at 6s. an acre, would be £150. By way of deduction I find that the survey costs of 500 acres would be £41 13s. 4d. This amount would have to be deducted from the £150 which would be payable to the Natives should they desire to sell, leaving a balance of £108 6s. 8d. In sales to the Crown of Native lands I understand that the survey cost is the only item deducted. Then, I will come to the same 500 acres at 30s. an acre, and I find the Natives would receive £750 at that price. Deducting survey costs, you would have a balance of £708 6s. 8d. Then, there is another item which would have to be deducted, by way of stamp duty, at 10 per cent. on the whole sum. That charge for stamp duty would be £75. Deducting this amount, it leaves a balance of £633 6s. 8d. Assuming the moneys to be paid to an interpreter to be five guineas—which, I think, would be quite sufficient to meet the case—deducting five guineas, you get a balance of £628 1s. 8d. Allowing 10 per cent. on the whole for the agent who negotiates the sale, amounting to £75, if you deduct this you get £553 1s. 8d. Then, I have given £50 to be deducted for solicitors' fees, which leaves a balance of £503 1s. 8d. Then, under the heading of "Miscellaneous" I allow £50. Deduct £50 from £503 1s. 8d., and you have £453 1s. 8d. On deducting all these sums you get a balance of £453 1s. 8d., which the Native owner will get for his land. Reverting again to the Government purchase at 6s. an acre, after deducting survey costs the Native gets a balance of £108 6s. 8d., which, compared with the other, shows a difference of £344 15s. I think it is very unfair, when the Natives can stand on the off-chance of getting a large price for their lands, that they should be prevented by such clauses as are introduced into this Bill. The intention and desire of members of this House are no doubt good, and perhaps the Premier's intention may be to promote the welfare of the nation. I can quite conceive that; but, at the same time, I can quite see that, although wishing to carry that intention out, he is blinded to the fact that the Natives will not receive the benefits from any negotiations that may take place between them and the Government.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why?

Mr. HEKE.—It is only natural, when one person is appointed by law to buy property, that he can command the market values as he pleases. In reference to the Government acting as agent, I wish to say this: that the expenses that may be put upon the Natives in reference to this procedure would be something enormous. We find all the expenses of laying out roads and the construction of roads have to be borne by the Natives themselves. Now, expenditure of this kind in regard to Crown lands is paid for by the State. And not only that, but we have to pay for the Government acting as agents. There are other incidental matters that will tend to increase the expenses in reference to this procedure; therefore, by the time all this is finished and done with, the Natives will get just a paltry sum for the sale or lease of their lands. If it is the desire of the House to bring forward any measure that may be for the benefit of the Natives and Europeans as a whole, they should try and introduce into the Native Land Bills all the necessary safeguards to prevent such practices. I do not wish to say that the Crown and private individuals are the only persons who wish to try to "do" the Natives out of all their rights to any purchase; I can conceive there are some Natives also who might be found trying to work a point against their own fellow-Natives. That I quite admit. With reference to the system of appointing Native Committees to act on behalf of the Natives: We have several instances where the Committees appointed have given a transfer of land, depriving all their fellow-owners of their rights in reference to the land they sold. To prevent that, you must have any transaction to be negotiated made public before all the Native owners and members of any tribe who may claim an interest in any block that the Government or a private individual may wish to obtain. By carrying on negotiations in public you will prevent a recurrence of the sharp practices of the past, and those that are going on at present. In conclusion, I must say that it is my desire to see fair play done to the Natives as far as possible. Looking at the Treaty made between Her Majesty and the Native chiefs in 1840, that

Mr. Heke

Treaty should be respected and acted up to. Are we to believe that our parents were deceived by Her Majesty the Queen? It appears that such was the case. When you look at the action of the Government and compare the provisions of this Bill with the Treaty and the Royal Instructions to the Governor of New Zealand you cannot come to any other conclusion. If this Treaty is not acted up to, or if it is ignored by Her Majesty's European subjects in New Zealand, I wish to say that it will be my desire to raise a test case in reference to the whole thing, and the sooner the Natives are given to know that the Treaty is not worth anything at all the better it will be for them. I would protest against this Bill being assented to by the Governor. I wish honourable members may consider hereafter, in reference to any Native Bill introduced into this House, that the wish of the Natives ought to be acceded to, at least in allowing them to have a voice in reference to their lands being encumbered with charges such as set out in this Bill.

Bill read a third time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

Adjourned debate on the question, "That the amendments made by the Governor in this Bill be agreed to."

Mr. SEDDON.—I beg to move, That the first amendment be agreed to.

Dr. NEWMAN.—Is this to take away from the railway servants all rights they might have as Civil servants?

Mr. SEDDON.—It gives them all the rights they had at the time they came under the Railway Commissioners.

Dr. NEWMAN.—But that was not in the Bill. I think it is a most unjustifiable and ungenerous course to take. We pay these people just in the same way, and out of the same funds, and most of them have the same salaries as before they were placed under the Railway Commissioners; and, although the Premier declares that they have forfeited their rights as Civil servants by coming under the Railway Commissioners, they were not in a position to do otherwise at that date. They were told, in effect, "You are either to give up your positions and go out into the streets or take service in the manner we propose." They only accepted those terms because no other terms were open to them. The manner in which they were compelled to accept them was no better than that of the highway robber, who presents a pistol at your throat and orders you to give up your money. They had no alternative; and the course which the honourable gentleman ought to have taken is exactly the same course as was pursued when the Government Life Insurance was taken over from independent control as an association. On that occasion all the Civil servants in the employ of that department had their time counted while they were under the association, and when the company was abolished they again became Civil servants, and had all their rights restored to them. All the time they were in the Life Insurance Department was counted to them just as if they had remained in the Civil Service without interruption. I take this case because it is the last change of the kind that we have had; and I maintain that, when these people took office under the rules of the Civil Service, they were entitled during good behaviour to continue in that position; they should have all the rights, and they should have all the compensation, and they should have the retiring-allowance and other privileges just the same as the Civil servants. Directly they were put under the Railway Commissioners, it is contended, they forfeited all those rights. I ask this House—and I hardly think there is a member of the House who is not interested in the question—whether it is fair to say, because during five and a half years these men have been employed under the Railway Commissioners, they should be debarred from the Civil Service, and not be put back into their proper position. Why should they not be, simply because the House said that henceforth, instead of having three Commissioners to control the railways, they should be controlled by the Minister for Public Works? What is the position of these gentlemen? They are paid out of public moneys: and now, because the House has seen fit to terminate the rule of the Commissioners, they are to be put back into their former positions, but at the same time they are to be told that all the time they have been under the Commissioners is not to be counted. I contend that is a great injustice to a great number of men. I was surprised, when the honourable gentleman was moving in this matter the other day, that he said that there were certain salaries to be paid which, if there were no Commissioners, would not be in accordance with the rules of the Civil Service. But that matter could be settled, and it is not fair or just that these Civil servants should be deprived of all retiring-allowance. These men, before they came under the control of the Railway Commissioners, were entitled to retiring-allowances and all the other privileges which were granted to Civil servants; but now the honourable gentleman suddenly proposes to deprive them of all those advantages. I ask the Premier, when he is replying, to say why, seeing that the Government Insurance people were restored to all their rights after the association ceased to exist, these railway servants should not also be restored to the rights they formerly enjoyed. I say this House will be breaking faith with these gentlemen if it does not restore to them these rights.

Mr. SEDDON.—It was in 1887 the thing was done, not now. It was when the Government Railways Act was passed.

Dr. NEWMAN.—As to that point, I quite agree with the honourable gentleman; but why, if an injustice was done them then, should an injustice be done them now? I hope the honourable gentleman will, on second thoughts, withdraw this message, or bring down an amending Bill. Why should a distinction be made between the two cases I have mentioned?

Mr. SEDDON.—Why not place all the railway servants in the Civil Service?

Sir R. STOUT.—Why not?

Dr. NEWMAN.—If the honourable gentleman wants to know why they should not be, I am with him. Why should not the men in the Government Printing Office, and, in fact, every one who has been employed by the State for a considerable time, not become Civil servants?

Mr. GUINNESS.—Why not the police?

Dr. NEWMAN.—I agree with the honourable gentleman. Why should not they also? Why give rights to one class of servants and not to the others? We should extend these rights to all of them; and I think if the honourable gentleman did so he would give wide satisfaction. I do hope other honourable gentlemen will urge the Premier to change this clause, which certainly has much unfairness about it.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—I do not think it is a question whether the whole of the railway servants should be placed in the Civil Service or not; but I think it is a question of maintaining the rights they had as Civil servants when they entered the Civil Service of the colony, and I think it is only just that the conditions on which these men entered the Service should be preserved to them. No matter how much we may object to the terms of the agreement, the State should religiously keep its part of the contract; and, on these grounds, I shall support the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs in any step he may take to assure to these railway officials such rights as they had as Civil servants upon entering the Government service.

Sir R. STOUT.—I understood the honourable gentleman was going to withdraw this message, and that a new message was coming down to make another alteration in the clause.

Mr. SEDDON.—What I said previously was that the matter was before the Law Officers, and from the consultation I had had with the Law Officers I was under the impression that I should have to withdraw this message and bring down another; but one of the Law Officers half an hour ago informed me that, after carefully going into the matter, it was seen that it would not be necessary.

Sir R. STOUT.—I understood the position was simply this: By the Act of 1887 all the railway servants were in the Civil Service, and they were taken out of that Service and transferred to the Commissioners' service; and it is now proposed, in this Bill, to take them from what is practically the Commissioners' service and put them back into the Civil Service—that is, into the position they were in before. I think that would be perfectly fair. Now, however, it is proposed to strike that provision out of the Bill, and to treat these people as if they still were under the Commissioners, and were not really under the Ministers of the Crown, and not to restore them to the Civil Service again. The fair thing is not to accept the first amendment of the Governor—namely, that in subsection (3) of clause 4—but let the Bill stand as it is. I understand the amendments are to be put separately, and I therefore ask that the amendment in clause 4 be not agreed to. As to clause 12, the amendment there is a necessary verbal amendment, which, of course, the House will accept. The whole point turns on this: As to whether the servants who were in the Civil Service before the Commissioners were appointed are now, when the Commissioners are to cease to have control, to be put back into the Civil Service, or whether they are to remain in an anomalous position. The position would be that they are to be treated as if the Commissioners had remained in office. I do not think that fair. As to the other point, the right of the railway servants to be made Civil servants, I do not see why they should not be. Every servant of the Crown is practically a Civil servant, and there should be no distinction between one class of Civil servants and another class. I do not see why the railway servants should be put under any disability whatever.

7.30. Mr. MITCHELSON.—What I intended to do at the dinner adjournment was to ask the Minister in charge of the Bill to adjourn consideration of the Governor's message until the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) was in his seat. I should like to say that I do not think the Premier intends doing justice to the railway servants by the manner in which he proposes to treat them in the amendment now before the House. It is not at all reasonable or just that one portion of the service of the colony should be considered Civil servants and another railway servants. I think the course the Government should adopt is the same as that pursued at the time when the Government Insurance Bill was passed in 1886, when the Government Insurance Department took back into the Civil Service those officers who had previously been in the service of the Insurance Board and reinstated them as Civil servants. Seeing that the Bill which was passed in 1887 conserved the rights of Civil servants up to the time that they took office under the Commissioners, I think, the House having decided to take the railways back, all the Civil servants who served under the Railway Commissioners should be considered Civil servants of the colony; and I see no reason why the Government should attempt to treat the servants of the railways, now that they have reverted to the Crown, in a different manner from those of other departments.

Mr. BELL.—I desire to explain that when this notice of motion was called on in the afternoon I was absent as one of the Managers for the House on a conference with the Council. The Bill in the form it passed through the Legislature this session, I submit to the House, did justice to the railway servants; and the House is now asked, by Governor's message, to amend that portion of it relating to railway servants in such a manner as, I submit, would not be fair. I wish to put the matter as clearly as I can before the House, because I feel sure the House desires to do what is just and fair with regard to these men. As I have said on two occasions, this is not in any sense a party question. I wish to submit what I conceive to be the fair position, and I ask the House to reject this amendment proposed by the Governor, on the ground that the resolution which the House itself arrived at in the Bill was fair, and that this is not fair. When the Government Railways Act of 1887 was passed it was provided that the servants should retain such rights as they had in the Civil Service at the date of their transference to the railway service: that is to say, if they left the Civil Service and entered the railway service they remained entitled to such compensation for loss of office as they were entitled to on the day they entered the railway service, and no more. Any service in the railways did not count as service in the Civil Service. They obtained compensating advantages from their transfer to the railway service: that is to say, they had a more permanent form of office, and were not subject to political control of any kind. What I specially ask the House's attention to is that the Railways Act of 1887 in this respect precisely follows the precedent of an exactly analogous case in 1884, in regard to the constitution of the New Zealand Life Insurance Association. The officers of the Government Insurance were, by the Act of 1884, transferred to the service of the new Insurance Board. They retained their rights, but their rights did not grow under the association. Now, neither the constituting of the New Zealand Life Insurance Association by the Act of 1884 nor the constituting of the Railway Commissioners by this House in 1887 was at the instance of the Civil Service. It was the policy of the Legislature which transferred them from their position as Civil servants to a position under the Insurance Board in the one case, and, in the case of the railways, to the Railway Board. The Legislature, in both cases, recognised that it could not compel them to transfer their service, and they remained entitled to the compensation they were entitled to at the time each Act was passed. This change of service was created, not by the servants, but by the policy of the Legislature. When, in the year 1886, the Insurance Board was dissolved and the Insurance Department was returned to the control of the Government, the Legislature inserted a provision exactly similar to that which the House and the Council inserted in the present Railway Bill. That is to say, we said, in 1886, "It was our act which transferred you from the Civil Service to the Insurance service; it is our act which puts an end to that service, and puts you back as Civil servants. We will restore you to the same position as if you had remained Civil servants all the time." What was done in 1886 was surely fair. Parliament tried an experiment at the cost of the country, and possibly at the cost of the policyholders, but it did not try it at the cost of the Service. When Parliament found it necessary to put an end to the service which it had previously constituted, it returned those gentlemen to the same position, no better, no worse than they would have held if Parliament had not tried the experiment. Again, in passing the Government Railways Act we created a separate Board, and we transferred the Civil servants then in our employ to the employ of the Railway Board. The Legislature now says, "That experiment has failed; we are going to resume the control of the railways, and you will again become Civil servants." Neither the creation of the Board nor its extinction was the act of the railway servants; and it seems only just, now Parliament has determined that the experiment has been a failure and has resolved to constitute the railway service again a branch of the Civil Service, that we should say to the men, "You shall be in the Civil Service to-day as you would have been if that Act had never passed—no better, no worse." The position is this: If the Act of 1887 had never passed they would have remained Civil servants until to-day. That is the position which they ought now to occupy. The alternative proposal of the Premier is to leave them as the Act of 1887 left them—that is to say, to leave them in the railway service, notwithstanding that they have again become Civil servants, with no other rights than they had in 1887. I ask the House to compare the position of these men with that of those who in 1887 were working side by side with them in the Public Works Department. The men who remained in the Public Works Department are Civil servants to-day, with the increased right which has accrued to them since 1887; whilst those who were transferred to the service of the Railway Board remain as railway servants, with no rights for the service since 1887, and no rights for any service to be rendered hereafter. If it be answered that they have had increased salaries, or some other adventitious emolument, that ought to be proved to the satisfaction of Parliament; it ought to be proved to this House that there has been an additional advantage to each of them sufficient to compensate them for the loss which they have sustained by the experiment which Parliament has tried, before Parliament places them in a position unlike that occupied by others upon whom the experiment has not been tried. Honourable gentlemen will remember there were two branches of the Public Works Department—one the constructive and public works, which has remained unchanged until to-day; the other the working railways branch, created a separate department, taken from political control, and placed under the Board. These two branches of the same department will be in a different position to-day, if the Minister's amendment is carried. The men who remained in the Public Works Department will have the rights which will have accrued to them from 1887 to 1894, and the rights to accrue by future service; and the other men, retained in the same service, will find themselves debarred of all the rights that have accrued or that might hereafter accrue. I venture to submit that when we find it necessary to make an experiment of the kind, and afterwards find it necessary to put an end to it, we ought to be most careful that the country, and not its servants, should suffer. I hope I have put the matter fairly, and I submit that the amendment ought not to be carried.

Sir R. Stout

Mr. HOGG.—Sir, I think there is very great reason for supporting the amendment proposed by the Premier. I am quite well aware that very powerful arguments can be brought to bear to show that officers of the Railway Department should be placed precisely in the position they occupied before the railways were placed under the control of the Commissioners. But then, on the other hand, you must consider this aspect of the question: The railways do not pass from the hands of the Commissioners until the end of the present year; and for that reason alone I think it would be somewhat premature for an alteration of the kind proposed to be made at this stage. The officers of the Railway Department will keep in a tolerable state of preservation until this time next year, and I do not think they will suffer materially if their present position in the service of the colony up to that time remains unaltered. In the meantime Parliament will have something to guide them, and members of Parliament will be able to consult their constituents, who are really the people most interested in a question of this character. It is all very well to shed the last drop of your brothers' blood, for the taxpayers of the colony are those who will have to defray the emoluments which are paid to those occupying positions in the public service, and we ought to consider the taxpayers just as much as we consider those particular officers. I will ask honourable members to look at the matter in this light, again: During the period that the Commissioners have had the control of the Railway Department they have been making promotions; they have altered salaries, and have made new appointments; and I should like to know if the officers who have been appointed by these Commissioners are to occupy the position of Civil servants. It is only fair that whoever may be appointed Minister of Railways or appointed to have control over the railways should have a tolerably free hand. He will no doubt have to keep down expenditure, and make the railways as remunerative as they were during the term of the Commissioners, and I say, therefore, it is only fair that he should have a voice on this question. For that reason I think the proposal that the officers should be placed in the position they occupied some years ago is somewhat premature. But there is another very large consideration, and that is this: Here is now an opportunity of dealing fairly with an important branch of the public service, and I would appeal to honourable members, especially those who are here as the representatives of labour, whether this is not a right time for considering whether it is simply the well-paid officers who are enjoying large salaries that are to receive all these benefits, or whether those receiving various rates of pay are to be placed on exactly the same footing. I think there ought to be no material difference made between the highly-salaried officers and such men as the plate-layers, the permanent-way men, and the porters. These men have frequently to perform arduous services, and undergo not only hard work but long hours. I say these men are clearly as much entitled to retiring-allowances, or any of the other benefits conferred by the Civil Service Regulations, as the officers. Now, we know what has been the system under the management of the Commissioners, and what have been some of the chief charges brought against the Commissioners during their term of office. Has it not been said that they have selected certain officers who have had their salaries increased from year to year, and increased to a much greater extent than would have been the case had they remained under the control of a Minister? Is that not the case? Then, on the other hand, have not officers been passed by without any increases of salary whatever, while other officers, who have been receiving tolerably large salaries, have had their salaries increased considerably for the last four or five years? But what do we find with regard to the men in the railway workshops—the platelayers, and the men employed on the permanent-way? Do we not find that every opportunity has been seized for the purpose of reducing the men's wages, first from 9s. to 8s., then from 8s. to 7s., and even from 7s. to 6s. a day? And the Commissioners have gone beyond that. Taking advantage of the troubled state of the labour-market, when they have seen a chance of doing so they have replaced many of these men by boys. I say, we must consider this matter seriously, and place those employed in the service on a fairly equal footing. I hope honourable members in voting on this amendment will give the Minister of Railways an opportunity of considering the alterations to be made. In the first place, whoever is to be the Minister of Railways should be afforded an opportunity of fully considering the alterations that may be found necessary in the machinery, and in the next place we ought to be allowed time to obtain the opinion of the taxpayers of the colony on this very important question.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Sir, the honourable gentleman who has just sat down has told the House, and very properly, I think, that what we have to consider on this question is the people of New Zealand. I quite agree with him in that; but the question therefore is, whether we can best do this by paying our railway staff at such rates as shall give to the people of the colony the best value for their money. The Colonial Treasurer has made an announcement to this House that a certain gentleman had been appointed President of the Bank of New Zealand at a salary of £2,250—a very handsome salary indeed. But I say that the salary, although handsome, is not at all too high provided the colony has secured the right man in the right place. The same considerations necessarily apply to the railway service of New Zealand, and I do not suppose that any thinking man in this House will say for a moment that we have the right to have the right man in the right place unless we are able to compete for the right class of men in the open market by offering them a rate of pay which shall compare fairly with what they can obtain elsewhere. That is the whole question. The honourable member for Masterton dwelt upon the hardships of the men who do the platelaying, and who have to fill subordinate positions in the railway service. These men have just as much right to be fairly considered by this House as the highest officers in the railway service; but this motion will not in any way help to attain that. On the contrary, we shall run the risk of depriving the railway service of New Zealand of its best officers, and we cannot do that without detriment to every class of the service.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman says "No," but this must remain a matter of opinion. My opinion is that this motion will not be conducive to the welfare of the railway service, and I shall therefore be compelled to vote against it.

Captain RUSSELL.—Sir, the question has been summarised in so judicial a manner by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) that there is really very little left to say on the subject but this: that there was a large number of officers, when the Government Railways Bill was passed, who held the dual positions of Postmasters in country towns in the colony and also Railway Stationmasters, and these persons were virtually compelled to leave the Civil Service of the colony, in which they had rights accrued, in order to enter the service of the Commissioners. I may be told that such was not the case; that they had an option: but practically the result has been that many of those officers have been compelled to give up their positions as Civil servants in order to remain in the service of the Railway Department. I know many of those gentlemen have felt very much aggrieved at the position they find themselves in, inasmuch as under the Post Office classification scheme they would now be receiving far higher salaries, and would occupy better positions, with far less onerous duties, than they have occupied in the railway service, and these persons, if the motion of the Premier is agreed to, notwithstanding the hardships they have suffered in extra work on lower salaries, will be debarred from deriving the benefits which would have accrued to them had they been so fortunate as to remain in the service of the Post Office. What reason can there be that these servants of the Crown should be treated differently, whether they are called servants of the Post Office or servants of the Railway Department, from the remainder of the Civil Service? I can see none at all. To me it is perfectly clear that we owe a duty to the Civil servants, whatever grade of the service they may occupy; and I shall be only too happy to consider the question put forward by the honourable member for Wairarapa, that all classes and grades in the Railway or other departments of the Service shall have the same consideration extended to them relatively with the higher grades of the Service in being treated as Civil servants. But I would point out to the House that we who have objected to handing over the railways again to political control are now being justified in the opinions we held and expressed before the Railways Bill has become the Railways Act. For even here we are discussing the question of the grievances of the men before the Act has come into force. All those evils which we have predicted from the political control of the railways will come showering upon us in the very next session of Parliament. I repeat, Sir, here we are discussing the grievances of the railway servants before the Bill has become law, and I say that year after year we shall find that the servants of the Railway Department are to be treated in a manner different in many essentials from other services of the colony. And therefore, if we place the railways under the management of a Minister, we shall have all those difficulties and grievances cropping up every session, and Parliament will regret that we ever placed them again under political control.

Mr. Hogg

Mr. SEDDON.—I think, Sir, that the remarks of the last speaker should be quite sufficient to cause honourable members to vote for this amendment. The honourable member has said that there is a difference of opinion on the floor of the House as to the requirements of the railway servants and the best way in which they can be attended to, and on that account he says it would be better if we had allowed the railways to remain as they were. Well, that is exactly what the amendment does. It places the railway servants exactly where they were under the Railway Commissioners. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) has evidently not read the amendment.

Mr. BELL.—They are made Civil servants.

Mr. SEDDON.—They are not made Civil servants there—they are simply servants of 8.0. Her Majesty. My honourable friends who are members of the legal profession will understand the difference. I myself am rather pleased than otherwise with the objections that have come from the Opposition side of the House, because it will be the means of making a number of friends in favour of bringing back the railways to the people. I say that this difficulty must be met, and, if it is not met now, we shall have further trouble later on. The honourable gentleman who last spoke voted against Parliament taking control; and, Sir, if he had been successful in this, would those men whose rights he is now advocating have come into the Civil Service—that is, if the railways had remained under the Commissioners? He was quite content to leave them with the Railway Commissioners; and now, as soon as the Government has resumed control, he tries to force further expenditure upon the colony. It is quite clear that the Opposition are now trying to prove that Parliament, in taking over the railways, has made a mistake

Mr. BELL.—It is not fair to the servants to put it in that way.

Mr. SEDDON.—I must put it to the House in the way I believe correct, and the position is clear that by a majority of this House Parliament has now agreed to take over the railways. Those persons whose rights have been so ably advocated by both the members for Wellington City and Wellington Suburbs and the members for Eden and Hawke's Bay had absolutely lost their rights as Civil servants by being under the Railway Commissioners since 1888; but it is a matter of history that it was the Conservative party who, by the Railways Act of 1887, took away those rights. The next question is this: When a majority of members here carried an amendment to bring back the railways to the people, did we do it on the understanding that a much larger increase of expenditure should be incurred, and that these men should be placed in a better position than they were in at the time of our taking over the railways? What we have urged all along is this: that there should be an equality, and that there should not be the distinction that has occurred, and that there should not time after time be an increase in the salaries of the highly-paid officers, whilst those who were really doing the work were receiving no increase at all. I was more than surprised at the sympathy shown with this class of servants by the honourable member for Eden, who said, "I think we are not doing these men justice." Who was it that passed this Act in 1887? I refer honourable members to the following section of "The Government Railways Act, 1887." That Act was introduced by the honourable member for Eden, who was then Minister for Public Works, and subsection (4) of section 62 reads as follows:—

"(4) All persons in the employment of the Government in the railway service at the time of the passing of this Act shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be deemed to have been appointed or employed by the Commissioners under this Act, and such of them as shall then be in the Civil Service of the colony shall cease to be in such service."

Who passed this Act? If an injustice has been done, the honourable gentleman and the majority who supported him in this House were those who did the injustice. At the same time the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs stated—and it is quite true—that those of the Civil servants who did not desire to enter the Railway Commissioners' service could have left the railway service altogether, and could have received compensation. The honourable member used these words: He said, "It was just the same as though a highwayman placed a revolver at your head, and said, 'Stand and deliver.'" Therefore these servants did not voluntarily surrender their rights on entering the service of the Railway Commissioners. The fact of the matter is that they surrendered their rights when they entered the Commissioners' service, and they have been there from 1888 till the present time. I shall show that, though there may be something in the honourable member's contention that, though a man had no option, his rights on that date were conserved, and that if he had left the service he would have been paid his compensation and other allowances up to 1888,—yet from that date forward he would receive nothing except what was provided under the regulations of the Railway Commissioners in respect to retiring-allowances. In respect to retiring-allowances, I might say that these allowances under section 76 of the Government Railways Act are not so liberal as those under the Civil Service Act, which members are perhaps aware of, and if they look at the amendment they will see that what I propose by this amendment is to keep the railway servants who were in the service prior to 1888 in exactly the same position as they were in when the Railways Act was passed. The clause referred to is as follows:—

“The rights of all persons, whether absolute or contingent, who at the commencement of this Act were in the Civil Service of the colony, and who by virtue of this Act shall be deemed to be in the service of the Commissioners, shall, as regards claims for compensation for loss of office, or otherwise in respect thereof, or for superannuation allowance, be and the same are hereby preserved up to the time when they entered the service of the Commissioners.”

It is necessary to pass this amendment because in the event of the Railways Acts being repealed these rights would have to be conserved to them; but I say it is not the desire at the present time that we should go further, and as the Bill stands at present it means that not only were their rights conserved since 1876, but during the whole of the time that they have been in the service of the Railway Commissioners. It was never intended by this House that this Bill should be retrospective and cover the six years. Honourable members will ask, “How has this come about?” It came about in this way: When the amendment was proposed by the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Pinkerton)—I refer to the amendment in Part III. of the original Bill—when that was under consideration the Railway Commissioners wrote to me and called my attention to Part III. as it then stood. The communication I received was from Mr. McKerrow, the Chief Commissioner, and it covered this letter from the Secretary:—

“If the proposed clause in Part III. of the Government Railways Act Amendment Bill, which is also incorporated in Mr. Pinkerton's proposed amendment, to place the railways immediately under the control of the Government, is carried in its present form, a large number of the railway employés will be seriously affected. By the operation of ‘The Government Railways Act, 1887,’ section 76, the rights of all persons who were at the commencement of that Act in the Civil Service of the colony were preserved up to the time they entered the service of the Commissioners. The proposed clause apparently proposes to replace such persons again in the service of Her Majesty without continuing to them the rights which they had earned prior to 1889, and under which they entered the service originally.”

Mr. Seddon

Upon receipt of that, some amendments were submitted, and I concluded that they would not go further than was necessary to secure the rights of the railway servants since 1876, and I gave instructions to make the proposed amendments. I found subsequently, however, that this amendment went very much further, and covered the time that these officials had been serving the Commissioners. It is quite true, if I had examined closely the letter which accompanied the amendment, I should then have seen that this was proposed; but I am sure it was never intended by the House; and it was only when the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) called my attention to the point, after the Bill was reported from the Council, that I looked into it myself. I then found that an error had been committed, and I considered it my duty to take the House into my confidence, and have the matter put right, and in the position that was, I believe, originally intended. I will do Mr. McKerrow the justice to say that his note is as follows: “As I do not suppose it is the intention of the Government to in any way curtail or deprive officers of rights already accrued, I would respectfully ask you to see that provision is made for the conservation of those rights.” As I have said, the amendment went very much further than in the direction of conserving the rights of these servants which had accrued at the date they accepted office under the Railway Commissioners.

Sir R. STOUT.—It does not do that.

Mr. SEDDON.—It was never intended, but it does, and this amendment will make it clear, and we shall only conserve their rights up to the time of the coming into force of the Act of 1887. That is the intention of the amendment, and it will leave the whole of the railway servants in the position that they were in at that time; and, as they have been in the railway service, it is only fair, I say, that they shall have no superannuation allowances and no retiring-allowances, but shall be in the same position as if they were working side by side with those who have entered the railway service since the Commissioners have had control. I consider that there should be no distinction, but that they should be put in the same position, in order to save friction in the railway service. This amendment will save friction; and I say that we ought to keep our railway service on the one footing, and, if you do not do that, then there will be trouble with the Minister and with the Government as between the two classes of servants.

Mr. EARNshaw.—Why not make them all Civil servants?

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable member says, “Why not make them all Civil servants?” I will give a very good reason why. The reason why is this: that if you commence with the whole of the railway service, and then leave out the other branches of the service—

Sir R. STOUT.—Do not leave any out.

Mr. SEDDON.—Then, I say you cannot in a Railways Bill make the whole of the Government employés of this colony Civil servants.

If we are going to deal with the question at all, it requires to be dealt with by a Bill specially designed to embrace in its operation every class of men who work for the Government. That is what is required if effect is to be given to the suggestion made. Now, I will show you why it would be an injustice to those who remain as Civil servants were we to do this in respect of those who have been employed on the railways. It has been urged that the Stationmasters who have remained in the railway service have received less than the same class of servants who entered the postal service. It is quite true that there are cases which, with comparison, will show that those who remained in the railway service are not receiving more, and in some instances are receiving less, than those who entered the postal service; but, in respect to a great many men, if you compare the salaries now paid them with those paid to others in the Civil Service, you will find that the increases in the railway service have been greater than the increases granted to those in other portions of the service of the colony. I could give cases in point, but I do not think it necessary that I should do so on the present occasion. I might ask honourable members to take last year's estimates, when the Commissioners had control, and we used to receive the estimates in globo, and vote them in globo, never noticing the increases. We knew nothing of them really, but there were sixty-two increases in the estimates of this session, going up from £10 to £100—that is, sixty-two cases in which increases were granted. I do not say that they were not proper promotions; I do not say the increases were not warranted; but I say they were made, and the difference is such that it would be unfair to the rest of the service if we without inquiry pass the Bill as it went from this House. I say it would cause friction, and that we should not be warranted in doing it. It has not been mentioned, but who are the servants that will be benefited if we bring them in as Civil servants, and restore to them the rights from the time they left the Service up to the present time? Why, Sir, it is the Stationmasters and the clerical branch of the service. It is to those only that it applies. Those are the persons who would be made Civil servants. It applies to few, comparatively speaking, and not to the whole. And I ask, why should you do this? Why do you deal with a large subject by simply giving a concession to a few who are at present in the railway service, and who were in the Civil Service previously? I say there is a great deal more underlying this question than members see at a glance. It is my desire, and the desire of the Government, to promote harmony, and there is no doubt we should bring about discord if we had a division in the service. If Parliament desires that we should do justice to all branches of the service—to all those employed by the Government—then we should not commence it in a Railway Bill, but a comprehensive measure should be brought down to classify every person in the employment of the Government. We have the Postal Department classified, and some other branches are classified and working under regulations. The railway service was working under regulations under the Commissioners and we heard very few complaints. As I have said, it is only a question of classification going on, but we must deal with the matter by a separate Bill prepared for the purpose, and not attempt to do it by this Bill. I do not think it necessary for me to say anything further. I do not think that capital should be made, or should be attempted to be made, as against the Government on this question, or that any attempt should be made to enlist the sympathies of a certain class of railway employés and to put the Government, as it were, in a false position through their having to bring down an amendment and ask the majority of the House to pass it. I believe I am doing what is just to the railway service as a whole and to the colony in asking the House to agree to this amendment. If this amendment be rejected, then all I say is this: that our first trouble with the railways will begin, for we shall have largely increased the liabilities of the taxpayers of the colony, and, in addition to that, we shall have caused discord in the railway service itself. I think that these are very good reasons why we should agree to the proposed amendment. Now I will meet the only other argument—the argument of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) when he mentioned the case of the Insurance Department, and said that those who were in the Civil Service and were taken over by the Board and severed their connection with the Service, were subsequently brought back into it when the Board was abolished. There is this difference: The Board existed from 1884 to 1886—two years—and very little difference was made in regard to the salaries for that very short period.

Mr. BELL.—You are quite mistaken.

Mr. SEDDON.—Did you raise the salaries?

Mr. BELL.—Yes.

Mr. SEDDON.—Very well, then; I say that was a great injustice to the rest of the Civil Service whose salaries were not raised. So in regard to the railway servants. During the six years there have been many increases and promotions—well-deserved promotions; but, had we had the service as a whole under the Public Works Department, all those in these departments would have had equal chances of promotion, which they have not had owing to the railways being under the Commissioners. Now, if you are to do justice, you would have to take a comparative statement of those who were in the railway service and those who were in the other branches of the public service, and see what the increases were and bring them back, or make the increases in the Civil Service to correspond. There is adjustment necessary, and without that you will bring discontent. I think I have said sufficient to prove to the House the desirability of carrying this amendment. Next year, when the Minister is in charge, when he has carefully gone through this matter, he can then guide the House and advise it as to what he may consider necessary to do—as to what is right to all those who are employed upon the railways of the colony.

The House divided on the question, "That the amendment recommended to be made by His Excellency in clause 4, subsection (3), be agreed to by the House."

AYES, 41.

Buddo	Kelly, W.	Pirani
Button	Lawry	Reeves
Carncross	Mackintosh	Saunders
Carnell	Maslin	Seddon
Carroll	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Duncan	McKenzie, R.	Stewart
Flatman	McLachlan	Tanner
Graham	Meredith	Thompson
Guinness	Millar	Ward
Hall	Mills	Willis.
Harris	Montgomery	Tellers.
Houston	Parata	Hogg
Joyce	Pinkerton	Morrison.

NOES, 22.

Crowther	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Duthie	Mackenzie, T.	Stout
Earnshaw	Massey	Te Ao
Fraser	McNab	Wilson.
Green	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Newman	Bell
Hutchison, G.	O'Regan	Buchanan.
Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. R.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman.	Allen.

Majority for, 19.

Motion agreed to.

The following amendment was also agreed to: In clause 12, after the word "October," in the second paragraph, the word "next" was omitted, and the words "one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four" were inserted.

LICENSING BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 12.—Constitution of Licensing Committee within ordinary districts. Provisions applicable to all Committees.

Mr. McNAB moved, That all the words after the words "The Committee shall" be struck out, for the purpose of inserting the following words: "consist of the Magistrate for the time being having jurisdiction at the place of meeting of the Licensing Committee, and eight other persons, being residents within the district, to be elected by the electors of the district in manner provided by 'The Electoral Act, 1893,' and thereafter once in every third year only, on the days appointed for taking the poll of electors under section sixteen of this Act, and simultaneously therewith."

Words struck out.

Mr. R. McKENZIE moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 15.

Allen	Duncan	Hogg
Crowther	Green	Houston

Mr. Seddon

Lang	Mitchelson	Tellers.
McGowan	Parata	Carncross
McLachlan	Russell, W. R.	McKenzie, R.
Mills

NOES, 40.

Bell	Lawry	Saunders
Buddo	Mackenzie, T.	Seddon
Carnell	Mackintosh	Smith, E. M.
Carroll	Maslin	Stevens
Collins	Massey	Steward
Earnshaw	McNab	Stout
Flatman	Meredith	Tanner
Fraser	Montgomery	Ward
Graham	Newman	Willis
Hall	O'Regan	Wilson.
Hall-Jones	Pinkerton
Harris	Pirani	Tellers.
Heke	Reeves	Morrison
Hutchison, W.	Russell, G. W.	Smith, G. J.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Button	Duthie
Kelly, J. W.	McKenzie, J.
McGuire	Cadman
Te Ao.	Larnach.

Majority against, 25.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That all the words after the word "only" be struck out, with the view of inserting the following words: "Such election shall not be held on the day the General Assembly election is held."

Words struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted."

AYES, 36.

Allen	Hogg	Pinkerton
Bell	Houston	Pirani
Buchanan	Maslin	Russell, G. W.
Buddo	Massey	Seddon
Carnell	McGowan	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Stevens
Earnshaw	McNab	Steward
Flatman	Millar	Stout
Fraser	Mills	Tanner.
Graham	Montgomery	Tellers.
Hall	Morrison	Carncross
Hall-Jones	O'Regan	Smith, E. M.
Heke

NOES, 8.

Carroll	Meredith	Tellers.
Harris	Reeves	Collins
Lawry	Saunders.	Hutchison, W.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Duthie	Button
Green	Newman
McKenzie, J.	Kelly, J. W.
Mackintosh	Buick
Te Ao	Mackenzie, T.
Ward.	Hutchison, G.

Majority for, 28.

Words inserted, and clause as amended added to the Bill.

Progress reported.

The House adjourned at twenty minutes to three o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 10th October, 1894.

First Readings—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill—Factories Bill—Shearing at Benmore Station—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—Rating on Unimproved Value Bill.

The Hon the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Native Land Court Bill, Mining Companies Bill.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS brought up the following report of the Managers of the Conference on this Bill:—

"The Managers of the Conference on the Shops and Shop-assistants Bill on behalf of the Legislative Council have the honour to report that they have met the Managers appointed by the House of Representatives, and have agreed as follows:—

"Section 2. Definition of Shop: That the words 'where any person works for hire and,' in line 2, be struck out, and that the following words be inserted in line 3, after 'retail'—namely, 'but does not include a shop the business whereof is bona fide owned and conducted by any person of New Zealand or European extraction whether solely or with the assistance of members of his or her family below the age of eighteen years who reside on the premises.' Definition of Shop-assistant: That the words struck out by the Council be reinserted.

"Section 3, line 3: That the words 'a hairdresser' be struck out.

"New section 9: That in line 6, after the words 'any part of,' the words 'any one of' be inserted; and in line 7 the words 'each other' be struck out, and the words 'any part of another' inserted in lieu thereof.

"New section 9, subsection (1), line 5: That the word 'should' be erased, and the word 'shall' inserted in lieu thereof.

"Subsection (5): That this be a separate section in the Bill; and the word 'hairdressers' be inserted after 'butchers' in the last line but one of the section.

"Section 16A, line 5: That 'shall' be struck out, and 'may' inserted in lieu thereof. Line 8, after 'required to,' to insert the words 'continue at work or'; and after 'work,' where it occurs the second time in the same line, to strike out the words 'after seven o'clock in the evening.'

"New clause 16B: That the following section be added to the Bill, to follow 16A: 'Offices shall be excepted from the operation of the last-preceding section during two periods of four weeks each in every year for the purposes of their half-yearly balances.'"

Report agreed to.

FACTORIES BILL.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART brought up the following report of the Managers of the Conference on this Bill:—

"The Managers appointed by the Legislative Council to conduct the Conference on the Factories Bill have the honour to report that they have met the Managers appointed by the House of Representatives, and they have come to the following agreement, namely:—

"Clause 20, subsection (c): To strike out the word 'wages,' and substitute 'earnings'; and strike out 'two,' and substitute 'of.'

"Clause 54: In lines 50 and 55, to strike out 'eight,' and substitute 'a quarter to eight.' To restore the last two lines of the clause on the top of page 16.

"Clause 56: In line 38, to insert, after the word 'workroom,' the following words: 'except in small factories where not more than three persons are employed, and this only.'

"Clause 63 (new proviso): In line 14, to strike out the words 'as auxiliary to,' and substitute the words 'in connection with.' In line 16, to strike out the word 'this,' and substitute 'the Shops and Shop-assistants,' and insert '1894' after Act. In line 16, to strike out the words 'close his shop,' and substitute 'give a half-holiday to women and young persons under this Act or on Saturday afternoon.'

"Clause 64: That it remain struck out."

Report agreed to.

SHEARING AT BENMORE STATION.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY laid on the table the following letter from the Police Department to Mr. T. Middleton, manager of Benmore Station:—

"Police Department
(Commissioner's Office),
Wellington, 9th October, 1894.

"SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3rd instant, which reached me yesterday (the 8th). Its arrival, however, was preceded by its publication in the Press on the 4th.

"The Minister directs me to say that you are at liberty to take any course you think fit in this matter; but, in publishing the correspondence, it might justly be urged that, in fairness, your letter to Constable Bradshaw should also have been published.

"From inquiries made, the Government has ascertained, from a competent and reliable officer, that the New Zealand shearers would not in any way interfere with the shearing at Benmore, that the warning received by you comes from Australia, and that it is from Australia that a large proportion of the shearers employed on the Waitaki come, after the shearing is finished in November.

"As stated in my previous letter, you have made arrangements with a person named Alexander McCallum, an Oamaru shearer now in New South Wales, and have authorised him to bring over sixteen men. In your letter under reply you have not denied that this is the case. This being so, the conclusion is correct that what has been reported is absolutely accurate. You are also aware of the fact that during this session of Parliament the Arbitration and Conciliation Bill has been passed, and that, Parliament having made provision to meet the disputes between employers and employes, action in the direction you asked was unnecessary.

"Knowing that your agent is not on good terms with the shearers in the district, the action taken by you might reasonably be construed to be a deliberate attempt to provoke hostilities, and what gives colour to this is your application for protection two months in anticipation of the time the shearers are expected to arrive at Benmore Station.

"Had the Minister thought fit to grant your request it would have been inferred that the Government was encouraging you in the extreme and inadvisable course you have embarked upon, and, armed with the promised protection, your agent would no doubt have been communicated with and told to take action without regard to consequences.

"I am directed to inform you that the Minister looks upon your conduct in this matter as that of a man who has made up his mind on a given date to set fire to his premises, and, as a prelude thereto, notified the fire-brigade that he so intended to destroy his property. A wiser course would be to refrain from applying the match. The Government having been assured that there was no likelihood of the shearers breaking the law, or interfering with the work on your station, the Minister therefore directed me to inform you that it is unnecessary to comply with your unusual and unreasonable request.

"The Government further resent the very grave reflection you have cast upon the shearers of New Zealand by stating they are lawless spirits. They have ever proved themselves to be law-abiding colonists, and the Government is of opinion that your fears as to the lives of the men who are coming, or your own life and property, being in danger are entirely unfounded.

"You are of course aware that it is against the law for any person to deliberately and of malice aforethought provoke a breach of the peace; any one doing so is held to be an offender against the commonwealth. After what has been reported to me in connection with this matter, and which has not been denied, the Minister directs me to inform you that he does not think it is the duty of the State to encourage you in the unusual course you have evidently made up your mind to pursue.

"Should, however, the occasion arise and the peace be broken in any way, the Government will do its duty, as it has already done in similar cases. At the same time, anything that would tend to cause the serious troubles that have occurred elsewhere, and the loss of life consequent thereon, should be strenuously avoided by every right-thinking colonist.

"In your letter to Constable Bradshaw of the 27th August you say there are 'rash spirits' amongst the members of the Shearers'

Union, and you further refer to what has occurred in Australia. You also refer to the mischief attempted last season, to prevent shearing at the Benmore Station. This being so, conciliation, and not provocation, would, the Minister thinks, have been the most reasonable way of ending your difficulties once and for all, and that in a manner satisfactory to you and with profit to your employers. It would have been considered by me more in keeping with a desire to promote peace and good-will had you acted in moderation, and first informed the Government of your intention in regard to authorising Mr. McCallum—who you do not deny is on bad terms with the shearers of the district—to import some of the men you have designated as 'rash spirits,' instead of hastily instructing him to procure the men you have mentioned. Having thus acted, you feared the result of your own actions, and for the first time acquainted the Government of the course you had taken.

"The Minister directs me to say that he does not question your right to obtain men from Australia or elsewhere should you consider yourself justified in so doing. If, however, the consequences are to be such as you fear may be precipitated owing to the introduction of men and the consequent disturbance of the peace and other serious evils, it might with force be urged that such a course, unless in an extreme case, should be avoided. Further, so far as the Minister is aware, the men coming from Australia are entirely in ignorance of the fact that they will be subject to the law which has been passed this session, and that in the case of a dispute both employer and employes will be compelled by law to place their case before the Court of Arbitration. The Government considers the Compulsory Arbitration and Conciliation Act to be all-powerful; hence, relying upon this, it is considered there is no necessity for special police protection.—I have, &c., "A. HUME, Commissioner."

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 25.—Classes of land on which money may be advanced.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART moved to add, after the words "following classes of lands," the following words: "not being urban."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be added be so added."

AYES, 18.

Acland	Morris	Stevens
Bowen	Oliver	Stewart
Holmes	Peacock	Swanson
Kelly	Pharazyn	Whitmore
MacGregor	Reynolds	Whyte
McLean	Richardson	Williams.

NOES, 10.

Barnicoat	Buckley	Jenkinson
Bolt	Feldwick	Kerr

McCullough Taiaroa Walker, L.
Montgomery

PAIR.
For. Against.
Jennings. Shrimski.

Majority for, 8.

Amendment agreed to, and words added.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN moved to add, after the words "not being urban," the words "or suburban."

The Committee divided on the question. "That the words proposed to be added be so added."

AYES, 15.

Acland	Oliver	Stevens
Bowen	Peacock	Swanson
Holmes	Pharazyn	Whitmore
McLean	Reynolds	Whyte
Morris	Richardson	Williams.

NOES, 14.

Barnicoat	Jenkinson	Montgomery
Bolt	Kelly	Stewart
Buckley	Kerr	Taiaroa
Dignan	MacGregor	Walker, L.
Feldwick	McCullough

PAIR.
For. Against.
Jennings. Shrimski.

Majority for, 1.

Amendment agreed to, and words added.
Bill reported, with amendments.

RATING ON UNIMPROVED VALUE BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—Sir, at the time the Council adjourned, when this Bill was last before it, I was referring to the present system and its effects upon the country settlers. I had previously pointed out that the proposals in the Bill would benefit the ratepayers in the cities; and I also believe that the benefit to the country settlers will be greater than to the city ratepayers. It will be admitted by most honourable members that in the country districts there are large areas of land upon which the owners make no improvements. There is a difficulty also in getting the rates from the owners of these lands. Therefore the whole cost of the roads and bridges is thrown upon the settlers, and they find it a very great hardship. The proposal in this Bill will relieve them to some extent, because all land in the country will be put on a similar footing, and those settlers who have made improvements will not have to pay increased rates, and that, I believe, they will find an advantage. There is a demand for this Bill; and in support of that statement I might mention the fact that the North Wairarapa County Council, in order to test the feeling in the country in reference to this proposal, sent circulars during the recess to all the local bodies in the colony. In all there were 270 letters sent, and sixty-five replies were received. Of these sixty-five, thirty-two approved of the proposals in the Bill, and only thirteen out of the remaining thirty-three were opposed to it. I mentioned, in speaking upon the question when it was last before the Council, that there was a Bill in force in Queensland based upon the same principles as the Bill now before us. I have since procured a copy of the clause of that Bill, and it reads as follows: "The value of rateable land shall be estimated at a fair average for unimproved land of the same quality held in fee-simple in the same neighbourhood." Honourable members will see that this is exactly the same principle that underlies the measure we have under consideration. The Bill is called the Valuation and Rating Act of Queensland. I might also mention that in South Australia a Bill has passed the House of Assembly on two occasions, but it was rejected by the second Chamber.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—It is passed into law now.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—My information is that it was rejected on the last occasion by such a close division as twenty-six to twenty-eight.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—It is passed now.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—The honourable member mentions that the Bill is passed. His information is probably better than mine: if so, it is so much the better for my argument. I might mention also, in order to show how widely the opinion prevails in favour of rating upon unimproved value, that at a meeting of farmers in New South Wales recently there was a unanimous opinion expressed that rating on the unimproved value was the proper way to rate country or agricultural lands. In the Victorian Parliament a motion was moved on the 29th of August, 1893, by Mr. Deakin, one of the leading men there, on this subject. The question then under discussion was the primage duties, and he moved an amendment to this effect: "That in the opinion of this Committee any additional revenue required to be raised should be raised from a tax upon unimproved-land values." I might also mention, in order to show that the feeling is gaining ground in England that the proper course is to tax unimproved values, that the London County Council is of opinion that this is the proper basis of taxation. A Committee of that Council, the Local Government and Taxation Committee, reported as follows: "That all land should be equally assessed for rates"; and in another portion of their proceedings they say, speaking of taxation of ground values,—

"The question, though simple, is immense. Landlords, for doing nothing, demand and receive sixteen millions sterling per annum. Either by betterment, or taxation of ground-values, or both, we must relieve the ratepayer by relieving the landlord, in part at least, of the only duty which he performs—namely, reception of rent."

The Glasgow County Council have taken up a similar attitude, and have stated that they will not proceed with further improvements in the city and neighbourhood unless some steps are taken to levy a tax on the unimproved values of land—similar ground to that taken up by the London County Council. I should mention, to be fair, that the London County Council think of adopting the idea of betterment rather than taxing upon the unimproved values purely and simply. The two systems were discussed: the Council adopted the betterment, and two Bills have been brought forward in the English Parliament dealing with this question. I am also informed on good authority that in the Isle of Man the House of Keys passed a measure exactly similar to ours, but it was rejected by the second Chamber. It is stated, however, that next session such a Bill will be carried into effect; and in Canada, at the present day, the same principle is enforced. I mention these facts to show how widely spread is the belief in the principle of this Bill. We have admitted the principle ourselves in our land-tax. The Hon. Mr. Stevens, in speaking on this question, seemed to infer that the principle was right when it was for State purposes, such as railways and defence purposes, but the honourable gentleman believed it would not be right to apply the principle to municipalities, or to the country at large. I did not think that was good reasoning. The honourable gentleman stated that if a principle is found to be good we may accept it as sound. If a principle is found to be good when dealing with large State concerns I think it is only fair to assume that it is applicable when applied to municipal and country purposes.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Or morals.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—“Or morals.” The Bill is fair in this respect: that it gives a choice to the ratepayers of the colony to determine under which system of rating they shall be rated. The Rating Act which we have had before us has given them the option of being rated upon the annual value or upon the capital value, and therefore, if this Bill becomes law, it will give them the right of saying whether they shall be rated upon the unimproved value. In my opinion the Bill will also extend the powers of local self-government, as it throws the right upon the people of electing as to how they shall be taxed, and I think that is a very good principle. We have heard a good deal about trusting the people; but, if the Council in its wisdom decides to reject this Bill, what will it, in effect, say? That the people are not to be trusted, and that the members of this Council know better than the people do themselves as to which form of taxation is wisest and best. I do not think that is a position which it would be wise of the Council to take up.

An Hon. MEMBER.—So they do.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—The honourable gentleman says, “So they do”; but I do not think it is very wise for less than fifty members of this Council to deprive the ratepayers of the country at large of the right to determine which system of taxation will best suit their circumstances. If you give them the right to choose their form of taxation, I think the people themselves are the best judges under the circumstances. There is no doubt the present system is unsatisfactory. I believe that it is unsound in principle, because it taxes the results of a man's industry, and that is not a right basis for taxation. A recent writer has said that taxation should be so administered as not to be a penalty upon improvements and a discouragement to enterprise. I believe our present system of taxation discourages enterprise; and the proposals of this Bill will have a contrary effect—a good effect—because improvements will be excluded, and each and every ratepayer will be placed upon the same footing. The change is asked for, and I believe the Bill will be favourably received by those most interested. It is, in my opinion, worthy of support, because the principle underlying it is a right one, and a practical one. That it has been found satisfactory is evidenced by the fact that in Taranaki it was in operation for a good many years. It gives a greater liberty to the people, it is in the interests of local self-government, and it is also an attempt to make the taxation proposals fall equally upon all; therefore I hope, for these reasons, that the Council will see fit to reject the amendment and read the Bill a second time.

Hon. Mr. McCullough

Debate adjourned.

The Council adjourned at seven minutes to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, 10th October, 1894.

“Police Reform”—Middle District University—Historical Places—Otago Central Railway—Coal Exports—Bank of New Zealand—Employment for the Able and Willing—Coal—Onehunga Wharf—Volunteers’ Long-service Medals—Jackeytown—Palmerston Railway—Judge Kettle’s Petition—Railway Maintenance—Mrs. Glasson—Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act—Tariff Revision—Old-age Pensions—Chinese—E. Taylor and Another—Kindergarten Schools—Mining Industry—Agent-General—State Farm—Local Bodies’ Valuation Correspondence—Drain-pipes—Police—Railway Employees—Band Contest—Wellington—Wairarapa Railway Traffic—Otago Central Railway—Grey River—Blackball Road—Intercolonial Free-trade—Fishing in Ashley River—Mining Industry—Waipori Dredges—Stage System on Railways—County Council Valuations—H. von Blaraberg—Temporary Clerks, &c.—Moore, Hepburn, and Robinson—Cape Foulwind Railway-sleepers—Wairarapa Unemployed—Secretary and Inspector of Factories—Customs Entry-forms—Woodville Corporation Works—Old Soldiers’ Claims—Rabbit Nuisance—Onehunga Wharf—Adjournment—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill—Factories Bill—Audit Office and Public Trust Office—Dairy Industry Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

“POLICE REFORM.”

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Minister of Defence, Whether the charges contained in a letter appearing in the Christchurch Star of the 1st October instant, headed “Police Reform," are true? If so, will he at once take steps to rectify the matters complained of? He would just like to say with reference to the question that the charges referred to were set out in a letter which appeared in the Christchurch Star on the 1st October. The letter said,—

"A strong political element permeates the management, and is so powerful that it is impossible to even move some of the men. In one case a constable was ordered to Dunedin, but the order was countermanded from Wellington. The Inspector in charge thus has no power, and the constables may defy him. I say most" —

Mr. SEDDON objected to the reading of this letter. The honourable member was introducing debatable matter in quoting from a letter that had been published over a nom de plume.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was not in order to quote any matter from newspapers bearing on the question. The honourable gentleman must state the facts, and ask a question bearing on the facts.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said the facts were set out in the letter.

Mr. SEDDON said they were not facts. Some of the statements contained in the letter in question were incorrect and misleading.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said if the Premier had seen the statements he did not wish to weary the House with them. If the Premier would reply to them he would be satisfied.

Mr. SEDDON had seen the letter, and had read it carefully. It had appeared in the Christchurch Star, and was signed with the nom de plume "Bull's-Eye." Now, neither the writer nor the honourable member had made a bull's-eye. It was not even an outer, but a miss. The Police Department of New Zealand and the police service would compare favourably with those of the other colonies, and the manner in which crime was suppressed and traced home reflected very great credit on the service. The charges contained in the letter were that the department was rotten, and that the head of the department, who was Inspector of Prisons as well as Commissioner of Police, in order to keep down the prisons expenditure desired the police to neglect doing their duty. When so grave a statement as that was made with regard to an officer holding the high and responsible position of Commissioner of Police and Inspector of Prisons, it was high time, when these letters or statements published in a public print over a nom de plume were brought before the House in this way, that it should be put a stop to. It was a reflection which was entirely unjustifiable.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said he was referring more particularly to the statements in the earlier part of the letter, not reflecting upon Colonel Hume in any way.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable member stated he was quoting facts. That was what he said. As to the statement referring to the constable at North Dunedin, it was quite true a constable had been ordered to relieve him, and after that order was given it was shown that it was advisable to remove the constable, and he ordered his removal or suspension until the matter was cleared up. He was responsible for it, he might say; but, when the head of the department was brought into question because of an anonymous letter appearing against the department, such a practice should not be encouraged in the House. Another charge made against the department was that a policeman was placed on duty in a town in which he had a relative living. He might have a forty-fourth cousin in the place, and was it reasonable that he should immediately be removed on account of that? It was simply nonsense to think that this should be charged as a crime against the department.

MIDDLE DISTRICT UNIVERSITY.

Sir R. STOUT asked the Minister of Education, If he will take the necessary steps to have the Council of the Middle District of New Zealand University appointed? It was a considerable time now since the consent of the Governor was given to the Act, and, as it was necessary that the members of the Council of the University should be elected, he would ask that steps should be taken to give effect to the law.

Mr. REEVES said he proposed to bring the whole matter before the Cabinet as soon as he could get the Cabinet to spare the time to consider it. The establishment of a university here was, of course, a financial matter with which his colleagues would have to deal; but he could assure the honourable gentleman that as far as he could he would do everything to aid the matter.

HISTORICAL PLACES.

Mr. HEKE asked the Minister of Defence, If he will take into consideration during the recess the advisability of erecting some mark at historical places in and about the Bay of Islands, commemorating events in the early history of the colony, such as—(1) Place where the first missionary landed; (2) first sermon preached; (3) the first seat of Government; (4) signing of the Treaty of Waitangi; (5) first disturbance; or other places possessing interest from acts of chivalry on both sides—Natives and Europeans? The matter had been brought under his notice by several Europeans who had had no connection at all with respect to the people who took part in the events of the olden days in the Bay of Islands, and he thought it his duty to ask the Minister whether he would take the matter into consideration during the recess.

Mr. SEDDON said that, as regarded the place where the missionaries landed, he should have no objection to comply with the honourable gentleman's request if it could be done without causing expense or inconvenience. With regard to the place where the first sermon was preached, of course the honourable gentleman did not refer to the Sermon on the Mount.

Sir R. STOUT.—I did not know it was at the Bay of Islands.

Mr. SEDDON said, as to the first seat of Government and the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi, of course that matter would be easily dealt with. With regard to the places where disturbances had occurred, he thought they had better leave that alone. The Government would have no objection to comply with some portions of the honourable gentleman's request, and he would confer with him, and probably the honourable gentleman would point out to him what it would be best to do in the matter.

Mr. HEKE said he would have great pleasure in giving the Minister every information in his power; but, in reference to the place where the missionaries landed, and where the first sermon was preached, he thought the European population of this colony owed a great debt to the missionaries.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman could not discuss the matter any further at present.

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. EARNSHAW asked the Minister for Public Works, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Lands to a deputation from the executive council of the Otago Central Railway League, at Dunedin, on the 17th October, 1898—which was as follows: "Hon. John McKenzie: 'What you want is that we should start the tunnel at once. I may tell you that instructions have already been given to proceed with the tunnel. The money has been sanctioned: that was done by the Cabinet before I left Wellington, and I received a telegram from Mr. Seddon last night to say that he had given instructions to proceed with the tunnel.' Mr. Barron: 'At both ends?' Hon. J. McKenzie: 'Yes; instructions have been given to push on with the tunnel. I know that they are proceeding with the tunnel'"—what progress has been made, and what progress is being made at the present time, with the tunnel beyond Hyde, in accordance with that promise?

Mr. SEDDON said that what was stated by his colleague was absolutely correct. A communication had been received from the officer in charge, showing that it was not advisable to proceed with the tunnel at once. What was claimed was that there was a very large number of unemployed at Dunedin, and that a larger number of these men could be employed at the formation-works, and that the formation of the works ought for a certain time to go on, and then the tunnel should be commenced, and both finished simultaneously. Under these circumstances, the order referred to in the question was countermanded, so that his honourable friend the Minister of Lands was stating what was absolutely correct when he made the statement referred to. As to the last part of the question, what would be done in the matter, and what the intentions of the Government were, these would be disclosed, he hoped, in the course of forty-eight hours in the Public Works Statement.

COAL EXPORTS.

Mr. R. McKENZIE asked the Colonial Treasurer, When he will introduce a Bill to give effect to the Government proposal made in the Financial Statement, that a bonus of 2s. per ton up to 50,000 tons be paid on coals exported from the colony to countries beyond Australia? It was a matter of considerable importance, and people were getting anxious to know when the Government intended to move in the matter.

Mr. WARD hoped to have a Bill upon this matter circulated before the House separated.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Government, Whether they will instruct the President of the Bank of New Zealand to have a separate account kept, and laid before the House within fourteen days of the commencement of each session, showing the business of the bank transacted in the Australian Colonies, the amount of profit or loss in connection with that account, and also the business transacted by the bank between New Zealand and each of the Australian Colonies?

Mr. WARD said the Government would not give any such instructions as were set forth in this question, neither would the Government undertake the responsibility of giving instructions in a direction likely to embarrass the management of this institution. While every one was desirous of seeing the institution doing well, it was not the wish of the Government that they should do anything or suggest anything that would have the effect of acting disastrously on the institution. He did not think the affairs of any large monetary institution could be successfully carried on if the details of its business were to be publicly discussed in that Chamber. There were responsible duties placed upon the executive of the institution. There were two officers there who represented the colony, and their business would be to report to the Government from time to time if anything improper was being done. He wished to say it did appear to the Government to be highly inexpedient to the interests of the country that the details or the affairs connected with this institution should be continually threshed out on the floor of the House; and he wished to say that without any offence to the honourable gentleman, who was actuated, as they all were, by a desire to see that the guarantee of the colony worked out in the interests of the colony. In saying this, he wished to remark that, as far as the Government were concerned, when the executive was fairly at work the Government would not interfere with the management or administration of the bank in any way whatever. That responsibility must be placed on the executive, and the President of the bank would guard the interests of the colony, and by results these responsible officers must be judged. It would be, he thought, not only a mistake, but be calculated to very seriously interfere with the successful working of the institution they all desired in the interests of the country so much to see prosper, if the Government interfered in the manner suggested by the question.

Mr. BELL asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether, if the directors of the Bank of New Zealand should propose during the recess to amalgamate with another institution, he will direct the President to prohibit any such dealing until this House shall have first expressly approved the same?

Mr. WARD might inform the honourable gentleman that the Government would place the matter beyond all doubt so far as the House was concerned before the House prorogued this session. In order to prevent any idea that something was going to be done during the recess, the Government would place such an Act on the statute-book that no one could have the slightest doubt as to what, in the event of any contingency arising, would be the lines upon which anything would be done by the Government. The Government knew nothing of any intended proposal; but, in the event of anything arising during the recess, honourable members would be informed of what the Government would do in the Bill which they would bring down.

EMPLOYMENT FOR THE ABLE AND WILLING.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON asked the Government, Do they intend, over and above the current legislation of this session, to propose any direct and definite means whereby employment shall be assured for all who are able and willing to work? Considering the large number of unemployed there were in the colony, this was a question of very great importance; it was of far more importance to the country than the management of the Bank of New Zealand or the San Francisco service or anything else; and he hoped the Premier would be able to give him an answer that would satisfy himself and other honourable members that there would be no fear of anything serious happening during the recess.

Mr. REEVES believed, with the honourable gentleman, that the question of employment for all who were able and willing to work was the most important of all questions. The Government thought that what they proposed to do, coupled with the legislation they had passed already, would represent their contribution towards the practical solution of the question. If, however, the honourable gentleman could make any suggestions in the matter, the Government would be only too glad to give due consideration to them.

COAL.

30. Mr. W. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Mines, When the return ordered by the House of the quantity of coal from the various mines of the colony, also the price of the same at the pit-mouth and at the various centres of population, will be laid upon the table?

Mr. SEDDON said inquiries had been made with a view of eliciting the necessary information and with a view of obtaining a report, but the matter had taken a long time. He hoped, however, that it would not be long now before he was able to furnish the information to the House.

ONEHUNGA WHARF.

Major HARRIS asked the Government, Have the Railway Commissioners given better facility to the public using the Onehunga Wharf for dray-traffic since the Hon. the Premier on 6th July (in answer to a question) gave assurance that they would remedy what was complained of? Also, have the charges complained of been reduced for shipping and landing stock at the above wharf?

Mr. SEDDON said he was not in a position to say what the Railway Commissioners had done in reference to this matter, but he had no doubt their attention would be called to the importance of the question. What was stated in the question was quite correct, and he himself thought that something more should be done than had been done. He spoke with regard to the traffic on this wharf.

VOLUNTEERS' LONG-SERVICE MEDALS.

Major HARRIS asked the Government, Is it the intention of the Government to prohibit the wearing of long-service medals granted to Volunteers by the New Zealand Government if the said Volunteers accept the decoration given by Her Majesty for long service?

Mr. SEDDON said the regulation dealing with this matter was, he thought, an Imperial regulation, which prevented Volunteers wearing at the same time the New Zealand decorations and also the Imperial decoration. The Government was moving in the direction of obviating this difficulty. He thought, himself, that if men who had won the long-service medal in the colony were compelled to give it up before receiving the Imperial decoration that might cause many to refuse the Imperial decoration, and he did not see why both should not be worn side by side.

JACKEYTOWN-PALMERSTON RAILWAY.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will have a report made as to the feasibility, advisability, and probable cost of removing the railway between Jackeytown and Palmerston North to the centre of the road, so as to give proper access to property-owners adjoining the said railway-line who have been illegally deprived of such access? He merely wished to point out to the Minister for Public Works that great inconvenience and injustice had been done to residents along the line of railway owing to their access being taken away, and he would like the Minister during the recess to get some roads made so that inconvenience and injustice to the residents might to some extent be obviated.

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Commissioners was that there were no engineering difficulties in the way of removing the railway between Jackeytown and Palmerston North to the centre of the road, so as to give proper access to property-owners adjoining the railway-line on both sides, except at Longburn. The probable cost of the work in question would be about £8,500, but this amount did not include any alteration at Longburn Station, which would not be feasible, nor did it include any formation of public roads. As to advisability, it would be an advantage to the property-owners on one side, by giving unobstructed access to their frontage; but, if this concession was contemplated, it should be remembered that there were many miles of railway in the colony in the same position. The property-owners had not been illegally deprived of access, the position being provided for in the Public Works Acts. He might say that if this would cost £8,500 it would prohibit the work from being done, as the Government considered it would be better to spend the money to complete unfinished railway-lines or to make roads for the settlers, so that they could get to their lands.

JUDGE KETTLE'S PETITION.

Mr. WILLIS asked the Minister of Justice, —(1.) Whether it is the intention of the Government to give full effect to the report of the Public Petitions Committee on Mr. District Judge Kettle's petition? (2.) Why, in this particular case, the Crown Solicitor was not instructed to appear for the Crown on the hearing of Mr. Jellicoe's appeal in the Supreme Court from the District Court order fining him for contempt of Court, more especially as important questions as to the jurisdiction of the Court and questions affecting the administration of justice were in issue?

Mr. REEVES said, with regard to the first part of the question, the matter was under consideration, and, with regard to the second part, the Government had been advised not to interfere.

RAILWAY MAINTENANCE-MEN.

Mr. WILLIS asked the Premier, Whether he has received any information with reference to the statement made by Mr. W. Hutchison to this House on the 25th September, that the maintenance-men on the Government railways are being worked excessive hours, special reference being made by Mr. Hutchison to the Wanganui and Aramoho employés? He said his reason for asking the question was that the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison) had made a statement to the House that the men employed at Wanganui and Aramoho had made complaints about the number of hours they had been working. The men themselves had stated that Mr. Hutchison had been misinformed, and they asked him to bring the matter before the House; and he would read a letter addressed to himself, which was as follows:—

"Wanganui, 1st October, 1894.

"DEAR SIR,—I notice by the Wellington Post of 26th September, 1894, that Mr. Hutchison referred in the House to the long hours worked by the maintenance-men at Aramoho and Wanganui. I beg leave to inform you that I have made the fullest inquiry, and find that the maintenance-men get paid for every hour they work overtime, and that the men have nothing to complain of. I would like if you would bring this matter before the House, as it looks as if the men had been complaining to Mr. Hutchison on the matter, which I know is not the case.—I remain, &c., "H. ROBERTSON,

Mr. Seddon

"Secretary A.S.R.S., Wanganui.

"A. D. Willis, Esq., M.H.R."

He was also assured by the ganger at Aramoho that the men there had no complaints whatever to make. Whatever complaints there might have been in the past, those troubles were now fully removed, and the men were thoroughly satisfied with the way in which they were being treated. That applied both to the Wanganui and Aramoho branches.

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Railway Commissioners was that they had no information as to the statement made by Mr. W. Hutchison on the 25th September regarding alleged excessive hours of maintenance-men at Wanganui and Aramoho. No complaints had reached the Commissioners. The rule was as previously stated—namely, eight hours per diem.

MRS. GLASSON.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Colonial Treasurer, If the Government will give effect to their distinct pledge of 24th February, 1892, to Mrs. Glasson, widow of Mr. Arthur Evelyn Glasson, late of the Postal Department; also in accordance with the recommendation of the Public Petitions A to L Committee—namely, "That, in the opinion of the Committee, the full two years' salary should be paid to the petitioner," and grant her the sum of £95, making the full sum of £380 promised by the Government as compassionate allowance, and which sum she was instructed would be paid on application to the Chief Postmaster, Christchurch?

Mr. WARD said that in 1892 he gave instructions, after the death of Mr. Glasson, that the widow should receive a sum amounting to two years' salary. He might state that the matter had come before the Cabinet, when it was found to be unusual to pay two years' salary in such cases, and the Cabinet minute was to the effect that only eighteen months' salary should be authorised. He then intimated to Mrs. Glasson that that decision could not be altered. Since then representations had been made by Mrs. Glasson, and the matter had been reported on by the Public Petitions Committee, and on each occasion it was decided that the decision to grant eighteen months' salary should be adhered to. That being the case, it was not possible to alter what had been decided on.

ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS SALE CONTROL ACT.

Mr. MEREDITH asked the Premier, As the expense of the administration of "The Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act, 1893," amounting to £6,948 8s. 10d., was wholly defrayed out of the revenue of local bodies, does the Government intend reimbursing local bodies for loss of such revenue? He would like to point out that this question was one of considerable interest to local bodies, inasmuch as under the Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act the administration was carried out partly by the Government and partly by the local bodies, and therefore the Government should defray a portion of the expenses. Up to a couple of months ago the amount expended was nearly £7,000, and this had been wholly taken out of the resources of the local bodies, and they felt it to be a great hardship. He had himself asked, when the Bill was in Committee, that the expense and costs should be defrayed by the Government, and the Minister in charge of the Bill replied that the matter would not be lost sight of. He would remind the Minister of that promise.

Mr. SEDDON replied that the honourable gentleman was quite correct in stating that he had promised that the question of costs would be considered. He certainly had made that statement during the passage of the Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Bill last session. Since then the Government had asked for a return from the local bodies showing the cost of the election of Licensing Committees during the last three years, and, if it was found that there was much difference as against the local authorities, then he should be prepared to submit the question to the favourable consideration of the Cabinet.

Mr. MEREDITH would like to point out that formerly, when the licensing districts were smaller than they were now, the local bodies had the appointment of the Returning Officers, and their expenses were borne by the local bodies. Now the Returning Officers were appointed by the Government, and they in turn appointed Deputies and poll-clerks: hence there was friction between the Government and the local bodies in administering the Act. He would like to ask the Minister when the return he had referred to would be available.

Mr. SEDDON thought it was ready now, or, at any rate, it ought to be. He did not think the cause of friction was the appointment of the Returning Officers; it was simply the question of pounds shillings and pence. And, as to what the last elections cost, he had to say that, whatever the difference was as against the local authorities, it would receive due consideration from the Government.

TARIFF REVISION.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Government, Whether they have considered the reports and recommendations of the Tariff Revision Committee, and, if so, will they state to the House the decision arrived at in connection therewith?

Mr. WARD said the matter was under consideration, and it depended altogether upon whether honourable members were prepared to have a lengthy session as to whether anything could be done in the matter this session. He did not himself think anything could be done this session.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Government, Whether they intend to carry out the report of the Old-age Pensions Committee by appointing a Royal Commission to take evidence on the question during the recess, with power to formulate a scheme, such scheme and report to be submitted to members of this House at least a month before the assembling of Parliament?

Mr. SEDDON thought honourable members would admit that this colony was somewhat in advance of other colonies in dealing with questions of this nature, and if they took some steps in the direction indicated it would be, he thought, a desirable thing to do. The matter was, however, surrounded with difficulties, and it meant the expenditure of a large sum of money. However, the matter was worthy of consideration, and he might tell the honourable member that the Government would fully consider it during the recess.

CHINESE.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Government, Whether they will introduce a short Bill this session to prevent the wholesale naturalisation of Chinese now going on in the colony, with the apparent object of evading restrictive legislation on Chinese traders? His reason for putting the question was that it had been shown that a very large number of Chinese were naturalising themselves. This, of course, was strongly objected to by the colonists, as it would tend to prevent Parliament from being able to deal with these people when it came to restrict them, because they would have placed themselves beyond the law regarding Chinese traders. He presumed there was no possibility of a Bill dealing with Asiatics and Chinese being passed into law this session—he meant the Undesirable Immigrants Exclusion Bill.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, yes.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL understood that Bill was not to be gone on with, and, if that were so, he would suggest that the Government should bring in a short Bill of one or two clauses restricting the influx of Chinese.

Mr. REEVES said, as regarded the Undesirable Immigrants Exclusion Bill, if the rest of the House were of the same obliging temper as the honourable member for Riccarton on the subject the Bill would pass into law within the next few days. As regarded his introducing another Bill in addition to that, he thought if he were to introduce any more short Bills he would be threatened with a parliamentary strike. But, fortunately, there were some means of restricting the naturalisation of undesirable Chinese. The Government proposed in future to call for a report, which they were entitled to do, as to the character of each applicant for naturalisation, and that report would contain information as to the length of time the applicant had resided in the colony. He thought that might perhaps prevent the naturalisation of undesirable Chinese, and for the rest, of course, they would have to await the general Bill.

E. TAYLOR AND ANOTHER.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Government, Whether they have considered the question of reimbursing the costs incurred by Edward Taylor and another through the passing of section 21 of "The Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act, 1893"; and, if so, what is the decision arrived at?

Mr. SEDDON said they had not got to the supplementary estimates yet.

KINDERGARTEN SCHOOLS.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Education, If he will encourage the kindergarten schools in the several towns of the colony by proposing to place a sum of money on the supplementary estimates by way of a grant in aid of voluntary subscriptions for their maintenance? He knew the interest which the Minister of Education took in this desirable work, and he hoped the honourable gentleman would be able to give him a favourable answer.

Mr. REEVES wished he could give the honourable gentleman a favourable answer, because he had been very unlucky in the answers he had given the honourable gentleman lately. Most of those answers had not been of what he might call a satisfactory character, and if before the session ended he was enabled to give a favourable answer to the honourable gentleman he would be very glad indeed. Unfortunately, with regard to the present question, he might say that every sixpence that he could screw out of Parliament for the education vote would be required for ordinary purposes.

MINING INDUSTRY.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Minister of Mines, Whether he will cause the Mining Regulations to be revised at an early date, with the view of dealing more liberally with miners and others, by way of encouragement in developing the mineral resources of this colony?

Mr. SEDDON said the Minister of Mines had a Bill now before the House which dealt with the matters referred to in this question. He might say that the Government were of opinion that our mining industries required to be fostered, and that much more required to be done than they had been enabled to do during the last few years; but a new departure, he hoped, would be made. They must not lose sight of the great advantage to the colony which must result if the mining industries were more prosperous.

AGENT-GENERAL.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Premier, If the Government will now inform the House who is to be Agent-General when Sir Westby Perceval's present term of office expires? When the estimates were going through, the Colonial Treasurer told the House, in reply to a question which he (Dr. Newman) asked, that the Agent-General had not been appointed. As Sir Westby Perceval's term of office would be up in two months' time, he thought the House and the colony would like to know who had been appointed to the office.

Mr. SEDDON might say that no appointment had been made. The matter had not yet been finally settled by the Cabinet, but it would have to be settled before long.

STATE FARM.

Mr. THOMPSON asked the Minister of Labour,—(1) Whether the State farm at Levin is being worked on any well-defined plan or system with the view of making it self-supporting in the near future; (2) under what form of tenure are the workmen permitted to erect their dwellings and occupy their sections on the farm; (3) what are the qualifications necessary to enable workmen to get employment on the farm, and is this employment to be permanent; and (4) what are the rates of wages at present earned by the workmen on the farm? In asking this question, he would assume that before starting operations on the farm some well-defined plan had been prepared by the Minister of Labour, and that operations were being carried on under some well-defined regulations. He hoped the honourable gentleman would answer his question as fully as possible, for all he desired was information.

Mr. REEVES said, if the honourable gentleman meant, in the first part of the question, whether the Government had a sort of written constitution drawn up to cover the whole system under which this farm was being worked and was going to be worked, then his reply was, No, they had nothing of the kind. They were at present satisfied with the endeavour to convert a piece of bush-land into a farm which would be productive, and pay. The men were taken on the qualification of their being out of and unable to get work, and being in bad need of work. They took on elderly men in preference to young men, and men with families in preference to single men. Most of those who were on were elderly men, and, with few exceptions, the Government did not seek for first-class workmen. It was rather a place for men who were not first class, or for elderly men with families. Of course, if they proved fit to remain, they remained there; but, with regard to young and single men, the object was not to keep them there permanently, but after a time to pass them on, after they had done something to earn their living, to the ordinary labour market. As regarded the cottages and the tenure under which they were held, the men put up their cottages and paid for the material, and were allowed a quarter of an acre for a vegetable-garden. They did not pay any amount for the site of the cottage or for the garden. The Government had the right to send them adrift if it thought that they were unfit to remain. The Government would pay a fair price for any cottages such dismissed men put up. The family which went into one of these cottages which had been erected by such outgoing tenant would have to pay more rent for the cottage. With regard to the cultivation of the farm, most of the land being bush, their business chiefly had been confined to felling bush. They had made some money out of the sale of timber. After they had cleared the bush they would be able to cultivate the land. As to the wages most of the men were paid, they worked on the contract system, and earned from 5s. to 7s. A few of the men—very few, and those almost entirely the older men, or the less capable men—were allowed to do day-work. Their wages were not high, of course,—between 4s. and 5s. a day. They had not to pay rent or to go and look for work, so that they could live very cheaply there. They would not be able to work very well under the contract system. If they worked at contract rates they would not probably make so much as they were getting at day rates. When next year's labour report was compiled the farm would have been working a sufficient time to enable the department to give a fuller report than they had been able to give this year, although, as honourable members would see, the present report contained a good deal of information. He hoped, however, next year they would be able to give a great deal more information. Having heard lately one or two complaints with regard to the system pursued, and the management, from a farming point of view, he had got one of the best officers of the Agricultural Department to go up there and examine the whole working of the farm. That officer would make a report to his Minister and to him (Mr. Reeves). He would go up to the farm in a few days, and his report would be received shortly.

Mr. Reeves

Mr. THOMPSON asked whether it was intended to employ these men permanently or temporarily.

Mr. REEVES said he had stated that, with regard to the older men with families, it was his intention to keep them there. With regard to the younger and single men, the idea was to pass them on.

LOCAL BODIES' VALUATION CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. HOGG asked the Postmaster-General, If he will recognise the assistance rendered by local bodies to the Land-tax Department by allowing correspondence on valuation business only to be franked? He had been asked by representatives of local bodies to submit this question. He thought it was only fair that the local bodies should have every facility for obtaining the information indicated without undergoing very large expense. It was well known that the amount of rates paid to the local bodies was in some instances very small, and if the correspondence had to be paid for it would become a very heavy tax upon the local bodies.

Mr. WARD was sorry he must give the honourable member a similar answer to that which he gave to the honourable member for the Bay of Islands earlier in the session. He regretted that he could not see his way to authorise this being done.

DRAIN-PIPES.

Mr. MASSEY asked the Minister of Agriculture,—(1) Whether it is a fact that the District Surveyor of Cheviot reported that Auckland-made drain-pipes were 25 per cent. better than those made in Christchurch; and (2) whether, in the face of the above report, instructions have been given that none but Christchurch-made pipes shall be used on any Government works in Canterbury? He asked this question after reading the letters of certain manufacturers in the district which he represented, and which complained of what was set forth in the question. If the statement referred to in the question was correct, the manufacturers in his district had a just cause of complaint. They only asked what was reasonable—namely, that those who produced the best article at the lowest price, no matter what part of the colony they belonged to, should be allowed to supply the Government.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE was afraid the honourable gentleman had been made use of in this matter. It was quite true that they did use Auckland and Canterbury pipes on the Cheviot Estate, but after some time they could not see the necessity for sending to Auckland for pipes when they could be got at Christchurch just as well. Therefore instructions were given to the officer in charge of the work to get the Canterbury pipes, but only on the condition that they were as good and as cheap as those from Auckland; so that no injustice could possibly be done to Auckland in the matter.

POLICE.

Mr. GUINNESS asked the Minister of Defence, Whether the Commissioner of Police has carried out the instructions which he states in his report this year to the Defence Minister be received—viz.: "I was instructed to promote to second-class rank all the third-class constables who had served seven years in the Force with clean defaulters' sheets; and shortly afterwards I was directed to promote to second-class rank all third-class constables who had seven years' service in the Force with only one trivial entry in the defaulters' sheets";—and, if not, why not? He would refer the Minister to the annual report of the Police Force of the colony by Lieutenant-Colonel Hume, the Commissioner. In paragraph 8 he found the above sentence. He wished to know whether the Commissioner had acted on the instructions. He knew some constables hailing even from the West Coast, who had got first-class certificates for seven years, and against whom there was no entry on the defaulters' list, had not been promoted, and he wished to know why. Very likely there were other cases with which he was not acquainted.

Mr. SEDDON said if the honourable member had pointed out to him that there were any constables who had been overlooked the matter would have been attended to. The instructions mentioned in the report had been carefully carried out. Such was the reply of the department. He thought, however, they were making too much altogether of the police-constable question, which was too frequently brought on the floor of the House. It gave grounds to the objection taken to having given them political rights. Bringing matters of this kind before the House did not help the police. The honourable gentleman was quite within his rights, but if he had written to him and pointed out cases where constables had been overlooked he (Mr. Seddon) would have had the matter attended to, and so would the Commissioner. He did not wish to be bothered with these matters. Two or three cases had cropped up, as had been formerly stated, where there had been an omission in the long list of constables, but that had been rectified. In looking through the defaulters' list it was a question of what was held to be an offence. One Inspector might hold a different view from another. The department had endeavoured to act fairly and impartially in the matter of promotions.

RAILWAY EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. J. W. KELLY asked the Premier, if he has yet decided to refer the charge made by Sir R. Stout, involving the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants and the Railway Commissioners re black-listing of certain railway employés, to a Select Committee? He desired to state, in justice to the Ministry, that the report which appeared in a newspaper the other day, stating that pressure had been brought to bear upon him to withdraw this question, was entirely without foundation. No Minister had approached him, and he thought they knew him well enough not to attempt to do anything of the kind, because he was determined, so far as he was concerned, to have this matter probed to the bottom.

Mr. SEDDON said the Government had come to a decision on the question. He had carefully read the Hansard report of the speech of the senior member for Wellington City, and, having given it the fullest consideration, he did not see anything therein stated that would warrant the Government in referring the matter either to a special Committee or to the Railways Committee. Such men as the Chief Commissioner (Mr. McKerrow), Mr. Scott, and Mr. Ronayne were, of course, as every one knew, men of integrity, and the assertion had been entirely negatived by their statements.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. SEDDON said that those gentlemen stated there was not the slightest foundation for what had been asserted. The matter rested there, and the legislation under the Railways Act clearly intended that on questions of administration the Railway Commissioners should not be interfered with. If any persons felt aggrieved by what had been done by the Railway Commissioners the House was open to them through petition. They were at present not before the House, nor was there any grievance at all to deal with. They had certain statements by the member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), but he had not made any direct charge against the Commissioners; he had simply, in his speech, referred to what he had been told, and what he had been told was not, in the opinion of the Government, sufficient to warrant them in placing the Commissioners on their trial. The fact of doing so would be a reflection on them, and on those in whose honour and integrity the Government had every confidence.

BAND CONTEST.

Mr. DUNCAN asked the Defence Minister, if the Government will make arrangements with the Railway Commissioners to grant free passes to bandsmen in uniform who have entered for the forthcoming competition to be held at Invercargill this year, so as to put all bands on the same footing as they were last year? The bandsmen who attended the annual competition had been, in the past, in the habit of getting free passes, but, when they applied this year for the same concession, it had been refused them. He wished to know on what grounds they had been refused, and why they were not placed this year in the same position as they were in in former years.

Mr. SEDDON said it was true that in the past the Defence Department, under arrangement with the Commissioners, issued free passes to Volunteer bandsmen attending the competitions. The cost of this amounted to a total of £300. The Railway Commissioners now refused to grant the concession that had been previously given to the Defence Department, and the Defence Department did not see its way to incur the liability of £300 for this purpose. He regretted himself that notification of the alteration was not given in time, because to that extent the bands who had given notice of their intention to take part in the competition might have a grievance. For his own part, he thought reduced rates might be given, as in the case of persons attending exhibitions. The Railway Commissioners had made some concessions—he thought they were prepared to take excursion rates. For his own part, he thought the money would be better spent in making roads than in being given for the purpose of carrying bands free.

Mr. DUNCAN said the Minister had missed the point. He (Mr. Duncan) did not look upon this as a monetary loss—it was simply a matter of a few shillings' worth of coal to carry the men. It did not matter whose pocket it came from.

Subsequently,

Mr. SEDDON read the following answer from the department:—

“So far as the Railway Commissioners are concerned, all the bands attending the contest at Invercargill have been placed on the same footing as in previous years. It is understood, however, that some of the garrison bands have been in the habit of obtaining orders for free Volunteer tickets, contrary to the arrangement between this department and the Defence Department. Notice has been given that payment will be required in future for these tickets at the reduced rate charged to other bandmen, who have been placed at a great disadvantage hitherto by the issue of free tickets."

Mr. Seddon

WELLINGTON-WAIRARAPA RAILWAY TRAFFIC.

Mr. HOGG asked the Premier, Whether it is proposed to introduce more powerful locomotives and more comfortable passenger-cars on the Wellington-Wairarapa Railway line, or to make such alterations in the traffic arrangements as will shorten the time occupied between the city and the country townships? It was within the knowledge of a large number of members who used this line that the carriages were neither smoke- nor weather-proof. The journey from the Wairarapa side up the Rimutaka was pursued at a snail's pace through a number of tunnels. The lamps, which were of a very old-fashioned, antiquated pattern, were frequently extinguished by the smoke in these tunnels. The carriages themselves were constantly filled with sulphurous fumes, which were most obnoxious to passengers, especially females. Then, on the town side, the train was allowed to pursue its course at a breakneck pace, something after the fashion of a drunken switchback, and the passengers on that part of the line were rocked until they were as sick as if they were at sea. The seats were hard even in the first-class carriages, and the paint was worn off. The floors were rarely swept, let alone cleaned, and the journey was one of a most disagreeable character. With regard to the second part of the question, the time occupied in the seventy-mile journey between Wellington and Masterton was from four hours ten minutes to four hours and a half. The ninety miles from Eketahuna occupied five and a half hours. There were frequent stoppages: in fact, there was a station at nearly every dairy and large residence on the road. The result was that the passenger-traffic was very much diminished, and people only travelled when absolutely compelled to do so. At Masterton, because of the arrival and despatch of trains, passengers were only able to remain three hours, and at Eketahuna one hour. If the engines were altered the trains would be able to travel at a much more rapid rate, and the people residing at Eketahuna would have an opportunity of receiving and answering letters on the same day, instead of waiting twenty-four hours as at present. He would summarise it in this way: As far as passenger-traffic was concerned they were working their mail-coaches with heavy draught horses.

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Commissioners was as follows:—

"Provision is being made, as opportunity occurs and funds permit, for more powerful locomotives and more comfortable carriages on the Wellington Section. Three new saloon carriages will shortly be placed on the line. The question of revising the time-table is receiving consideration."

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Minister for Public Works, in respect to the progress of the Otago Central Railway, What is being done to more expeditiously push on the work of the chief tunnel beyond Hyde?

Mr. SEDDON said the tunnel referred to was not a particularly formidable affair. The excavation was only estimated to cost £2,500. The approaches to the tunnel at both ends had been in hand for some time, and preparations for excavating the tunnel itself were now being put in hand. The department had never lost sight of the matter for a moment. Nearly a year ago they wrote to the District Engineer on the subject, and he replied that it was too soon to put the work in hand then. Other memoranda on the subject had passed since, the result being that a full estimate of the cost of the work was received from Mr. Ussher recently, which was now before the Cabinet for consideration. As he had stated in answer to another question on the same subject, he hoped in the course of forty-eight hours to say what it was intended to do with respect to this work.

GREY RIVER-BLACKBALL ROAD.

Mr. GUINNESS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether the Government will place on the public-works estimates a sufficient sum of money to complete and put into a passable condition the road from the Grey River to the Township of Blackball? He had only to state that a recent telegram he had received in regard to this road from one of his constituents described this track or road which the Government had had constructed as being in an execrably bad condition; and he thought, when the Government undertook the work of constructing a road for a rising township such as Blackball, that they should see that the road was, at any rate, completed so as to be of some use to the inhabitants. He hoped the honourable gentleman would not lose sight of this small piece of work, but make provision for it on the public-works estimates.

Mr. SEDDON said inquiries would be made into the condition of this road. If it was as stated by the honourable member, then it was a matter which should demand consideration. Whether that consideration would be given this session or not he was not in a position at the present time to state.

INTERCOLONIAL FREE-TRADE.

Mr. O'REGAN asked the Premier, If, in view of the declaration made recently by the new Victorian Premier in favour of inter-colonial free-trade, the Government will take steps to encourage and develop the laudable desire to bring about commercial amity between the Australasian Colonies by representing to the several Governments the desirability of an Intercolonial Trade Conference? He put this question because he was not at all satisfied with the reply he received some time ago to a similar question. On that occasion he thought the answer he obtained was more evasive than anything else, and he had been prompted to ask this further question because he thought constant dropping made an impression even on the hardest stone. On a former occasion the Premier said that he had only his (Mr. O'Regan's) word for the assertion that there had been a revulsion of feeling in the neighbouring colonies in favour of commercial peace between these colonies. Since then, however, they had had a very definite announcement from the Premier of Victoria.

Mr. SEDDON said New Zealand went to the other colonies and asked them to do this months ago. He hoped now the other colonies would come to New Zealand, and, if they did, that New Zealand would be prepared to treat with them. The Government believed it would be an advantage to this colony, whilst it would be a benefit to the other colonies also. He would be very much pleased himself that an understanding should be come to; and he was sure he voiced the feeling of the House when he said that, as far as New Zealand was concerned, they did not want tariff war. They wanted commercial peace.

FISHING IN ASHLEY RIVER.

Mr. BUDDO asked the Minister of Marine, If his attention has been called to the complaints of fishermen engaged in fishing for whitebait in the Ashley River against the recent Order in Council making the use of set-nets for the capture of whitebait illegal, and what steps, if any, they intend to take to modify this order? He might remind the Minister in charge of this department it was a very important thing to have an ample supply of fresh fish. Whilst he had little sympathy with set-net fishing he wanted to know if the department had taken into consideration whether the conditions under which fishing was being carried on on the east and west coasts were not the same. That was to say, the small set-net was of very little use where the flow of the water was strong, whereas it might be ample where the water was still. He trusted the department would take the matter into consideration.

Mr. WARD said complaints had been received from the fishermen at the Ashley River, but not from those at Hokitika, Greymouth, Westport, and Foxton, at which places whitebait was caught in large quantities. The action complained of was taken on a report received from the Inspector of Fisheries at Hokitika that small fry of all kinds were caught in these set-nets, and that the practice of using such nets was very injurious to the fishery. There was no objection to the use of hand-nets for whitebait, and fishermen at the Ashley were not debarred from following this part of their occupation. In the interest of the conservation of fish, it did not seem to be unreasonable that fishermen should be prevented from catching whitebait in a way that destroyed the young of other fish. From the information he had upon the matter he did not think that it would be expedient to modify the regulations so as to make them applicable only to certain places.

Mr. O'Regan

MINING INDUSTRY.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Government, Whether more earnest consideration will be given in the near future to the mining industry of the colony, with the view of granting practical encouragement towards prospecting, opening tracks, water-races, and the conservation of water, that will help more quickly to develop the great mineral resources of New Zealand, and give some hope to the enterprising miners that the Government will not neglect their interests and calling?

Mr. SEDDON said the Government were fully alive to the necessity of assisting the development of the mining industry, and this was shown in the concluding paragraph of the Statement of the Minister of Mines, which had been laid on the table. He hoped that the honourable member would very shortly have substantial proof that the Government were desirous of encouraging this most valuable industry.

WAIPORI DREDGES.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Government, Whether they will at once seriously consider the Waipori-dredges difficulty and the terrible hardship it is causing to families, and inform the House when the legislation to effectually deal with the question is to be put before members?

Mr. SEDDON might say that he could concur with the honourable member as regarded the Waipori difficulty, and the very great hardships which were being endured by the miners and their families by being thrown out of work through the stoppage of mining operations in that part of the colony. But the settlement of this dispute involved a very large sum of money, and it was a question whether that large sum of money should be found for the purpose. The Government had the matter under consideration, and he hoped, in the course of a few days, to place the matter before the House, and in such a way as to give satisfaction.

STAGE SYSTEM ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. MASSEY asked the Government, Whether, when they take over the railways of the colony, they will be willing to make a trial of the stage system on the lines north of Auckland? He had been induced to put this question on the Order Paper owing to the fact that a great many people in the colony were strongly of opinion that the stage system would be a great improvement on the present method of working the railways. In a few months the railways would be taken over by the Government; consequently an opportunity offered of making an experiment to try the stage system on one of the lines of the colony. It had occurred to him that the Auckland-Kaukapapa Section would be particularly suitable for this purpose, as an average amount of goods and passengers was carried over it, and, as it was detached from other lines, there would be no difficulty in keeping the accounts separate. He hoped the Minister would see his way to favourably answer the question.

Mr. SEDDON was not in a position at this stage to say what the Government would do in reference to this question—at least, in regard to the matter involved in the question. It was well that they should have a Minister of Railways in office and in control of the railways, and then he would be in a better position to state what course would be taken. If the honourable member would adopt the suggestion he wished to make, he would postpone this question till next session, and then he (Mr. Seddon) would be in a better position to give a satisfactory reply.

Mr. MASSEY said, Very well, he would postpone it till next session.

COUNTY COUNCIL VALUATIONS.

Mr. MASSEY (for Mr. McGuire) asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether the Government will, in view of the local bodies having the cost of assessment thrown upon them, allow the County Council valuers to search titles in connection with the forthcoming valuation free of cost?

Mr. WARD might say that the local bodies were now permitted to search the titles to land free of charge, provided the search was conducted by the Clerk of the Council or some person duly authorised by him.

H. VON BLARAMBERG.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister of Education, What steps he intends to take with regard to the Public Petitions Committee's report on the petition of H. von Blaramberg? He would like to point out to the Minister of Education that this was a matter of extreme urgency. This man had been out of employment for the last twelve months, in consequence of the action of the Education Board. Some inquiry should be made immediately, in accordance with the recommendation of the Public Petitions Committee. The information brought before the Committee was such as to warrant an inquiry, and he trusted the Minister would see that no delay took place.

Mr. REEVES had sent to the Board for a statement of the differences in this case, and the matter, he understood, was to come before the Board on the 8th October. He was now awaiting a communication from the Board to the Education Department on the subject.

TEMPORARY CLERKS, ETC.

Sir R. STOUT asked the Government, When the return ordered on the 12th September regarding temporary clerks, &c., will be laid on the table? This return was ordered on the 12th September, and he believed it would only take a day to prepare.

Mr. SEDDON said the return was in course of compilation, and steps would be taken to expedite its completion. Several returns had been ordered previous to this one, and the department, in the absence of instructions to the contrary, had in most cases proceeded with the preparation of the returns in the order in which they had been called for. The Government had no desire to keep them back; in fact, they desired that the fullest information should be given, and with that view he had asked to have added the number of clerks who had been retired and dismissed or who had left the service during the period mentioned.

MOORE, HEPBURN, AND ROBINSON.

Sir R. STOUT asked the Government, If the recommendation of the Petitions Committees A to L and M to Z on the several petitions of Messrs. Moore, Hepburn, and Robinson will be given effect to by the sums recommended to be paid them being placed on the supplementary estimates? This was a very hard case. These men were entitled to this compensation, which the Committee thought they were entitled to. The Committee had asked the Premier to have laid before it the order or regulation that was read to the men by instructions from a former Minister of Defence. There was no doubt whatever that the men were entitled to compensation, and he thought the honourable member stated he would consider the matter about a month ago; and, that being the case, he hoped he would now be prepared to give a favourable reply. These were poor men who were really entitled to this money.

Mr. SEDDON did state what the honourable gentleman mentioned, and he stated, further, that it was a matter the Government would have to decide when dealing with the supplementary estimates. The reason why he had not been able to give a reply sooner was that they had not yet dealt with the petitions which had been brought before the House. The rule adopted by this Government and the late Government was not to deal with the petitions until all were in, and then they dealt with them altogether. He promised the honourable gentleman, further, that if they decided this matter in the negative he would give timely notice, so that the honourable member might know what to do. He had not forgotten that promise. He thought these men were entitled to something, but he would not say that they were entitled to all that the Committee had recommended.

CAPE FOULWIND RAILWAY-SLEEPERS.

Mr. O'REGAN asked the Government, If the Government can see its way to arrange for the purchase of railway-sleepers from those men at Cape Foulwind who were permitted to cut sleepers while the Westport harbour-works were suspended?

Mr. SEDDON said the Railway Commissioners had sent the following reply:—

"During the period from 15th August, 1893, to 11th September, 1894, 13,663 sleepers in sixty-seven small lots have been bought by the Railway Commissioners from settlers of Westport and Cape Foulwind, at a fixed price of 2s. 6d. cash on delivery at Westport. This is sufficient for present requirements."

The Public Works Department also gave the following reply:—

"This department is not in want of sleepers at present, as we have a considerable number in stock. As, however, we should be able to use them in a few months probably, we might, perhaps, take them if the owners are willing to sell at a reduced price. The Railway Commissioners usually pay 2s. 6d. for sleepers delivered at Westport. I would suggest that we might offer 2s. 4d."

4.0. He might say this was a matter in which he did not concur with the department. He did not think the colony should take advantage of the position of these men. If 2s. 6d. was a fair charge, then the colony should pay it. He knew the necessities of these men, and the difficulties under which they laboured at the time the work was suspended. He would give this matter his favourable consideration, and would see what could be done.

WAIRARAPA UNEMPLOYED.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Government, What provision they intend to make during the present month for the unemployed in the Wairarapa district? He had put on the Order Paper a few days ago a similar question to that which he now asked, and he was induced to put this second question in consequence of further information which he had received from his constituency. In reply to his question on the previous occasion the Minister of Labour had stated that the pressure of the unemployed in the Wairarapa was much less than it had been. His (Mr. Buchanan's) information was that, on the contrary, it had become greater. For instance, a settler there had given over four thousand eight hundred meals to travellers within the last three months, and from other parts of the district the same information came as to the number of unemployed who were going around the country. He had also noticed by the newspapers that at three places where they had been accustomed to supply food to travellers they now advertised that they were unable any longer to give any food. He had received a communication from one of the settlers that they had been driven to this course by their inability to provide the amount of food required for the large number of these unemployed men. The honourable gentleman would therefore see the necessity for something being done to meet the state of affairs in that district. He hoped the Minister would give a favourable answer to the question.

Mr. REEVES said he would have special inquiries made at once. If the information laid before him at all tallied with the statements of the honourable gentleman, he would have the matter laid before the Cabinet, and would ask the Government to take such steps as could be taken to deal with the matter.

SECRETARY AND INSPECTOR OF FACTORIES.

Mr. GUINNESS asked the Government, Whether they will take into their favourable consideration the desirability of increasing the salary of the Secretary and Inspector of Factories from £350, so that this officer will be paid a salary nearly equal to those paid to the permanent head officers of the several other Government departments? He wanted to draw the attention of the Minister to the fact that the Inspector of Lunatic Asylums and Hospitals got £1,200 per annum; the Secretary to the Treasury, £700; the Under-Secretary to the Mines Department, £550; the Inspecting Engineer of Mines, £500; the Under-Secretary for Justice, £500; the Secretary to the Post Office, £700; the Secretary and Chief Inspector of the Agricultural Department—a new department—£500; the Under-Secretary for Crown Lands, £625; and the Secretary and Inspector-General of Schools, £600; whereas the officer in respect to whose salary he was asking this question got the small amount of £350 per annum. He thought, by comparison with these salaries, that an additional sum should be voted for this very deserving officer, who had charge of this very important department.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. REEVES said that one of the very few increases made by the House to officers receiving over £300 a year was an increase to the salary of this very officer. He certainly could not recommend or ask the House to vote a further increase to the salary this session. Mr. Tregear was a very deserving officer, but he had not been very long where he was. The department was not at all a large one, though important, and, in its way, troublesome. The officer had to stand a good deal of worry in performing his work. During the short time Mr. Tregear had been there he had had two increases already. No doubt if the department increased and assumed further functions his salary would grow with it. A comparison of his salary with those quoted by the honourable gentleman was not a fair comparison.

CUSTOMS ENTRY-FORMS.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Colonial Treasurer, If, seeing that shippers have now to provide their own entry-forms for supplying the Customs with returns of goods exported, the Government will have such forms printed and supplied from the principal railway-stations throughout the colony?

Mr. WARD might say that these forms had always been supplied, and were on sale at all stationers'. He did not think it would be right for the Customs Department to supply these forms free.

Mr. COLLINS said he did not suggest that they should be supplied free, but rather that they should be obtainable at places like Kaia-poi, Rangiora, Ashburton, and elsewhere.

Mr. WARD would give instructions to have them supplied to the places named.

WOODVILLE CORPORATION WORKS.

Mr. HALL asked the Minister of Labour, If he will inquire into the allegation of four gangs of co-operative labourers employed at the Woodville end of the Woodville-Eketahuna Railway under Messrs. Joyce, Ellery, Dumphy, and Wilks.—(1) That they have been set to work on sections of stumping and formation without being informed of the price to be given; (2) that they have been paid in some instances for formation only; (3) that no plans and specifications have been given them by which to carry on their work? (4.) If all or any of those allegations are correct, will the Government see that in the future these matters shall be remedied?

Mr. REEVES said the department sent down an officer to inquire, and furnish a report. The officer had returned, but the report had not yet been sent in. He would therefore suggest that the honourable gentleman should ask this question a few days hence.

OLD SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. E. M. SMITH asked the Government, When will the claims of the old soldiers residing in Wellington who have had their claims recommended be dealt with, so that those deserving men may get what they are justly entitled to? The reason why he was asking this question was this: In Wellington there were a number of old soldiers whose claims had been sent in to the Land Commissioner, and it was recommended that these men should get the grants of land they were entitled to. The session was now drawing to a close, and he wished to see what reply he would get from the Government.

Mr. J. McKENZIE might state that there was no law at the present time under which any further claims could be granted, and anything that was to be done in this matter would require legislation. There were still a large number of claims, and the question would have to stand over until next session, when all further claims could be dealt with.

RABBIT NUISANCE.

Mr. E. M. SMITH asked the Minister of Agriculture, When he will deal with the question of a bonus for the extermination of rabbits in New Zealand, as promised by him early in the session? At the early part of the session the Minister recognised this as being a very important question, and he said he hoped he would be able to give a definite answer before the close of the session. Knowing there were some inventors in England and in the colony who were only waiting for the Minister's liberal offer, he had great pleasure in asking the question standing in his name.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said he had not forgotten that this was a very important question, and that he had made the promise referred to by the honourable gentleman. The conditions for a bonus were being drafted, and all he could say was that if anything could be discovered to deal effectually with the rabbit-pest it would be worthy of a good bonus.

ONEHUNGA WHARF.

Mr. SEDDON said that, with regard to the question asked that afternoon by Major Harris, in justice to the Commissioners he wished to read the following reply:—

"The Onehunga Wharf has been made accessible for dray traffic. It is not proposed to make any reduction in the charges for shipping and landing stock at the Onehunga Wharf."

The Public Works Department replied as follows:—

"By your direction the Railway Commissioners were written to in reference to the above matter, and the following is a copy of their memorandum in reply:—

"Onehunga Wharf.—In reply to the above-quoted memorandum I am directed by the Railway Commissioners to inform you that the Onehunga Wharf has been made accessible for dray traffic. The Commissioners do not see their way to reduce the wharfage charge of 1s. 6d. per head on cattle landed at Onehunga Wharf.—E. G. PILCHER, Secretary."

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BUCHANAN wished to move the adjournment of the House in order to give him an opportunity of dealing with the subject of the unemployed in Wairarapa, which formed the subject of Question No. 49 on the Order Paper. The Minister of Labour had dealt with the question a few days ago in a manner that, as would be well within the recollection of the House, was not befitting the dignity of his office. He (Mr. Buchanan) regretted that he was not allowed to refer to a previous debate, because it prevented him from doing what he was sure no honourable member of that House would object to—namely, replying in an effective manner to the bitter and—

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable member, while regretting that he could not refer to what occurred on a previous occasion, was now alluding to a previous debate of the present session.

Mr. BUCHANAN would not persist in doing so. There would be many opportunities of subsequently bringing the question before the House, without alluding to a previous debate. He had pointed out in explaining his question that, contrary to what was said by the Minister of Labour, the number of unemployed in the Wairarapa district was very large indeed, so large that he felt compelled to put the question on the Order Paper a second time in order to obtain some relief for those unfortunate men. The state of the unemployed in the Wairarapa was largely due to the Government on these benches. The Minister of Labour represented the constituency of Christchurch City, and it had been again and again pointed out that so long as he was able to serve the unemployed in his own constituency he cared but little for the interests of those in other constituencies throughout the colony. If there was any "unemployed" agitation in Christchurch the honourable gentleman took very good care to cart his unemployed all over the colony, regardless altogether of those already in the district into which they were pitchforked. Even the honourable member for Masterton, a strong supporter of the Government, felt compelled to complain of the practices of the Minister of Labour. The Minister on a previous occasion had denied the charges made against him in this direction, and had asked him (Mr.

Buchanan) to prove that the unemployed in his district had come from the honourable gentleman's electorate. His reply was that these unemployed had, in the first instance, been taken into the Masterton district, and, as there was not a man-proof fence between it and his district, these men in search of employment, as a matter of course, found their way into his electorate. He had met these men personally, and had been given the details of their deportation from the Christchurch district to the Wairarapa. He would now prove to the hilt from the honourable gentleman's own words the statements he had been making to the House. He would quote from the Lyttelton Times of the 19th October, 1893, on which date the honourable gentleman was interviewed by a number of the unemployed in Christchurch just a little before the last election. This was what the honourable gentleman stated:—

"No Government had ever schemed and laboured so to help the unemployed."—In Christchurch, he might remark.—"Since March last no less than 258 men had been sent out of Christchurch by the Labour Bureau at good wages. No other town had had nearly so much done for it in this way as Christchurch. He had done this because the suffering was greatest there. For the rest, the Government had spared no pains to give work to Christchurch men in all parts of the colony, wherever it could be found. Complaints, indeed, were made against him in other districts that he showed undue favour to Christchurch men by giving them work in other provinces over the heads of local men. During the last week he had been telegraphing to all parts of the colony inquiring for work. He should be able at once to send twenty men to Southland, and a party to the North Island."—The Wairarapa, no doubt.—"Later on a party would go to the Mount Cook Road, and, he hoped, more men to the North Island. He must ask them to take his word that, as he had done his best in the past, he would go on doing so in the future."

Then, here was a telegram published in the same newspaper from Dunedin, dated the 17th October: "There is much complaint about the Christchurch unemployed being sent to Catlin's when there are so many unemployed here." The honourable gentleman would perhaps tell him that there were no unemployed in the Wairarapa that had been sent there from his district. He (Mr. Buchanan) told him he had met them there. The honourable gentleman had deported them to the Wairarapa to get them out of his way, and they were shortly afterwards discharged. These unfortunate men were now roaming about the roads in search of employment, which they were not able to get; and the honourable gentleman, from his place on the Government benches, from which members had a right to expect courtesy, dignity, and fair-play, went out of his way to rail at settlers in his and other districts because, he said, they grudged a crust to those hungry men who came to them for work.

Mr. Buchanan

Mr. REEVES said the honourable gentleman was referring to his speech on a previous day.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the honourable gentleman had been guilty of what he had stated over and over again. He had never lost an opportunity of maligning what he called the land-monopolists, whom he accused of creating the "unemployed" difficulty. These men were settlers who were deserving of every consideration, and this was the kind of language that was continually being applied to them by the honourable gentleman. The young man who managed the property on which food was pilaged a few days ago in his district was the grandson of one of the oldest settlers in the colony; and yet the honourable gentleman, from his place on the Government benches,—

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman now seemed to be clearly referring to a speech of that session.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not wish for a moment to transgress the rules of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER said, when the honourable member referred to a speech as having come from the Government benches, he understood the reference to be to a speech of this session. If, however, the honourable member stated distinctly that this was not the case he was bound to accept the honourable gentleman's statement.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not wish to refer to any particular speech. It was well within the knowledge of every member of the House who had been in the House for any length of time that the honourable gentleman was continually raising class ories. There was no member in the House, nor had there been in past Parliaments, who had done so much to set class against class as the honourable gentleman. By some strange irony of fate the honourable gentleman was Minister of Labour. Members had a right to expect from a gentleman in that position some courtesy and some dignity in dealing with the important questions that were placed under his charge. But what did they too frequently find? He was certain every honourable member in the House would agree with him when he stated that the honourable gentleman's conduct was frequently of the most unbecoming and undignified character. He assailed certain classes in the community on every opportunity. He maligned them in the most unscrupulous way, and very frequently did so when there was no opportunity of reply. In the New Zealand Times of the 6th June of last year he found a leading article, which he believed he was perfectly right in attributing to the penmanship of the honourable gentleman when the honourable gentleman was managing director of the New Zealand Times; and he did not think he would deny the authorship. It was as follows:—

"It is difficult to imagine a greater collapse than the collapse of the Sydney Labour Bureau. That Bureau has succeeded in doing nothing that a Labour Bureau ought to do, and has done everything that a Labour Bureau ought not to do. We need not wonder that the Labour Bureau is about the most unpopular thing in the New South Wales capital. Obnoxious to labour, a stumbling-block to the Government, a cause of weeping to the philanthropist, the Bureau has but one friendly section in Sydney which wants a rod for the Ministerial back. Labour does not want charity and low wages. Governments always want to see the end of the 'unemployed' troubles, as they do of every other disorder in the body politic; the benevolent want to be spared the sight of gaunt hungry crowds, clamouring for the bread which they ought to be digging out of the ground. How intensely all those must be disappointed in the Labour Bureau we can readily and easily imagine without any great effort. We can likewise picture them wondering why the system they borrowed from New Zealand should have failed so distinctly, while the success which first allured them to imitate still remains brilliant in this colony. The New Zealand Bureau was projected for the purpose of decentralisation of the most comprehensive and radical character. It was born in ridicule, and it lived its first months in the midst of cynical denouncement and sceptical staring. But the Bureau kept on its way regardless, and now can boast of a solved labour-problem, and the cordial support of every section of the community."

4.30. What a sarcasm that article was on the position in New Zealand now! The labour difficulty solved, forsooth! Three well-known settlers in the Wairarapa driven by the excessive number of men who were roaming about the country looking for employment and unable to get it—driven for the first time in their lives to refuse some of these men a crust of bread as they went from place to place. This was the success which had attended the honourable gentleman's administration of the Labour Bureau. Let honourable members go down the street and meet one of the unemployed, and ask him to go to the Labour Bureau: what would he tell you? "I have been there over and over again. I can get nothing there but evasion; and everything is unsatisfactory." In country districts they would find the same tale of the Labour Bureau. The Labour Bureau, which was to have solved the labour difficulty, and which was asserted in the article he had quoted to have done so, was simply held in contempt by the very men in whose behalf it was instituted. He did not wish at all to attack the Labour Bureau as an institution; he had never objected to the establishment of the Labour Bureau, and did not object to it now; but the honourable gentleman knew nothing of labour practically, and a curious fate had pitchforked him into a position for which he was never fitted; and could it be wondered, as far as the institution was concerned, that his administration was a very sorry exhibition, if the state of the unemployed throughout New Zealand was any criterion? The honourable gentleman was designed for a very different sphere from that of the head of the Labour Department, but fate had not been kind to him. It had been very unkind indeed. He would like to know in what sphere the honourable gentleman could find congenial surroundings. Certainly not in that House, and certainly nowhere outside of it. The honourable gentleman was continually at war with himself—with everything, with everybody—and the day was fast coming when the labouring-men of this colony would tell him what they really thought of him. One of the honourable gentleman's strongest supporters, now sitting beside him, had given his opinion of the honourable gentleman's administration.

Mr. REEVES said the honourable gentleman was referring to a past debate.

Mr. BUCHANAN said surely he was permitted to make allusion to what took place in the House the other day. He had very little more to say, except to again express his resentment at the honourable gentleman's manner of dealing with this question. He hoped the honourable gentleman would turn over a new leaf—if that was possible—and deal with the question as it should be dealt with. As far as the honourable gentleman's conduct towards himself was concerned, he cared very little about it; but he did hope that the honourable gentleman would consider the unemployed in other parts of the colony as well as in Christchurch, and not, as the honourable gentleman had himself admitted he had been doing, find employment for them at the expense of the colony, and at the expense of the unemployed in other districts. If time permitted he could give a very instructive tale indeed with respect to one group of unemployed who were brought from Christchurch and sent up to the Forty-mile Bush to do some bush-felling. These men were sent up there at a very heavy expense, they did very little to show for it, and some of them were "carted" back to Christchurch at the expense of the colony. The honourable member for Masterton knew many instances of what occurred in regard to the unemployed brought from Christchurch and sent up to his district.

Mr. THOMPSON.—Was that previous to the election?

Mr. BUCHANAN said Yes; and also since that time. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. O'REGAN rose to second the motion for adjournment. He exceedingly regretted the speech to which they had just listened, because he could not help thinking that the honourable member for Wairarapa had simply used the unemployed as a means of making a personal attack on the Minister of Labour. The honourable member evidently laboured under a keen sense of injustice, and had used his sympathy with the unemployed as a means of making an uncalled for attack upon the Minister. He sincerely regretted, with the honourable gentleman, that there was such distress in the Wairarapa district, but he would make bold in his place in that House to declare that for a few runholders not to give the assistance of a crust of bread to these poor men reflected no credit on them. It reflected no credit on men in a comfortable position to refuse that small help to others who were less fortunately situated. The honourable gentleman quoted one sentence from an article with which he thoroughly agreed. The article said labour required no charity, provided it got justice. But he could not help thinking, and he thought many honourable members would agree with him, that while they had those large estates monopolized by a few there was no justice for labour. He would like honourable members to bear in mind that more than one-fourth, or nearly a third, of this beautiful colony was the private property of some sixteen hundred men. Eighteen million acres of the best land in New Zealand was mopped up by these few landholders.

Sir R. STOUT.—You include companies.

Mr. O'REGAN said Yes, he included companies, and nearly twelve hundred of those gentlemen were absentees. In the face of these facts, he wondered why there could be any surprise that there were unemployed in the colony. For his own part, he looked upon the Labour Bureau, and always had done so, as a farce. He did not wish to reflect on the Minister or any one connected with it, because he believed, as far as the administration was concerned, they had done as much as they possibly could; but his opinion was that the Labour Bureau was an institution which never could do any really permanent good for the working-men. He would say the same with regard to many of the labour Bills brought forward by the Minister of Labour in connection with the "unemployed" difficulty. There was another matter which had been alluded to that afternoon which he would refer to briefly—that was, as to the question asked by the honourable member for Palmerston in reference to a petition which came before the Petitions A to L Committee—the petition of H. von Blaramberg, a schoolmaster at Palmerston. He thought the reply given by the Minister was very unsatisfactory. It seemed to him that a great mistake had been made in referring this case back to the Education Board. The Education Board, they had reason to believe, had a bias against the petitioner, and he, for one, did not expect fair-play for the petitioner at the hands of the Board. He was not prepared to say that all the allegations made by the petitioner were justifiable, but he did know this: that through his instrumentality a gross abuse was put down in a school at Palmerston. One of the female teachers had pasted a lot of improper and, in fact, he might say, immoral pictures upon the walls of the schoolroom. The petitioner, in his capacity as her superior in the school, caused her to take the pictures down, as their inevitable effect would be to pollute the minds of children; and this led to a dispute between them, in which Mr. Von Blaramberg was worsted, as the services of the teacher were still retained. He thought this was a matter which demanded serious consideration, and he was not afraid to stand there and denounce this matter as a scandal, and say that it required the strictest investigation. For that reason he regretted the light manner in which the petitioner had been treated. He hoped this was not the last they were going to hear of this matter. At any rate, the answer of the Board should not be taken as final.

Mr. REEVES said, first of all, with regard to the case of H. von Blaramberg, it was a mistake to say that the petition had been treated in any light way, for who ever heard of a Minister ordering a public inquiry into a matter without first of all asking the persons accused of doing wrong things what they had to say? What an extraordinary Minister he would be if he was prepared to go into a matter in which allegations were made against the Education Board without first asking the Board what they had to say for themselves! Even the hideous monster just now so graphically portrayed by the honourable member for Wairarapa would not do that. He had simply said that as soon as he heard from the Wanganui Education Board he would inquire into the matter, and see that justice was done. He hoped his honourable friend the member for Wairarapa felt better now. He was sure that honourable gentleman ought to feel better for that discharge of bile. He should say a blue-pill and a black-draught would have nothing like the relieving effect of the quarter of an hour's outburst the honourable gentleman had had at his (Mr. Reeves's) expense. He hoped, as he said, his honourable friend was better now, and that for the next week or two he would be able to smile across at him as he was wont to do, instead of glaring at him with an air of ferocity which, if he had been a nervous man, would have made him fear he was going to share the fate of the French President. But with regard to his honourable friend's remarks that afternoon, the honourable gentleman said he did not care what he (Mr. Reeves) said;—that he really cared very little what he might say to him. Did he not look like it? Could any one who knew what was the cause of the honourable gentleman's speech doubt that he was absolutely indifferent to anything he (Mr. Reeves) might say, and had said, of the honourable gentleman? What did the honourable gentleman care for whatever he might have said or might say? Of course he cared nothing. He remembered once hearing a small boy who had been sent to bed an hour or two before his time going upstairs and at every third step shouting out, "I don't care! I don't care! I do-on't ca-a-a-are!" and then he lay down at the top of the stairs and kicked and yelled. That reminded him very forcibly of the honourable member for Wairarapa. That honourable gentleman lay down and kicked at him—metaphorically of course—and yelled, calling out between, "I don't care." If this was the honourable gentleman's method of showing how totally indifferent he was, he could only say he did not think it would carry conviction to the breast of any one, except perhaps the honourable member for Clutha. Now for one or two of the allegations of the honourable gentleman. He complained, of course, that he (Mr. Reeves) did not adhere strictly to the facts; and yet the honourable gentleman who made that statement proceeded, in the course of his remarks, first of all to accuse him of making attacks on the Wairarapa landowners, and, in particular, of making reference to one young man who had not fed some swaggers, and then said, speaking on his honour, that he had made no reference to his doing so—that he was not referring to anything he (Mr. Reeves) had said.

Mr. O'Regan

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable member for Wairarapa did not say that his statements were made "on his honour." He (Mr. Speaker) had put that interpretation on it, because honourable members were always supposed to answer on their honour to questions he put to them.

Mr. BUCHANAN said Mr. Speaker would have ruled him out of order had he gone outside the rules of debate, and it was not for the Minister to practically question Mr. Speaker's ruling.

Mr. REEVES said he was not questioning Mr. Speaker's ruling—he (Mr. Speaker) could do nothing but what he had done. But he (Mr. Reeves) had a right to refer to the statement of the honourable gentleman—to say what the honourable gentleman had said about him;—that he had accused him of making a reference to certain settlers in the Wairarapa district. The honourable gentleman made a vigorous attack on him because he had made those remarks, and then said he was not referring to anything he (Mr. Reeves) had said this session. The honourable gentleman knew absolutely that he had never referred on any other occasion except the other day to the larger landowners in the Wairarapa. Yet he allowed Mr. Speaker to put him on his honour, and to accept his word that he was not referring to what he (Mr. Reeves) had said this session. What was the honourable member's honour?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think that is a reflection that should be made on a member of this House.

Mr. REEVES would withdraw it and merely put it as a question.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that would go into Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER said the Minister had withdrawn the expression.

Mr. REEVES said the honourable gentleman was absolutely indifferent to anything he could say. Then the honourable gentleman went on, not satisfied with that, to assure the House that he (Mr. Reeves) had written a certain article in the New Zealand Times. He had never written that article—he did not write a solitary word of it.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I did not say so.

Mr. REEVES asked the honourable gentleman not to interrupt him in the few minutes at his disposal. He asked honourable members whether they could put any other construction on the honourable gentleman's words except that he plainly stated that he (Mr. Reeves) had written the article, and asked everybody in the House to believe it. He read it as having emanated from his pen, he criticized it as coming from him, and referred to the similarity of certain sentences to the style in which the honourable gentleman said he usually indulged. Would it surprise the honourable gentleman to know that he did not write a single word of it?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Are you on your honour?

Mr. REEVES said he was, and he was quite sure that his word on a question like that would be accepted by almost everybody in the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he accepted the honourable gentleman's statement.

Mr. REEVES said, so much as to the leading article. And as to his previous attacks on the large landowners of the Wairarapa, he had never taken occasion to attack the large landowners of the Wairarapa. With the exception of his remarks the other day he had never made any reference to the large landowners of that important district. He must not refer to what he had said; but, with regard to anything he might have said, he did not withdraw one single jot or iota of it, and whatever he had said was thoroughly well deserved and absolutely true. What he did say now was that land-monopoly was the parent of the unemployed and the swagger system. The land-monopoly was the great cause of the "unemployed" difficulty, and until they struck a blow at that monopoly which would break it up and put an end to it they would never have an end to this continual "unemployed" cry winter after winter, and the bitter distress they saw in different parts of the colony.

An Hon. MEMBER.—In Christchurch?

Mr. REEVES said, Yes, in Christchurch, because if ever there was a place where the "unemployed" difficulty was the result of land-monopoly and the locking-up of huge areas of land it was the unfortunate Province of Canterbury, and there was not a single Canterbury man present in the House who would venture to deny that. The honourable gentleman complained of him because he "carted" his Canterbury constituents all over the colony, and dumped them down in various districts in order to secure his return at the elections. The answer to that was this: So far from popularising himself by his dealings with the unemployed in Christchurch for election purposes, it was his absolute and stiff refusal to do what the men, at a mass meeting, demanded at the last election—and the honourable member for Avon could bear him out in this—which brought upon him a storm of abuse and a series of hostile resolutions passed at their meetings.

Mr. TANNER.—That is absolutely true.

Mr. REEVES said it was because he would not do insane, unjust, and reckless things, and promise everything he was asked, that those men met by hundreds at mass meetings and again and again passed resolutions condemnatory of him, to the great delight of his political antagonists. Yet the honourable gentleman quoted his own words—played the old trick of incomplete quotation—picked out a sentence here and there of his speech to make honourable members believe that he had promised to do everything those mass meetings might ask, and that he was ready to do everything for them. He would inform the House that what they asked of him he absolutely refused to do on that occasion. The honourable member for Avon knew that what he was saying was true. The fact that he had to put Canterbury unemployed at work in different parts of the colony was due not to anything he might have done, but to the inexorable logic of circumstances. The Christchurch unemployed could not be put on works in their own district because there were no works to put them on. The whole of the public-works expenditure of the colony had for many years been carried on outside the Canterbury District; and yet the taxpayers of Canterbury and Christchurch, year after year, had to contribute an enormous sum in order that public works in Auckland, Wellington, and Otago might be carried on, not out of local revenue, but out of colonial. Yet when a few sections of these men were put on works in other parts of the colony, on works for which not the local taxpayers in those districts had to pay, but the taxpayers of the colony, then, because he gave those unfortunate men a share in the work allowed to their neighbours, he was a truckler and a demagogue. It was impossible to do anything else than see that the employment on the public works of the colony was as fairly divided as possible amongst the deserving poor in all parts of the colony, without reference to any particular locality; and, inasmuch as last year it was notorious that the "unemployed" distress was greater in Canterbury than in any other part of the colony, so for two or three months last winter a large number had to be sent from Canterbury to works in other places. But, so far from these 258 being sent to Southland and the North Island, as the honourable gentleman would lead the House to believe, the greater part were sent to Cheviot, and to Mount Cook, and others to the Bealey, on the West Coast Road, between Christchurch and Hokitika, while only a few were sent to Southland and the North Island. With regard to the statements the honourable gentleman made that he had "carted" unemployed into the Wairarapa and afterwards turned them into the road to starve, that he absolutely denied: the statement was without a shadow of foundation in fact. A very considerable number from Christchurch had been put on public works in the last few months, but not in the Wairarapa; they had been put on public works at Woodville, and these men were not turned out to starve after being kept on for a little time. They had a fair—more than fair—a liberal term of work given them, so as to enable them not only to defray the cost of going up there, but to transmit money to their wives and families, and even, if they were careful and prudent and skilful, to lay a little aside for a rainy day, or to enable them to go and look for work elsewhere without starving. No doubt there had been a considerable number of unemployed men going about asking for work in the Wairarapa. It was always a fact that in hard winters, in districts where the country groaned under the curse of land-monopoly, these men were found going around from station to station asking for work; but he said this was the result of land-monopoly, and not of anything he as Minister of Labour had done. He had never claimed that the Labour Bureau would be the sole solution of the labour problem, as the honourable member for Wairarapa quite unjustly said of him. He had positively stated again and again that it could not be so—that it was only a palliative, and that all the Labour Bureau could do was to see that such work as there was should be distributed amongst the most deserving, and that while there was work in one part of the colony waiting for hands he would see that there was not labour in another part of the colony waiting for work. So far from proclaiming that the Bureau under his management would put an end to the "unemployed" problem, there was nothing of the kind in his public speeches for the last three years and a half. He had been particularly careful to say nothing of the sort, and it was not many months since he had the whole of his speeches examined and had all the extracts referring to the matter cut out, and these he had in his possession, and they effectively disproved the ridiculous statement that he had claimed that under the Bureau he would be able to give work to everybody that wanted it. He had always said he could not do anything of the sort. The honourable gentleman, of course, quoted from a speech of his with regard to the unemployed of Christchurch; but he should have stated that it was delivered last year—that the facts then referred to were the facts of last year, whereas the conditions existing in the Wairarapa were conditions arising from facts which occurred within the present year.

Mr. Reeves

Mr. BUCHANAN pointed out, as a matter of personal explanation, that what he had said with regard to the quotation he made from the New Zealand Times was that he felt justified in believing that it was written by the Minister of Labour, and that he did not think the honourable gentleman would deny having written the article. He believed those were the words he used. He had not positively stated that the honourable gentleman had written the article, because he had no personal knowledge to that effect.

Mr. MILLS said that the answer of the Premier to the question of the honourable member for Inangahua, with reference to sleepers at Cape Foulwind, was in one sense fair, but, to his mind, it did not go far enough. He had no doubt those men were in such a position that it was a work of necessity for them. They wanted something more than sympathy—they wanted work. He also wished to call attention to the position of his district with regard to the supply of sleepers. He represented a part of the colony that had to depend on supplying sleepers as the only contract work they were able to do. There was a great number

50. of these isolated places, and they were not people who could move about and go in search of work as the ordinary workman could do. Therefore it was a necessity that such settlers as these should be encouraged, and should have a fair share of what work of this kind the Government had to offer. He called for a return in the ordinary way on this subject, and it had now been supplied by the Railway Department, and it showed conclusively, to his mind, that, so far as Marlborough was concerned, the people there had not been fairly treated at all. They only got the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table: that was about all. During last year no less than 272,628 sleepers were bought and ordered by the department, and out of that large number Marlborough was only allowed to contribute 9,231, or equal to about one-thirtieth of the whole: that was all.

An Hon. MEMBER.—There is no timber there.

Mr. MILLS thought he would be able to prove that they had far better timber there than what any other part of the colony was now supplying. They were able to supply from the Sounds a class of timber that was unequalled in any other part of the colony.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Question.

Mr. MILLS said there was no question about it. There was no birch equal to that which grew in the forests there, take it in any way they liked, whether for strength, solidity, durability, or for non-burning quality. They could take it in fifty different ways, and they would find that the birch from the Sounds and other parts of his district was superior to any class of timber that was now being supplied to the Railway Department.

Mr. GUINNESS said it rotted and decayed rather too quickly.

Mr. MILLS denied this statement. He believed the honourable gentleman's district was getting a far greater share of this expenditure than it was entitled to, and the most of the sleepers purchased last year came from the part where the honourable member resided;—probably that was why they rotted and decayed so quickly. He was going to ask how it had been proved in this colony that the sleepers made from silver-pine were equal or superior to those made from black-birch. There had not been any experience to show that they were. He could point to black-birch which had been put into the ground thirty years ago, and was as good to-day as it was when first used. He did not mean to say there was no inferior birch; but if they took the average quality it was superior for the purposes of railway-sleepers to any other timber to be found in the colony, and he challenged contradiction from any one who had experience in timber. Yet there were less than ten thousand sleepers supplied from his district. What was the price? The price was fixed at 2s. 6d. each, and freight-charge from any part of the Sounds to any other place in the colony averaged about 7d.—probably 6d. in large quantities; but, at any rate, the department paid 7d. For the timber obtained from the West Coast they paid 8d. in freight. Now let them contrast the two. Birch sleepers were supplied at 2s. 6d., which, with 7d. freight, meant 3s. 1d. But the number of sleepers purchased at Grey-mouth and Reefton was no less than 50,201, and the prices paid ranged from 3s. 4d. to 4s. 8d. each, while the freight was 8d. Now, if any one could show him that this timber was so much superior in quality as to warrant the colony in giving this difference in the price he was open to conversion on that point, and would admit a good case had been made out. If honourable members wished for proof of what he had stated he could take them to the Sounds and give it to them. He only wished the sleepers from his district to have a fair trial, and he was quite sure the result would be satisfactory. These sleepers, in some instances, were brought down-hill 20 chains, and still they could be purchased at 2s. 6d. each. He claimed some consideration for the people in his district, because the people who were benefited by the sale of these sleepers lived in such isolated places that they got little assistance from the Government; and, if by these means they were economizing a natural product, and at the same time supplying a really good timber, the Government ought to purchase them. It would have been of very material assistance to these people; and they should have benefited by it last year, but nothing had resulted. The people in the Sounds, whom he represented, did not get the value of the sleepers under the conditions framed by the department. In regard to the silver-pine, he had no wish to condemn it at all, but he thought they ought to take into consideration what effect the difference in climatic conditions had upon various timbers, also what length of time they were used, and the kind of work to which these timbers were put. They could not improve upon birch for putting in the ground. Here black-birch, for lasting qualities, stood next to totara—in fact, for some purposes was much better, for all totara was not what they thought it was: a great deal depended on its age, and on the place in which it grew. That had just the same effect as they knew climate had upon cereals or other products. Therefore, knowing as they did that this timber was a thoroughly good, substantial class of timber, and that these settlers had had very little help during the public-works policy, surely the department could assist them by taking sleepers from them when they were required, for they certainly deserved that measure of consideration. He hoped that the Government would see their way to resume this employment. What would be the number in excess of present requirements? There was no great quantity on hand, and he ventured to say, if the timber were stacked up and allowed to season, the money would be well spent. And, after all, the amount was very trifling as compared with the expenditure that went on in other parts of the colony. They voted £10,000 to start a State farm up here, while the people for whom he was speaking were self-reliant, and the Government might well extend to them the kind of assistance he indicated. The large sum of money he mentioned had been expended for special purposes, and he was only asking that a moderate sum of money should be applied in such a way as to assist those who were unemployed to improve their position. There were many whose only means of raising money was by the use of this timber. They were men who were content, some of them, to work as miners part of their time, and others were willing to struggle along in other ways so long as they could make a bare living. They were satisfied even if they were not able to save anything, but just earned sufficient to make ends meet as best they could. Therefore he asked the consideration of the House to the case of these people, and he hoped the Premier would take their claims into consideration, and give them a chance to work again at this industry as soon as possible, and continue it for some years to come. The question of ordering a few thousand sleepers more or less, after all, meant very little in the way of expenditure, so that there need be no trouble about it so far as finance was concerned. The colony was quite equal to it, and the claim of these people was a genuine one. There was no other place from which they could remove the timber for the sleepers with the same facilities as they could from either of these two Sounds, and yet, as he had shown, the price paid was much lower than that paid for the sleepers obtained from the West Coast. It did not matter where they wished to send them, they could ship them at a less cost there than from any other part of the colony. Therefore he hoped this work would be resumed.

Mr. G. J. SMITH wished to emphasize and indorse what the Minister of Labour had said with reference to the position of the unemployed in Christchurch during the past winter. He could assure members of the House that it was pitiable to know that in this colony, which ought with ease to sustain three or four times its present population, scores of men and women in that city, he was sorry to say, had been on the verge of starvation. He hoped, in view of the facts related to them, honourable members would endeavour to give their best consideration to some scheme to meet this difficulty in the future, and also that the Ministry would give this matter their earnest consideration during the recess. He felt that something more definite was needed to be done to cope with the distress which from year to year seemed to be inevitable in the large centres. What he wished more particularly to refer to was his own question with reference to the Bank of New Zealand. He had to thank the Colonial Treasurer for his courteous answer. He (Mr. G. J. Smith) was only sorry it was not satisfactory. He agreed with him it would be very unwise that the private affairs of the Bank of New Zealand, or of individuals connected with that bank, should be brought up and discussed on the floor of the House. His question went in the direction of looking after the solvency of that institution. He felt certain that the connection of New Zealand with Australia, so far as the Bank of New Zealand was concerned, had been a disastrous one. He felt certain that the Australian business was one that the bank would be very much better without, and that was the reason why he had put the question on the Order Paper. He could not agree with the Colonial Treasurer that, after appointing the President of the bank, there the responsibility of the House ceased. The House, on the recommendation of the Ministry, had guaranteed the capital of the Bank of New Zealand to the extent of two millions sterling. Having given this guarantee, it was now for the House to say upon what business lines the bank should be carried on. All he desired, in putting this question, was that a return should be laid before the House next session which would show in globo the actual business relation between the Bank of New Zealand and the Australian Colonies, so that the House could then judge whether it was wise for the Bank of New Zealand to continue carrying on its banking business in any of the Australian Colonies. In his opinion, had such a return for the last few years been laid on the table the House could have come to only one conclusion. However, as the Treasurer seemed to think that it would be inadvisable to interfere with the management of the Bank of New Zealand, he only hoped the President would exercise great care and discretion in the management of that bank, and, in the event of the Australian business being such as he (Mr. Smith) thought it was, endeavour to put a stop to any business being transacted in connection with those colonies. Then, about the tariff revision, the Treasurer could not have understood the drift of the question. He did not ask for, nor did the Tariff Revision Committee report in favour of the House undertaking, a revision of the tariff this session. To the best of his recollection, there were two reports. The one went in favour of colonial reciprocity, and the other was for the appointment of a Commission during the recess to go into the question of tariff revision. He was very anxious that before the House separated they should have a definite expression of opinion as to what should be done in this matter. What he did contend for was that some steps should be taken so that the question of tariff revision could be dealt with in the early stages of next session, and he was sorry the Government had not had time to consider the two reports he had mentioned, so that they could inform the House of the decision they had come to. He took it that unless the members representing the manufacturing districts of the colony got some very decided assurance from the members of the Ministry on this very important question before the House prorogued they would be neglecting the interests of their constituencies. He thought, in view of the legislation they had before the House for the benefit of the country settlers,—with which to a large extent he agreed,—they were justified in asking the members of the Ministry to do justice to the cities, the workers in the cities, and the manufacturers of the colony. It was absolutely necessary that some relief should be given in the direction of a revision of the tariff, so as to foster and encourage our industries. It was all very well to encourage farming, and he thought it was absolutely necessary to do so; but, where a farmer kept four or five men employed, a manufacturer employed ten or twenty, and if they could get their manufactories on a good footing it would give an impetus to trade, and would tend very largely to solve the labour question. He hoped that before the House pro-rogued the Colonial Treasurer would be able to say what steps the Ministry intended to take with reference to the tariff. He regretted the Premier was not in the House at the present time, as he wished to make one or two remarks on the first question on the Order Paper. He regretted exceedingly that, in his answer to the question, the Premier should have thought the question had any personal bearing. There were charges made against the Police Department—very serious charges indeed—not only by a gentleman who wrote under a nom de plume, but in leading articles in the newspapers of the colony. The letter was sent to him, and his attention drawn to it, and he considered he was quite within his rights in asking the Minister of Defence whether those charges were true. All the Minister had to say was that he had inquired into them and found that they were incorrect. He (Mr. G. J. Smith) was prevented reading the letter at the time. He did not wish to read it now, further than to say the two charges referred to the Premier were at the beginning and end of the letter. The other charges were as follow:—

Mr. Mills

“(1) Two bars are allowed under one roof in several hotels in Christchurch and Lyttelton, which is illegal unless under special conditions; (2) several hotels in Christchurch are connected with tobacconists' shops by means of through communication.”

These were the two charges to which his attention was directed, and he wanted to know whether such a state of things existed. He did not know whether the Minister of Defence had received a report from the Christchurch officer, or simply from the head of the department in Wellington; but these charges were continually reiterated in the newspapers of the colony. They had been in the Christchurch papers again and again: and not only were charges made with regard to the liquor-traffic, but there was a charge made that the political element permeated the management of the department so strongly as to cause the removal of some of the men. The charge was reiterated from one end of the colony to the other, and in case the Premier did not know it he should like to say that he had again and again had information supplied to him of very strong dissatisfaction existing among members of the Force. His only desire in putting the question was that the Minister in charge of the department should inquire into the matter and find out whether the charges were true, and also that he should know that there was dissatisfaction in the Force; that the men complained of the method of promotion, and of the political influence especially. He hoped, if he had to put any further question on this matter on the Order Paper, the Premier would consider that it was dealing with the department, and that in future he would treat him with a little more courtesy.

Mr. WARD said he would like to say a few words on some points referred to by honourable members. The answer he had given that afternoon, he regretted, had not given the honourable member for Christchurch City satisfaction; but, after the views the honourable gentleman had expressed on this matter, he (Mr. Ward) wished now to refer more specifically and fully to the question of the Bank of New Zealand carrying on business in Australia. He pointed out that afternoon that the Government would not interfere in the way of directing the President either in the matter of suggesting that the bank should withdraw from Australia and cease operations there, or that he should have returns laid on the table of the House showing what business the bank was carrying on in any part of Australia. The reasons for this refusal would be obvious to any honourable gentleman who was at all acquainted with business affairs. In the first place, he would point out that it was not recently that this bank had started operations in Australia. It had carried on business in Australia for many years past—he could not say how many—and he should say that, under these circumstances, every honourable member must know it would be impossible, even if the Government were foolish enough to direct it, that all its business operations in Australia should cease. It was impossible that these operations should cease without the bank doing itself a very considerable amount of injury, and possibly incurring heavy loss. That ought to be clear to every honourable member. But with a large and important institution like this there was a great deal to be said for not doing business entirely in this colony. He admitted that had the guarantee been given originally, before the bank had commenced business in places outside the colony, then it would have been a proper thing to direct that its business should not proceed beyond certain places; but it would be an impossibility for it to cease doing business now in Australia without doing itself a great deal of harm. For instance, it was well known that the Australian Colonies had passed through a terrible financial crisis, the results of which would be felt probably for many years to come. Many years would elapse before those colonies could overcome the difficulties into which they had fallen. It might be likely that business was carried on which had been taken up years ago, and which required fostering until the bad times had passed. That being so, it would be most unwise to ask that directions should be given by the Government that the bank should now cease operations in Australia. If it were prudent to cease business there, it should be done when things were prosperous, so that the bank could get out without loss or sacrifice.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said he did not say that. He asked for a return to be kept, so as to judge of the business being done in Australia.

Mr. WARD said there was a question on the Order Paper asking whether directions would be given to have a separate account kept showing profit and loss in Australia, and so on. He thought the honourable member would see that if this system were to be adopted because the colony, owing to a crisis impending here, felt it was essential to give a guarantee—if this system were adopted, of having returns laid on the table, as a matter of fact there was no telling what harm would be done to the institution. The Government had appointed a President, and they had also to appoint an Auditor, both of whom were to represent the colony; and they should trust these two gentlemen to see that the affairs of the bank were so conducted as to insure the best possible results being attained; and, having taken the necessary safeguards, they should not, as requested—no doubt with the best intentions—by the honourable gentleman, have the affairs of the institution dragged out on the floor of the House by returns as to the class of business done, to be published to the world, for rival institutions whose affairs were not subjected to publicity to make use of and take advantage of; and if they complied with the honourable gentleman's request it would not only be an injury to the bank, but to the colony, and that was what they ought to avoid.

Mr. BELL.—Tell us at once what you are going to do.

Mr. WARD said it would be very difficult to satisfy the honourable gentleman. He was now dealing with the particular view put forth by the honourable member for Christchurch City—rightly so, he admitted; but he was trying to define what the view of the Government was so far as this institution was concerned. He believed, and the Government believed, that, with the President they had appointed, this institution should be allowed to conduct its business in the ordinary way. They ought not to hamper it; they ought not to keep up a continuous reference to it by continually discussing its affairs on the floor of that House. That ought to be avoided. So far as the Government were concerned, they intended to place upon the officers appointed by them the fullest trust, and the responsibility that rested on their shoulders should be sufficient to cause them to be careful in the administration of the bank's affairs. Owing to an impending crisis, the Government found it necessary to come to the bank's rescue; but, for all that, it ought not to be the policy of the House to keep up a continuous agitation concerning the affairs and the business of the institution. No monetary institution could prosper under such conditions. Such a course would not only have the effect of injuring this institution, but of injuring any institution carrying on business in the colony. He would be at all times prepared to give the fullest information that it was proper to impart to honourable gentlemen; but it was a serious mistake on the part of the House to ask the Government to furnish information which, in the ordinary course, could do no good, and was calculated to do a great deal of harm. Now, referring to the tariff, he heard one or two observations from the honourable member for Christchurch City with regret. He raised the question of town versus country, and said that farmers employed very few men compared with manufacturers, and that farmers were receiving more consideration than traders were. He thought the honourable gentleman would agree that, while the manufacturers were undoubtedly doing a great deal of good in the cities, and their interests should be forwarded in every possible way, without the producers of the country these manufacturers would not be able to do very much good; and when he referred to the fact that the latter were employing ten or twenty men, as against four or five in the country, the honourable gentleman entirely lost sight of the fact that hundreds of men were employed in handling the products after they came from the soil, and when they had passed out of the farmers' hands altogether. There were a much greater number of farmers, too, employing labour compared with the manufacturers. There were a great number of farmers who employed men, aggregating a very large number. If the honourable gentleman wanted to obtain what he desired for the cities he must obtain the support of the country members, and, if he was going to oppose the country members, when he wanted to obtain some very important concession for the cities the country members would oppose him. As in most other things there must be a give-and-take policy. The honourable gentleman must be prepared to assist country representatives, and no doubt they would be prepared to do what was just and right to the cities. He knew that the tariff was a pressing matter in the honourable gentleman's district, and in other districts; but, from what the honourable gentleman saw on the Tariff Committee, he would agree with him that the evidence pointed to the fact that when this question came up to be dealt with it would take a couple of months to get the tariff satisfactorily amended; and, knowing what he did, he did not think the honourable gentleman could accuse the Government of a want of proper attention to this matter. For his own part, he (Mr. Ward) would be prepared to see an independent session held to consider this question; but in the last days of the session to expect the tariff could come up for settlement was about as possible as it would be to convert New Zealand into a desert, which would be next to an impossibility.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

Mr. REEVES, in moving, That the report of the Conference on this Bill be agreed to, said the agreement arrived at was, in effect, as follows: The principal point of disagreement was with the action of the Council, in clause 2, in striking out from the Bill, and the operation of the Bill, all shops in which no assistants worked for hire. That exception had now been very much cut down. The exception was now limited to shops the business of which was bonâ fide owned by a shopkeeper of New Zealand or European birth or descent, who worked it either by himself or with his wife, or with the aid of his wife and children under eighteen years of age. This, of course, greatly limited the operation of the clause, and in particular cut out from the exemption the whole of the Chinese shops. Very reluctantly indeed he had thought it better to accept the amendment as so reduced. He did not pretend to say that the Bill, in the form in which he was now going to ask the House to agree to it, was altogether satisfactory: in fact, he thought it was not; but he thought it was quite as good a Bill as they had any chance of passing at the present time. Indeed, he rather doubted whether they would have much chance of passing a better Bill during this Parliament. He hardly thought it fair to ask the House to go on from year to year sending up their original Bill only to have it rejected again and again, and possibly not passed into law unless the next general election indorsed it once more. So, reluctantly, he was going to ask the House to accept the Bill. Otherwise, the Conference was quite satisfactory. The exemption of hairdressers from the operation of the Act had been abandoned by the Council. They were now in the same category as butchers and fruiterers. The verbal amendments in clause 9 were agreed to without opposition. The clause with regard to banks and commercial offices had been altered so as to make it workable. Under the clause as it now stood these offices would be allowed exemption from the Act during two half-yearly periods of four weeks each, so as to give them an opportunity of carrying out their half-yearly balances. During the other months the clerks would leave at five o'clock on ordinary days, and at one o'clock p.m. on the half-holiday of the week; except on six days of the month, when they might either continue at work or return to work for a period of three hours. That was the Bill as it now stood, and, for the reasons he had given, he would ask the House to accept the compromise arrived at by the Conference.

Motion agreed to.

FACTORIES BILL.

Mr. REEVES moved, That the House agree with the report of the Conference on the Factories Bill. As the House knew, there were about six different points on which they disagreed with the action of the Council. On all of these, with one exception, the Council had accepted what the House had asked. On the one point, and that an important one, the Council had disagreed, and stood firm, and the Managers for the House had given way. In clause 20 factory returns to be made by factory-owners had been made to extend to the earnings of piece-workers as well as the wages of time-workers. In clause 54, a certain subsection, which had been put in for reasons of health in regard to women workers, had been reinstated by the Council. In clause 54 also, while forty-eight hours had been retained as the maximum time which women and young persons could work during a week, they were allowed to begin work at a quarter to eight, instead of eight o'clock as was formerly proposed; but they could not work more than the same amount of time in a week. He believed that was put in in order to meet what was customary in certain factories. Then, in the clause which prohibited children of under fourteen years working in factories at all, honourable gentlemen would remember the Council had put in a proviso allowing children to work by special permit from the Inspector. The House had asked that this permit should be allowed only in the case of very small factories, and the Council had agreed. The Council had agreed that it should apply only in the case of factories where not more than three persons were working, and then only by special permission of the Inspector. Then, clause 63, relating to combined shops and factories, had been altered as the House desired. The House would remember that the Council wished that, where a factory-owner worked a shop, he should be allowed to close the factory on the legal shop-hours holiday. The House wished exactly the reverse—that the factory-owner should be allowed to close his shop on the factory holiday. That had been done, with the alternative that he might close up on Saturday afternoon,—which, of course, was just what the House wanted. Then, there was a certain verbal amendment relative to fruit- and fish-shops agreed to. With regard to clause 64, which the Council struck out, the Managers for the House had given way, and agreed that it should remain struck out. That was the clause by which it was attempted to extend the factory half-holiday from women and young persons to adult males. He had not expected the Council would give way on that, and they had stood firm; but, as the Managers for the House had got their way with the other amendments, and as probably the better place for regulating the hours of adult male labour was the Eight Hours Bill, they had given way, and he asked the House to agree to the report on the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

AUDIT OFFICE AND PUBLIC TRUST OFFICE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, with the permission of the House, I will propose a motion in lieu of that which was circulated, and which is on the Supplementary Order Paper. I propose to move, That this House, having considered the question referred to it by the Controller and Auditor-General in his memorandum to the Speaker of the 3rd instant, is of opinion that the audit of the accounts at the Public Trust Office Department need not have been interrupted by reason of the difference which arose between that department and the officer conducting the audit of the accounts; that the audit should now be proceeded with: and the House will refer the matter in dispute to a special Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the amendment of Sir Robert Stout is withdrawn, and the original motion withdrawn, then this can be moved as a motion, and the debate will commence de novo.

Sir R. STOUT.—I will agree to that if the honourable gentleman will say "need not be interrupted," instead of "need not have been interrupted."

Mr. WARD.—It has been interrupted, and therefore this is the correct language to use.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is the amendment withdrawn?

Sir R. STOUT.—If the honourable member accepts that slight verbal alteration. It is only a verbal change. If the honourable member accepts, it I will ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WARD.—I have read the motion, and I see no necessity to change it.

Mr. BELL.—I am quite willing to second the proposal which the Treasurer has just made to the House.

Motion, That the original words stand part of the question, negatived.

On the question, That the words proposed by Sir Robert Stout to be added be so added,

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said,—I move the amendment which has been read by the Colonial Treasurer.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think I should take this opportunity, in justice to the Controller-General, to say that I have received an unofficial communication from him. He wishes to remove from my mind any idea that the suspension of the audit of the Public Trustee's accounts was of a permanent character. It was only temporary. That is his explanation, and I think I have a right to mention that fact to the House. I also think, myself, that the amendment now proposed is a proper one, as we are called upon to say whether or not the suspension should have taken place, and, on the ground that has been stated in the Auditor-General's memorandum, I do not think it should have been; and, at the same time, myself and colleagues and, I believe, all concerned feel satisfied that the Auditor-General took the course he did believing it to be his duty to do so. I also desire to say that, as far as my knowledge of the Public Trustee is concerned, he is a most competent and efficient officer, and worthy of every confidence. He has done good work for the colony, and brought the institution into a very efficient state; and under the circumstances I can only express my regret that any difficulty should have occurred between them. As the suspension has taken place, we are right in asking why it has taken place; but, as a Select Committee is to be set up to inquire into the matter and into the circumstances, I think there it might end.

Mr. PIRANI.—Sir, before you put that amendment I wish to say a few words on the merits of the case generally. I would not take up the time of the House on this matter had it not been for the violent personal attack made upon the Public Trustee, who is not in a position to reply, and therefore the attack may also be termed a cowardly one.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honourable gentleman cannot apply that term to members of the House.

Mr. PIRANI.—I was not applying it to members of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That was the only interpretation, to my mind, that could be put on the honourable gentleman's language—namely, an attack made in this House which he has termed a cowardly attack.

Mr. PIRANI.—I withdraw the word, and will say the plucky attack made upon the Public Trustee by the honourable member for Wairarapa (Mr. Buchanan) and by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie). I think that something should be said in reply to those members before this matter goes to the vote. Now, if the honourable member for Wairarapa will study the memorandum sent to Mr. Speaker by the Controller-General, he will see that the only reason given for the suspension of the important functions of auditing the accounts of the Public Trust Office is that the gentleman whose duty it was to audit those accounts had said something which was alleged not to be true; and the Auditor-General says that gentleman is incapable of telling an untruth. Now, hitherto, in the records of history, George Washington stood alone as the gentleman who could not tell a lie; but we have an improvement upon that in the gentleman from the Audit Office, who is incapable actually of telling an untruth. If the gentleman is incapacitated in that respect, and his incapacity is so marked as to necessitate its incorporation in a State document, he has hardly the force of character to undertake such a duty as auditing the accounts of the Public Trust Office. Now, the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) stated that he disagreed with the suggestion that the officer auditing these accounts should be changed. But, Sir, I think that every honourable member who has read the report of the Public Trust Commission of 1891 would wonder how it is possible that an officer against whom such charges were proved as were made in this Public Trust Commission report should have been continued in the duty of auditing these accounts, when it could not but have been known that he was a man who had caused a considerable amount of friction. His being continued in that position would undoubtedly have a detrimental effect upon the office, and could not but unduly harass the officials in the performance of their duties, especially if they made any alteration in the system the Audit Inspector had hitherto approved. I think if the Auditor-General, in 1891, after that very condemnatory report had been prepared, had changed the officer, we should not have had occasion for this matter being brought up at the present time; and it is indeed a pity that that wise policy was not pursued. I do not intend to go into the charges made by the Auditor-General against the balance-sheets of the Public Trustee, but

Mr. Ward

I should like to point out to honourable members that, of all the errors which the Auditor-General states occur in the accounts of the Public Trustee, no less than 120 of them turn on a mere question of opinion as to whether certain vouchers should have been initialled by the Public Trustee or should have been left as they were at the time. That is a sample of the way in which the Auditor-General condemns the balance-sheets of the Public Trust Office. That sort of thing seems to me very vexatious. It is pursued under the idea that it will do good to the public service, but it is bound to be detrimental to the service, and will simply destroy altogether the departments it is intended to benefit. The honourable member for Wairarapa, in his remarks, said that the Auditor-General was the least to blame of the two in this matter. Now, anybody who has read the correspondence carefully, and who has the best knowledge as to the facts of the case, will see that the whole of the Auditor-General's statements are made on hearsay evidence, and that they depend upon the accuracy of the Audit Inspector, who represents the Auditor-General; and, as showing the accuracy of that gentleman, we have statements from those officers in the Public Trust Office who know anything about the subject that the Audit Inspector actually neglected one of the most important parts of his duties; and to cover up that neglect he tried to beg the question by a subterfuge. The Audit Inspector has been proved capable of reporting what was not exactly the fact, and therefore I say that the whole of the charges against the Public Trustee, being based upon that officer's report, are not worth the paper they are written on. The honourable member for Wairarapa also told us that "the man in the street"—he afterwards corrected it to business-men—that "the man in the street" had told him what was to be the report of the two accountants who were appointed to decide this dispute in reference to the Public Trust accounts. Who were the men who were appointed to inquire into that dispute? One was Mr. Kember, an accountant perhaps of the highest standing in the business in the colony, a man who is a political opponent of the present Government, and who cannot in any sense be supposed to be a man who would do what he was told, as against his own professional reputation, merely to please the Government or the Public Trustee. That is the man who is accused, inferentially, of having furnished a "cooked" report as to the accounts and books of the Public Trust Office. The other gentleman was Mr. Todd, who is an accountant in the Civil Service. He is a man of high standing in his profession, and one who has done good service to the colony a man who, I say, far more than the Audit Inspector, is hardly the man to tell an untruth, especially when his professional reputation is dependent upon it. Those are the two men who, we are to presume, if we rely upon the honourable member for the Wairarapa, would present a "cooked" report to this House. As to the inspection of the accounts of the Public

Trust Office, I think if the honourable member for the Wairarapa were as careful of his facts as those two gentlemen were it would be better for himself and for those who take the trouble to listen to him. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) said that the Public Trustee appeared to be of a contentious, not to say cantankerous, disposition, and that such a man would wreck any office, and that he was unfitted for this important position. I cannot allow these remarks to pass without comment. In regard to the Auditor-General, unfortunately just now he is ill, and it would not be fitting to say anything derogatory about him; but I should like to say that he is a man who has held a very high position in political life, and who was translated, if I may so term it, from this House to the position of Auditor-General. He has had the sunny side of life in front of him, and during the period of his service he has been able to do as he pleased. He has rich, powerful relations, and is a man who in no sense can be spoken of as one who has seen the worst side of life. Therefore he should need no special pleaders in his defence, but should be able to stand upon his merits. Then, take the man whom the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) has taken the trouble to condemn—the Public Trustee, Mr. Warburton. If any one should be free from attack of the sort used in this debate it surely ought to be this gentleman, who has risen entirely by his own exertions. He has had no silver spoon in his mouth, no powerful friends to help him, and in the last thirty-three years he has worked his way up from the lowest rung of the ladder in the Civil Service to the position of Public Trustee. I think that for the last three years that gentleman has been entitled to a pension of £500 a year, and could get that pension at any time on his retirement; so that he is doing the work of the Public Trustee—doing it well and doing it wisely, and in a manner in which it has never been done before in the history of this colony—practically for £300 a year, amidst the jibes and abuse of every one displeased with the office itself, and especially the members on the Opposition benches who have entered into this discussion. I say that if any man deserves the protection of this House it is the Public Trustee; and it is with feelings of contempt that I have listened to the imputations made about him, and the sneers as to his personal character and his personal attributes. It would have been far more fitting if personalities of that sort had been left out of the debate, and if those honourable gentlemen had dealt with this matter simply upon its merits, without any of these allusions. I do not think there is any need for me to say any more with regard to the Public Trustee; but, in conclusion, I will say that I trust this matter will be settled solely in regard to the character of the public service, and that the attempts that have been made in some quarters to destroy the Public Trust Office, for reasons other than for the benefit of the public service, will fail; and that the Government will see that it is their duty to stand by the man who has done such good service to them, who has rescued the Public Trust Office from the degradation it was in, as shown by past records, so that for the future, if the standard of the past three years is maintained, it will be one of the brightest spots in the administration of the public service of New Zealand.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I thought the speech of the honourable member for Palmerston was really a bit of special pleading, and was based on ground other than the public good. I also wondered what relation the Public Trustee was to the honourable member, and why he should have so magnified the virtues of Mr. Warburton—a gentleman against whom I would not say a single word. But he could have magnified Mr. Warburton without speaking in such an uncharitable and ungenerous manner against his immediate predecessor. Surely, if Mr. Warburton is possessed of all the virtues, the dark shade need not be cast on his predecessor to make those virtues stand out. One would have thought that that cruel past was now buried finally; it is not at all referred to in any of the evidence laid before the House, and it had no right whatever to be brought up on the present occasion. My honourable friend said he had not risen for the purpose of making a long speech, but he nevertheless spoke at some length; and, after saying that he did not think it right to say anything against the present Auditor-General because he was ill, he immediately began talking about “silver spoons in his mouth,” and sickening nonsense of that sort. As far as I know, every man in this country has an equal opportunity; and if Mr. Warburton has attained to any position in the public service he has done so deservedly, and he must have had powerful friends and talents to aid him.

8.0. Mr. PIRANI.—I did not say so.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—Yes, Sir, the honourable gentleman stated distinctly that Mr. FitzGerald had rich relatives, powerful friends, which had enabled him to be translated from this House to a high position; and yet immediately the honourable gentleman finds that we are turning these extreme expressions against him he has not the courage on the floor of this House to stand by those expressions of opinion. He immediately says he did not say anything of the sort. I do not know that Mr. Warburton is doing anything generous. He is not working for £300 a year, as the honourable gentleman wants to make out. He is receiving £800 a year, which is a very generous salary.

Mr. PIRANI.—No.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—That is his salary; but the honourable gentleman makes such statements on the floor of this House, and outside the House, that he really does not know what statements he does make. From time to time he has made statements about public men which he has afterwards been compelled to withdraw, and when it is absolutely shown that he has made misstatements he does not know how to withdraw them in a generous way. I think, Sir, the last question had no right to be opened up by the honourable member. We have no right to go into the details of that long report. We are all just as familiar with them as the honourable gentleman is. The statements the honourable gentleman has made are not correct, and he had no right to take advantage, in this House, to make statements which are not borne out by the evidence. However, as there is more important business to come on, I have no intention of taking up any further time on this question.

Mr. Pirani

Mr. MILLS.—Sir, I have no intention whatever of entering into the dispute between the Public Trustee and the Auditor-General, but I do deprecate the remarks of the honourable member for Palmerston North, who has cast such a reflection upon a man who is not here to defend himself. I think honourable members will agree with me when I say, without fear or favour, that this gentleman who is in the Audit Department, and whom I have known for the past twenty-five years most intimately, has always held an unblemished character, and he is known everywhere for his uprightness and integrity. I feel it my duty, therefore, to say that on the floor of the House, and I can safely challenge any contradiction. I do think that we should be most guarded in our expressions of opinion with regard to any member of the Civil Service, who cannot come here on the floor of the House and reply to any charges that are made against him. I think we ought to be most careful in that direction. Now, to my mind, the very fact that there is friction between these officers is the best evidence to us that things are going on all right. I think if we found things were working too smoothly the probability would be that they were not going on all right. I look upon an auditor in the light, practically, of a financial detective, and we may reasonably expect that things will not run very smoothly if some fault is to be found, and it may be that under these circumstances some friction will arise, as finding fault is a cause of annoyance even in the best-regulated families. We know perfectly well that these little things do occur, but it is only to me clear evidence that the officer is doing his work. I have no intention of saying any more until the report of the Committee comes before the House.

Mr. BELL.—I only wish to say one word, Sir. I quite accept the present motion of the Colonial Treasurer, but I wish to point this out to him: After the speech of the honourable member for Palmerston,—who was within his rights in so speaking, and in criticizing very strongly the action of the Audit officer whose veracity is now attacked,—how can he expect that justice will be done if the honourable gentleman is allowed to be a member of the Committee for the appointment of which notice has been given to-day? Does the Colonial Treasurer still intend to place the honourable gentleman on that Committee?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—As one of those who said a few words on the question when it first came before the House, I wish to add half a dozen words further. I entirely agree with what the Colonial Treasurer now proposes in the matter. I think it is a matter for regret, however, that such a proposal was not made in the first instance. Now, turning to the honourable member for Palmerston, who was good enough to express the opinion that it was a matter for shame to this House that such remarks should have been made with regard to the Public Trustee as were made on the former occasion: I do not know whether the words I used were in the honourable member's mind when making that statement, but, if so, I wish to say that I am not ashamed of any statement I made, because that statement amounted simply to this: that the Colonial Treasurer should not have permitted an officer in his branch of the service to use such language as has been placed on record in this House. I pointed out that the honourable gentleman's predecessor in office—Mr. Ballance—was compelled to step in and prevent similar unseemly language being used upon a previous occasion. I have nothing whatever to withdraw or retract. The Public Trustee is in a most important position, and far would it be from me to say anything of him, or of any other public officer, which is not fair or just, because we should all be most careful of what we say of men who are not here to defend themselves. With regard to the Auditor-General, without at all claiming that everything he has done is right and above criticism, I would say that his public services have been such as to entitle him to the greatest consideration from the Parliament of this colony. With regard to the Public Trustee, I have nothing to say against him beyond what I have already stated; but it must be obvious that so long as he holds his present office he should be under the control of the public officer of this Parliament—namely, the Auditor-General—otherwise the Audit Office should at once be abolished.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, I did hope, when I submitted the amended resolution to the House, that that would have ended the matter until it had been dealt with by the Committee to whom it is to be referred. I can only regret that it is not so. I am exceedingly sorry to hear the remarks of the honourable gentleman who has just sat down, who has defended the position he took up the other evening by reiterating the statements he made on that occasion, when he found fault with myself because I, as Colonial Treasurer, did not take exception to the correspondence between these two officers, on the ground that the former Colonial Treasurer took exception to certain correspondence. I want to point out this: that it is, to my mind, perfectly useless, for the purpose of comparison, to find fault with one man because he did not take the course that was taken by another man with regard to something else, unless one has before one the correspondence relating to the respective cases, so as to be able to judge on their merits. I do not know what the late Mr. Ballance took exception to, but, if he did so take exception, I have no doubt that he had very good grounds for doing so. I have not, myself, seen anything to warrant any interference between the two officers. There was a dispute between them on a very important matter, and I did not feel called upon to suggest to either one or the other of them that they should refrain from indulging in such correspondence as they indulged in, and I do not think there is any ground for the honourable gentleman to find fault with me in the way he has done. I would do just the same again, under similar circumstances. I do hope that this debate is at an end, and that the resolution will be carried; and I hope that after this proposed investigation the friction complained of will once and for all cease.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I wish to explain, Sir, that I did not put it to the House that, because the late Colonial Treasurer took exception to certain correspondence, the honourable gentleman should therefore have done likewise. What I did say was that the recent correspondence was such as to warrant his interference.

Sir R. Stout's amendment negatived.

Sir R. STOUT.—I do not think, Sir, it is proper to put in the words "need not have been interrupted," because, however the other part of the resolution may stand, this is, in fact, a reflection on the Auditor-General before the Committee has been set up or the House has received the evidence on the question. It is practically prejudging the matter. I regret the Treasurer did not accept the suggestion I made to him—namely, instead of the words "have been interrupted," to put in "not be interrupted," and, instead of the word "arose," to put in "has arisen." If he had done so he would not have been casting a reflection of any kind upon any one, and it would have left the field clear to the Committee to report. Now, this House is asked, practically, to censure the Auditor-General before an inquiry has been held, and before the evidence has been received. I think that is entirely unfair, and I for one protest against the resolution in the form in which it has been put. I would move, therefore, That the word "be" be substituted for the words "have been," and the words "has arisen" for the word "arose." I think that is the proper attitude for the House to take up on this important matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Perhaps the honourable gentleman will accept that suggestion without a formal motion.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think the Auditor and Controller-General may with force say, "Save me from my friends!" Yesterday I suggested that a modification of the motion could be arrived at, and the motion be framed in such language that the House should approve—because that is the proper course to adopt—that there should have been no suspension of the audit simply because of what had arisen. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) says the motion is prejudging the case. It does not prejudice the inquiry at all. So far as the matter in dispute is concerned, it does not deal with that at all. The matter in dispute is to be dealt with by the Select Committee. The Colonial Treasurer told the honourable gentleman that he could not accept the suggestion which he has made, and I should have thought, under the circumstances, the matter would have been allowed to drop. I think the majority of honourable members are with the motion, and I thought it would have been carried, and that there would have been no necessity for me to say what I am saying.

Sir R. STOUT.—Oh!

Mr. SEDDON.—As I have said, it is a case of "Save me from my friends!"

Sir R. STOUT.—I am not a friend. I am only doing my duty as a member of the House.

Mr. SEDDON.—Does the honourable member think that the members of this House cannot see the difference between the amendment and the motion? If he does not, he is not holding up the House to be a very intelligent body of men. I simply say that the motion, as put from the chair, is as nicely worded as we could make it under the circumstances. I regret, myself, that any debate should have taken place at all until after the report of the Select Committee came before the House. I cannot accept the amendment proposed. As for saying that this House should not express an opinion as to the suspension—though it was of a temporary character—I say, even a temporary suspension should not have taken place on the slight grounds which the Auditor-General has stated.

Sir R. STOUT.—I desire to make a personal explanation. It might have been inferred from what the Premier has said that I had been consulted about the amendment. I never saw the amendment until after it was moved by the Colonial Treasurer.

Mr. PIRANI.—I hope the House will recognise the cunning nature of the amendment which the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) calls a verbal amendment. It amounts to this: By it we should tacitly admit that the Auditor-General was right in suspending the audit for the past week, but that for the future he shall resume his audit. That is the full effect of it, and if honourable members will carefully study it they will see it is so. It has been designed for that special object.

Dr. NEWMAN.—In the way the amendment is drawn it seems to me that this House is really giving a verdict first and then asking for a trial. I have read the amendment very carefully indeed, and it says, "That this House, having considered the question referred to it"—I take it the House has not done that. Then, the very next phrase is that we refer it "to a select Committee." I quite agree with the Colonial Treasurer that this should go to a Committee. I think he is quite right; but I may point out that this House is asked, in a way, to condemn the Auditor-General without having anything more from the Auditor-General than a statement by the Premier that the Auditor-General wrote him a private note on the matter. I do not want to take any side, either one way or the other, as the honourable gentleman proposes to put me on this Committee; but I would ask the Premier to withdraw the first half of this motion; and I would point out to him that, after it has come back from the Committee, the Committee having heard both sides of the question, the House will be in a better position to deal with the matter, and I think the honourable gentleman would be just as far advanced as he is to-day.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. BELL.—I desire to say that the honourable gentleman consulted this side of the House, and the matter was referred to me by the member for Hawke's Bay, and that the wording of the present motion was approved by me. The Colonial Treasurer made no difficulty about accepting any suggestion I made. Of course we could not in the slightest degree bind the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout); but I hope he will not divide the House, for this reason: that I shall be compelled to vote with the Colonial Treasurer upon this motion, and shall appear to vote against the Auditor-General. I hope my honourable friend will not put us in that position, after we have accepted the words of the motion.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable member for Hawke's Bay was also consulted.

Mr. BELL.—Yes; the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, having been consulted by the Colonial Treasurer, referred the matter to me.

Sir R. STOUT.—It is a peculiar sort of compromise, when the mover of the amendment was never consulted.

Amendment negatived; and motion, as amended, agreed to.

DAIRY INDUSTRY BILL.

On the question, That the House go into Committee on this Bill,

Sir R. STOUT said he had nothing to say against this Bill. It was a Bill which could be dealt with by the experts in the House. There were one or two clauses in the Bill which seemed to him peculiarly drastic, and which took away from the local bodies all powers with reference to inspection of dairies. The general purpose of the Bill he believed every one in the House agreed with. The new subsections to clause 19 would, perhaps, require consideration.

8.30. Major STEWARD did not propose at this stage of the session to discuss the Bill at length, although he looked upon it as one of the most important Bills that had come before the House, because he was fully persuaded that in the direction of the dairy industry lay very much the salvation of the farmers of the Middle Island of New Zealand. They were suffering so much from the low prices of cereals that everything that could be done to encourage this industry should be done. He desired to congratulate the honourable gentleman who had introduced the Bill, which was a very large improvement upon that which was passed a year or two ago. He would not go into the various particulars in which he conceived the Bill to be an improvement, but he would like to point out to the honourable gentleman that in 1890 a very careful inquiry was held by the Colonial Industries Committee, of which Mr. Beetham was Chairman, the report of which, with evidence in detail, would be found in Volume 8 of the Appendices to the Journals of 1890, in which the whole question of the production of cheese and butter in New Zealand, and its conveyance to other countries, was exhaustively gone into.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said it was all altered since then.

Major STEWARD said it might have been altered in some particulars, but one thing had stood out very clearly—namely, that inspection at the port of shipment would not be sufficient to insure the correct appraisalment of the quality of the article, except as showing what was the quality and grade at such port of departure; that it would be no reliable guide on arrival at the port to which it was shipped; and that it was exceedingly desirable that power should be taken for the Governor to appoint officers who, if the shipper desired it, could inspect and grade at the port of arrival, and there indicate by brand the quality of the cheese or butter as it arrived at that end. Even were a small charge made he believed it would thoroughly pay the shippers to incur that charge, because of the security that would be given to the position of their articles in the Home-market. He therefore intended, when in Committee, to move, as an amendment, to insert in clause 19 the following words:—

“The Governor may also, if he shall think fit so to do, appoint persons to inspect at the ports of arrival butter produced in the colony and shipped from New Zealand ports, in like manner as is hereinbefore provided in regard to inspection prior to shipment; and the official stamp denoting grading at the port of arrival shall be ‘A,’ ‘B,’ or ‘C,’ prefixed by a cross (x) as denoting first-, second-, or third-grade respectively.”

With a permissive addition to the clause of that kind, he thought they would have a very good Bill. There might be two or three technical amendments required, but he had gone through the Bill very carefully, and it was, on the whole, he considered, an exceedingly good one, which the House would do well to pass.

Mr. BUDDO wished to refer to a few clauses that might require amending. During the last few years they had a considerable struggle in order to establish themselves in the London market, and now that they had obtained a standing they should be very careful to preserve it. The Bill provided for care to maintain that standing, and possibly to improve it. He was sorry to differ from the honourable member for Waitaki on the question of inspection in London, which system, he thought, would only duplicate work, and be very little good, for this reason: that the testing of the butter at the other end must be the system of selection. There was no other way in which buyers would take it but by test, and even if it were branded it was only so that the buyers might know what grade they were buying. In clause 19, subsection (1a), which provided for cool-storage at the port of shipment, he proposed to strike out the words “at the port of shipment.” He would explain for what reason he made that amendment. It seemed to him the growing trend of our factory system was to centralise and to adopt the system of creameries throughout the country, and therefore, when there was a central factory, it could not for several reasons be established at a shipping port. There was, first of all, the question of water, which was a very important item in the making of butter, and which was not usually found of first-class quality at seaports, and therefore the factories would be some little distance from the port as a rule. Then, at the end of clause 19 he would move to add, “Any cool-store now used for the storage of butter and cheese may, if within ten miles of the port of shipment, be still used as a cool-store as if it had been proclaimed by the Governor under the Act.” This would only include a small radius round about the ports. He was sure the time was coming when most of the small factories must cease butter-making, and provide cream for the central factories. He must congratulate the honourable gentleman upon the introduction of the Bill. It was one of the best measures that had ever been before the House, and would tend to create a better system of management by the exporter, and the consumer at the other end would have a great deal more confidence in the article he was buying.

Mr. BUCHANAN, while objecting to too much Government interference, was prepared to bow to the majority and give Government grading a trial. He therefore complimented the Minister on introducing the Bill. He, however, was certain that it was altogether a mistake to imagine that the drastic provisions in force in Victoria and other Australian Colonies had been the cause of the superior quality of butter exported thence as compared with that hitherto sent from New Zealand. It had not arisen from any such cause, but because their climatic conditions had compelled the employment of chilling machinery to keep their milk and butter in good condition; and, secondly, because the employment of chilling machinery was only possible by conducting dairying operations in factories. The one thing necessarily accompanied the other, and hence the better quality generally of the Victorian butter as compared with the New Zealand, where the cooler climate had unfortunately tempted settlers to ignore the value of chilling machinery. The Minister proposed to follow the lead of Victoria in the matter of compulsory grading, and he did not wish to offer any factious opposition. One benefit would certainly accrue, and that was that the farmers who made indifferent butter at home, and who steadily refused to believe that it was not of the very best quality, would be brought face to face with the verdict of the grader at their own door, and would not be able to say that carriage by rail or damage on shipboard had changed their previously good butter into bad butter. It would also be a valuable check on shipping companies, which were in the habit of blaming the original bad quality of dairy produce for the damaged condition in which they sometimes delivered it in London.

Mr. LAWRY said it was curious that when a Bill was brought before the House affecting the agricultural and pastoral interests of the country scarcely one honourable gentleman desired any discussion on it. As the Chairman of the Committee to which this Bill was referred, he would like to point out that the Committee went very carefully into the nature of the provisions provided in the Bill. They made several amendments, some of which, in his opinion, were not of a very important character. Some of them, however, were of an important character so far as the Bill applied to the convenience of the country settlers. For instance, in the original Bill clause 2 provided that no settler could send his butter or cheese to the local market unless it was first inspected and graded. If honourable members would look at the Bill as it now stood they would see that this grading and branding did not apply to butter and cheese sold within the precincts of the colony. They also made another important amendment in clause 8, and one of the number of things discussed before the Committee was the great and important one of having a port of export in the District of Taranaki. He thought that the Minister had rightly provided in the Bill that there should be only four ports for exporting the dairy produce of the colony, but he very wisely provided that he could establish any place or port for exporting dairy produce if it were shown to him that the necessities of the case justified such a procedure, and he thought that the Minister had acted very wisely in promising the Committee and the Taranaki settlers that, if they could show him they had sufficient butter produce there to induce ships to come and take it away, he would at once declare Taranaki a port of export for the dairy produce of the colony. He thought he had already alluded to the fact that measures of this nature did not obtain from the House that discussion which they deserved. They talked of all sorts of measures which were matters of theory; but when great questions like this—which, as the honourable member for Waitaki had said, was one of vital importance to the Middle Island, in consequence of the low prices of all cereals—came up for discussion, he thought it was a matter that should concern every honourable gentleman, and a matter worthy of the deepest interest and most careful thought of the House. What was going on now in the Districts of Taranaki and Auckland? Honourable gentlemen who said they could not talk on a measure of this nature did not realise what the effect of the successful establishment of the dairy industry throughout the colony would be. It enabled the country settlers to do that which was the aim and object of every country settler—namely, to establish this industry—and it enabled them to keep their families together. Under the old system, when a settler sold his butter to the storekeeper it was mixed there with various other kinds of butter, and he never got any cash at all. Under the provisions of this Bill, and similar other measures which had been introduced and carried through the House by the Minister of Lands, the settler sold his stuff and got cash within a month, and by this means he was enabled to keep his family together and make them comfortable. He hoped that when this Bill got into Committee it would be carefully dealt with. He was not, however, prepared to accept everything that was contained in the Bill. Like the honourable member for Kaiapoi, he was not sure the grading of butter and cheese would accomplish what was claimed for it by the Minister in charge. He was rather desirous to take the verdict of the gentleman connected with the firm which had spent no less than £160,000 in dairy produce last year in the Province of Taranaki. He saw him some time ago, and this gentleman told him that, so far as his firm were concerned, they would not pay any attention to the grading; they would pay more attention to the brand; but, mainly speaking, their operations, and the price they paid, were guided, not according to the grading, but according to the samples and quality. He did not anticipate there would be any opposition to this measure in Committee, but he would like to point out to the House and to the country that they might do too much in this question of grading, but the matter of branding and the matter of sampling would be matters of importance.

Mr. E. M. SMITH said the Minister asked the House to allow the Bill to go to Committee, and that what they had to say upon it should be said when it came back. Well, at this late period of the session he had no desire to make a long speech, but it was due to the district he represented, and also to the Government, that he should say something. He represented the dairy district of New Zealand—in fact, the Devonshire of New Zealand—and he thought before he had done he would prove to the House and the country it was the dairy district of New Zealand. Now, this industry was a most important one. When they took into consideration that in England alone £13,000,000 a year was spent on butter, every man must admit that fact. When they knew for a fact, from people who were in the habit of going to and fro between New Zealand and England in the butter industry, that there was an unlimited outlet for good butter, and when they knew that the industry was hampered and damaged and endangered by people who shipped butter indiscriminately, and when they knew that the indifferent classes of butter damaged the superior classes very seriously, they must admit the necessity for legislation on this matter. It became evident to the Government that some systematic way of dealing with this butter industry was desirable in the interests of the colony, and the Government, after careful consideration and exhaustive evidence, had framed this Bill to meet the case. Now, in framing the original Bill they stipulated that Auckland, Wellington, Lyttelton, and Dunedin should be the four ports from which the butter of New Zealand should be shipped. As soon as the Bill came from the Printer he procured copies and sent them round to the agricultural associations of his district and to some of the leading men connected with the industry in his district. He asked them, of course in a practical way, to go through the Bill, and see if they had any amendments to propose, and whether the Bill was in the interests of the industry. They agreed in the main with the Bill, but with clause 19 as it stood in the Bill originally they found out that the most important dairy district of the colony was left out in the cold—that they were to be compelled to ship all their produce down to Wellington in order that it should reach the markets of the Old Country. Now, in Victoria they all knew it was the object and aim of the Government to encourage this industry, and they went so far as to give bonuses. Now, if the people of Taranaki were compelled under this Bill to ship their butter to the Port of Wellington, what would be the result? Instead of receiving a bonus, they would really have a tax; it would have crippled the whole dairy industry of Taranaki, and would have injured his district in a hundred ways. Therefore a deputation of the leading men came down to Wellington. Unfortunately the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill was indisposed at the time, and that deputation could not have an interview with him, but they did get an interview with the Colonial Treasurer and the Premier, and after talking over the matter they went away satisfied with the assurance that provision would be made to provide for export from Taranaki direct if they could show that they would have sufficient produce to send away, and that freezing-works would be put in operation. But the statement was made that an arrangement had been made with the shipping companies. Now, it appeared that the department, in making inquiries, had got information which they said led them to believe these arrangements with the shipping company had not been made; therefore they took up the position that they would cause the people of Taranaki to have their produce shipped from Wellington. Then there was a big public meeting in Taranaki; a large number of people attended it, and they passed certain resolutions, and they despatched another deputation down to the Minister. Now, he had read the different speeches made at that public meeting, and when he went back to meet the electors of Taranaki he intended to dress down some of these gentlemen for the statements they had made at that meeting. He would be able to defend the Government which he supported, because they had endeavoured to meet them with everything that was fair, honest, upright, and just. He thought, himself, the Government would have been wise if they had selected those four centres where they had splendid harbours, and they would be justified in blocking out the small districts in which there were no freezing-works, and the proclaiming of which as ports for exporting dairy produce would entail the erection of cool-chambers or freezing-works, and the engagement of a grader; but now that the arrangement had been made with the shipping company, and the Minister had altered the clause of the Bill, it gave him power by order of the Governor in Council to admit or reject these different districts that met the requirements; and he knew from the very first that they had only got to bring the thing into practical form and give positive proof to the Minister of Lands to get justice. They had always found that. Well, as he had said, this alteration met their case, and they were perfectly satisfied. They had tried the experiment before. Ships could go there and load up at Waitara, and he believed that in only one case had a vessel to go away without taking a full cargo. An arrangement had been made with the shipping company to send vessels to the "Garden of New Zealand," and take this produce on board, so as to have it shipped direct to the markets of the Home-country. To give them an idea of how they were going on, they exported from the colony last year 2,333 tons of butter, besides what was required

Mr. Buchanan

9.0. for local consumption. It would be evident what could be done in that dairy district, and, with land-settlement going on, and these small areas taken up by industrious settlers, the progress that was being made in the district was very great. These people were happy and contented, and would not go back into the towns upon any consideration whatever. He had now put himself right with the people in his district. The Minister knew that from the time this Bill was printed he had been at him continually, and intended to keep at him until this clause was amended. The delay in the Bill being brought forward was caused by the honourable gentleman being engaged on another Committee, and he could not therefore attend to this Dairy Committee. They knew now that, with the arrangements made with the honourable gentleman, and with splendid freezing-works, and with the large amount of dairy production that was going on so far as his district was concerned, they had everything to be thankful to the Minister for; and he would endeavour to assist him in getting this Bill through the House. People were apt, at the beginning, to expect too much. He had it on the assurance of those engaged in the butter trade that they would prefer to buy by the brand, and not by the grading; but that was a matter for themselves. As for himself, he was there to do the best he could to protect the industry now under discussion, and he would leave it to the House to say if he neglected one opportunity, when the interests of the farmers of his own electoral district were under discussion, of advocating its and their best interests. Was he not always advocating their best interests? He knew every honourable member would say "Yes." He would continue to do in the future as he had done in the past—work for the interests of all, and neglect none. He would support the Bill as amended.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE would like to say that, whilst in some respects the Bill was necessary, in other respects he thought it would be a considerable hindrance to the industry. Whilst the grading might be agreed to by those who were associated with butter-factories, he could see that this grading would be anything but a benefit to cheese-factories. The Bill divided cheeses into three classes. There was such a thing as full-cream cheese, but what was called "full-cream cheese" here was not full-cream cheese at all; it was full-milk cheese, made from milk containing all the cream. It was quite right to classify their cheese, but it was not right afterwards that they should begin to grade each class. Suppose they made a full-milk cheese: he would tell honourable members that in their factories they had to make cheese for different tastes. He was now speaking as a director of a cheese-factory. They had to go to a great deal of trouble at different times to find a market for their cheese. For a time the Australian markets took nearly all their cheese. Then they had to make a particular cheese of a certain weight and shape for the Brisbane market. They had to make cheese of a distinctly different flavour for the South Australian market. Then, going to the Home-country, they found that cheese which was considered first-class cheese in London required a particular flavour, which would not take in Liverpool and Manchester, for which places cheese of a different class had to be made. The factory he referred to had been in existence for nearly ten years. It had paid up to 4d. a gallon for the milk supplied to it, and had paid dividends to its shareholders; and all this had been done without interference from Inspectors. He did not think it was right that the Government should arm an Inspector with the power to go into a factory and stamp his ipse dixit on each cheese produced, and to say what was first-class cheese of different classes, when the people of the factory knew differently. And this cheese was to be sent to the markets of the world subject to this mark. However the mark might apply to butter, it would be a considerable interference with the proper commercial relations which were now established in different parts of the world by a number of the cheese-factories in New Zealand. The Bill not only gave these precious Inspectors power to enter a factory and probe every cheese, but it also gave them power, and, in fact, required them, to probe every cheese at the port of shipment. Did the Government think the people managing these factories were incapable of attending to their own business? Did they think that the managers of a factory which had found markets for itself in many portions of the world, and had succeeded in placing its cheese in London at a higher price than the best Canadian, were unfit to conduct their business?

Mr. ALLEN.—What cheese-factories do you refer to, and what did they get for their cheese?

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said the Inch-Clutha Factory had succeeded in selling their cheese in the London market at 8s. per hundredweight above the best-quality Canadian cheese, and it was not right they should be unreasonably interfered with, as was here proposed. He entered his strongest protest against the proposed grading of cheese under this Bill. What the factories were particularly anxious to get was that they should have proper conveniences to and at the place of shipment. They should have cool-cars on the railways, and cool-stores and cool-chambers for the butter after it reached the place of shipment, and lower railway rates on milk and cheese. In Committee he would do all in his power to amend some of the clauses of this Bill.

Mr. PIRANI said the last speaker had not only added to his reputation as a humourist that evening, but had also made a new reputation as a cheap advertiser. He trusted the advertisement he had given his factory, in order to get it inserted in Hansard, would have some good effect in further increasing the price of his dairy produce. The fault he (Mr. Pirani) had with this Bill was that it was somewhat too arbitrary. The Bill itself was a pretty good one, but the power given to the Inspector in many cases was extraordinarily arbitrary, to a greater extent than would be found in any other law. Practically, if the Inspector said a thing was an offence, it was an offence unless the factory could prove to the contrary. That power should be placed in no man's hands, and he thought the clause should be altered in Committee. There was also too arbitrary a power with regard to storage. If a company had freezing-stores of its own it could not use them, but must use the Government store. He did not think that a fair provision, and he thought some means should be taken to alter an arbitrary provision like that. There was also too much fixity in reference to the weight of a gallon of milk. If that were made optional, and if the large powers in connection with grading were done away with, the Bill would be a workable measure; but if it were passed in its present shape it would do more harm than good.

Mr. ALLEN said there were some members of the House who could see no good in anything except what they said themselves. He was afraid the honourable member who had just sat down was one of those members. The honourable member for Clutha made remarks about a dairy he was connected with, and based his arguments upon what he knew in connection with it. The honourable gentleman did not make those remarks in order to advertise his factory; but, even if he did, what harm was there in advertising his dairy? He might do a great deal of good by so doing. He was sorry the honourable member for Palmerston had not a dairy to advertise. Surely his district was not so denuded that he could not advertise a dairy, but could only pick holes in the remarks of another member. He (Mr. Allen) gave the honourable member for Clutha credit for using the information he did, simply as an argument to show that, even without this army of Inspectors, the article produced at his factory could demand so good a price in the Home markets at the present time. With regard to the Bill itself, he was afraid that a good many of the factories had a fear that the interference of the Inspectors was going to do some harm to the industry. He did not fear that very much. He thought it was necessary to have inspection, and even a severe inspection. Some of the farmers thought they would be ruined if the Bill became law, but he thought it would be found that the inspection was not so serious as some of them imagined. In many respects the Bill went too far—particularly as to the wide powers given to the Inspector. Then, with regard to the grading, he did not feel at all sure that the provision was going to be successful. It might be all right to grade at the port of shipment, but that was not a guarantee that when the article arrived in London or wherever it was shipped to it would then be equivalent to the article which was shipped; and he thought possibly the grading would be found not to be of so much use as members now anticipated it would be. It would, of course, be far better if they could grade at the port of arrival, but he supposed that was looked upon as a matter of some difficulty. However, it might be possible to grade here, and, so long as it cost nothing to the producer, he did not think it ought to be seriously objected to. If it were charged to the producer, then it might do considerable harm. Some measure ought to be passed to insure that butter and cheese of first-rate quality only, and marked as such, should be shipped from here, in order to gain a hold and retain that hold on the markets in the Old World, for, after all, the market itself depended not on the quantity but on the quality of the article sent away. In England they found a ready sale for a first-class cheese of their own make, and cheese made in their own country demanded no price unless it was of first-class quality. If the quality was first-class the price was now almost as high as ever it was, and so it would remain. If they could ship butter in first-class order and make it arrive in first-class order they could command first-class prices for it. That was what ought to have been the effect, and he presumed that was what the Bill intended to encourage, and in so far as it went in that direction he would be very glad to support it, although there were some clauses which many of those who had practical experience of the working of dairy factories found to be objectionable in the Bill.

Mr. MASSEY said that, being a country settler, and directly interested in the Bill, he would like to say a few words thereon, though he would not detain the House more than a minute or two. This Bill was supposed to be for the encouragement of the dairy industry, and, such being the case, its object was decidedly a praiseworthy one, because, the soil and climate of this country being particularly suited for the production of butter and cheese, the dairy industry might develop to an almost unlimited extent, and must be of vast importance to the colony. Like some of the other speakers, he was not quite sure that the proposed system of Government grading, which was one of the most important portions of the Bill, would have the desired effect. He was not quite sure that the Minister would be able to get all that he expected from it. He did not think that the mere fact of a man being appointed by the Government to classify butter and cheese as first, second, or third class would have the effect of making the article any better. Of course, it would not have the effect of making it better, and it would not prevent its deteriorating on the voyage between here and England, and he did not think it would have the effect of obtaining for it a better price on its arrival, because the buyers in Britain, being keen business-men, would be guided by their own judgment rather than by the opinion of some one in the colony. He failed to see that the grading of butter and cheese would improve matters at all, and he felt sure that in many cases it would give rise to a certain amount of dissatisfaction. Take the case of a man who thought he was sending Home a first-rate article. Such a man would naturally be very much dissatisfied and disappointed to find that his produce was graded second class, and buyers in England would be very quick to take advantage of that, though it did not follow that because the individual appointed by the Government gave a certificate that a certain brand of butter was first class when it arrived in Wellington, the people at the other end should be of exactly the same opinion. If this system of grading was desirable, it should also be applied to other articles of export—to mutton, wool, gum, and sundry other things which were sent to the markets of Europe at the present time. He thought they ought to be very careful that this system of Government interference should not have the very opposite effect to that which was intended. At the same time he appreciated the motives of the Minister of Agriculture in introducing this Bill. The Minister thought the dairying industry would be benefited by it; but he (Mr. Massey) was very much afraid, so far as grading was concerned, that the Minister would be disappointed. He admitted it was the duty of the Government—the duty of the State—to see that the health of the public was safeguarded in every possible way, and to see that the strictest cleanliness was enforced regarding the manufacture of butter and cheese; it was also the duty of the State to see that no fraud took place—that there was no adulteration in dairy produce or in anything else; but he fancied they might safely leave to the interests of the people everything else. If they went further than that they might possibly be doing more harm than good. In this connection he would like to point out that some of the questions in Schedule B were decidedly inquisitorial, and he thought that they were altogether foreign to the subject. For instance, the Minister wanted to know how many pigs were kept by certain factories, and the price the settlers received for their milk; he wanted to know on what terms the settlers received back skim-milk, and a great many other questions had to be answered that seemed to him to have nothing to do with the quality of the butter. He noticed that the Stock Committee had improved the Bill, and he gave them credit for so doing; but he thought it was capable of still further improvement, and, though he should vote for its committal, he hoped that a number of objectionable clauses would be amended in Committee, or struck out altogether.

Mr. DUNCAN said that, with others, he took exception to this grading, for the reason that no one could convince him that a grader, let him be ever such an expert, could do justice. Justice could not be done, for this reason: Cheese that would be appreciated in one country or in one part of a country would be called second class in another, and vice versa; cheese that would suit Victoria or Brisbane would not suit England; and therefore in grading cheese or butter there would be great injustice to many districts which produced first-class butter and cheese. Besides that, he had never seen the man yet, and he did not believe there was one in existence, who could grade to perfection and in a fair way, because what one would call first class another would call second class, and vice versa. It would be objectionable to any one who was exporting cheese perhaps equally good with another's, but which might be milder in taste, to have his produce branded as second class. That would never do at all. The same would apply to districts. Butter that came from one district would have a different taste, flavour, and quality from that which came from another, and it would be the same with cheese. Therefore this grading could not work well, and when the Bill was in Committee they must try to make other arrangements than those that were provided in the Bill, because they would not work to the profit of those who made these articles. There was another matter, with regard to the inspection of ground, water, and such-like, which possibly might be carried on, but it would be very irksome to the public. He thought they had not arrived at the stage when these provisions should be in the law, and these were portions of the Bill he hoped to see amended in Committee. There was no doubt there would be a good deal in having an examiner to see that there was nothing shipped that was not of good quality, to see that the produce was not tainted, that it was in a good state, and fit for human food in every way. Nothing further than that was required. If this system of grading were applied to frozen mutton, if sheep had to be tasted, and each one specified and branded as first-, second-, or third-class mutton, what sort of arrangement would that be? Would it make any difference, when the meat arrived in London, to its sale? No one would submit to that for a moment, nor would the exporters submit to have the cheese and butter classified as first, second, or third class as long as it was up to a fair standard of quality. He should not support the proposal for grading, but otherwise he should support the Bill, though he might say there were amendments that should be made in Committee.

Mr. Massey

Mr. FLATMAN desired to compliment the Minister in charge of the Bill on what he considered to be a very good measure, taking it all round, though there might be some slight imperfections in it which might be rectified in Committee. He rather agreed with the suggestions of the honourable member for Kaiapoi with regard to the place where the cool-stores should be erected. This Bill was not only to protect the community from having bad articles sold to them, but it would also encourage our great dairy industry by keeping first-class brands in the market. Nothing would go so much against the dairy industry as our produce getting a bad name at the place where exported. In these days of keen competition we could not be too careful. He believed the Bill was necessary. We should look after dairy produce which was shipped out of the country, to prevent the public from being duped as they had been in the past, and also to keep our good name. It might be thought that in many parts of the Bill the Inspectors were given too much power; but he did not think that was so, because they would not take advantage to the full of the power that was given them. The provisions were simply meant to keep the manufacturer within bounds, and to make him produce an article that was worthy of the name of our country. If a few amendments were made in the Bill they might improve it; but he trusted that it would not be hacked about too much. The Bill had been very carefully gone through by the Joint Stock Committee, and he did not know that it could be very well improved. As to the schedule containing objectionable matter, he did not know that it was of much consequence whether it was or was not known how many pigs a person kept. It was simply a matter of statistics, but was of very little importance. It was quite possible a person might never be asked how many pigs he kept, and if he was asked such a question it would not hurt him to give a straight answer. He trusted that the Bill would be put through with very little alteration, and the alterations that were made would, he trusted, be in the right direction. He considered the Bill was for the welfare of every colonist—not only for those actually engaged in the industry, but for the welfare of the colony generally.

Mr. McLACHLAN said it appeared necessary that every member should speak on this very important Bill. Now, he thought he knew as much about dairying as any member of the House, and he thought the Bill was a piece of useless legislation. With the exception of one or two clauses there was nothing that was required in it, and it was most vexatious. Why should the Government legislate as to the statute gallon of milk? They sold their milk by the hundredweight or by the pound, or by its butter-producing qualities. To legislate to say that 10½lb. of milk should be a gallon was hardly worth while. A great many things provided here were, he understood, provided for in the Public Health Act with regard to the inspection of dairies. He knew that was so in Canterbury, and he did not suppose that was exceptional. With regard to grading butter at ports of export, that might be a good thing. He did not know whether it would prove so or not; but he was afraid they might get a bad repute if they put the broad arrow on some exported butter if it was "A1" here and arrived in London as cart-grease. The 9.30. buyers would place very little reliance upon the brand, and no brand that could be put upon it in the colony would be taken as a certificate when it arrived in London. With regard to the quality of the milk received by the factories, he understood that the factories in the North and Middle Islands were satisfied with the quality of the milk; but he wished to impress upon the Government that no legislation they could pass would ever produce better butter than they were producing at present, and, if they sent an expert to every factory to make the butter himself, the fact of his doing so, or the fact of two or three experts going around the country visiting the dairies, would not improve the quality of the butter. He was not going to offer any factious opposition to the Bill, but if there were one good clause in it he would be prepared to support it. There were, however, a great many useless clauses in the Bill.

Mr. MONTGOMERY agreed with most of the provisions of this Bill. He had sent a copy of it to the agricultural society in his district; but unfortunately that society did not agree with it, and they had passed unanimously the following resolution:—

"That this meeting is of opinion that the whole Act is of a very stringent and tyrannical nature, calculated to materially injure all producers of milk products, except those that have the advantage of being in the immediate vicinity of large factories."

He quite agreed that in many respects clause 11, which provided that milk supplied to a dairy factory should be cooled or aerated, was a tyrannical one; and the same remark applied to clause 12, which provided for the rate of payment for milk. These were mostly Committee objections; but he believed that most of the objections the agricultural societies had to the measure were now met by the amendment made in the definition of the word "dairy." Before the Bill went to the Joint Stock Committee the word "dairy" meant any "place in which butter or cheese is manufactured"; and a man who had one cow might have his house called a dairy, and have to register it and to put a brand upon his produce. As the definition of the word stood now, it did not apply to any place where butter was made unless it was manufactured for export. That amendment would exempt a number of small farmers, and would meet to a large extent many of the objections that had been raised throughout the colony to the Bill, where farmers merely sold their milk in their own neighbourhood, or even in the nearest town. With regard to grading, he agreed with the grading of butter, but not with the grading of cheese, because in a few months the whole character of that article might be altered, and, as had been pointed out by the honourable member for Clutha, in the case of cheese it was a question of individual taste in various parts of the world, and it was not practicable to grade it at the particular port of shipment. Besides, there were many farmers who had sent a large quantity of cheese Home who objected to samples being taken out. He had a number of suggestions to make in Committee, but he would not detain the House by dealing with them on the second reading.

Mr. MEREDITH said that, so far as he was acquainted with the Minister of Lands, he was quite sure that it was not his intention to harass or irritate those who were connected with the dairying industry in this colony. He believed the honourable gentleman's intention, in introducing this Bill, was to assist in the development of that industry, and to place it on a sound footing. It was a matter of absolute necessity, if this industry was to occupy the place which it ought to occupy, that it should be very carefully protected against unscrupulous individuals. One objection against the Bill was said to be that there was no necessity for it; but he thought there was a necessity as long as they had to deal with unscrupulous persons who were engaged in the trade, and who would palm off an inferior article for one of higher quality, thereby injuring the reputation of our colonially-made article. The Bill was in the interests of those who were honestly endeavouring to develop the dairying industry, and to place a good article on the English market. The flax industry had been ruined by the action of unscrupulous persons, who had filled the centre of bales of manufactured fibre with an inferior article. These bales had been sent to the English market, and the consequence was that New Zealand suffered a heavy loss, and the English buyers looked with suspicion upon the article they imported. He did not say that had been the whole cause of the depreciation in manufactured flax. There had been other causes, but it was evident that this had helped to depreciate the article; and, under the circumstances, he thought the Minister and the House would be justified in passing the measure now before them. He had read the Bill carefully through, and must say that it seemed to be free from those legal expressions and ambiguities which characterized most of the Bills submitted to this House, and which laymen found it difficult to understand. From returns laid before the House this session he noticed that the dairying industry had extended during the past twelve months, the export of butter and cheese last year having been £354,000, or £30,000 in excess of the previous year. Taking the District of Canterbury during the past two years, the industry had grown rapidly. They had now a central dairy factory in Christchurch, having eight or nine creameries connected with it. This industry was going to help to advance this colony very materially. There was one point he wished to mention. On visiting New Plymouth a few weeks ago he met persons connected with the butter-and-cheese industry, and they seemed to be of opinion that New Plymouth should be placed in the same position as the other four ports of export; and he thought they were entitled to consideration. Last year the value of the export of butter from New Plymouth amounted to the sum of £187,700, or about one-half of the total value of the butter and cheese exported from the colony. This being so, he thought New Plymouth was entitled to every consideration, and he had no doubt the Minister of Lands would take this matter into consideration, and endeavour to make provision to meet the requirements of that important district. As to the Dairy Experts moving about the country amongst the dairy factories, he had heard nothing but praise. They were men who knew their work, and did it; who, when visiting factories, not infrequently took off their coats, donned a white apron, turned up their sleeves, and showed how to manufacture a pound of butter. An honourable gentleman asked if he had seen them doing it. No; but he had heard on good authority, from those who were connected with the dairy factories, that they did do so. He would be happy to assist in putting the Bill through.

Mr. HALL thought this Bill was one of the most important measures that had come before the House this session. He regarded it as absolutely necessary, if they wished to put a good article upon the London market, that they should take care, from the very foundation, to see that everything connected with the manufacture of dairy produce, and butter especially, was put on a proper basis. If they conversed with the dairy managers they would find that they were unanimously in favour of the inspection of produce, and of the inspection of the stockyards, cows, and everything connected with the delivery of milk. It was also evident that the settlers were desirous that the factories should be kept perfectly clean, and that the manufacture of butter should be on the very best and most scientific basis, in order that the quality might be good. He believed that everybody, from the farmer to the manufacturer,—in fact, everybody connected with the raising of butter and dairy produce,—desired that its shipment should be carefully watched, and this Bill provided that it should be watched from the time the milk came from the cow to the time the butter or cheese was put on board the vessel, and placed on the London market. It was not only necessary that all this should be insured, but it was also necessary that they should provide against the contingency of some persons desiring to palm off an inferior article. If they looked at the butter trade of the past they would find that many individuals in New Zealand had made considerable profit by collecting all sorts of butter and palming it off as factory butter, whereas some of the samples were of very inferior quality, such as only resulted in a loss to the shippers. Very much harm had been done to the trade by such butter being palmed off as New Zealand factory butter. For these reasons, he hoped that the Bill would pass, as it was a good Bill, and had been approved of by the experts of the colony. He would not refer to the question of grading, except to say that he agreed with what Mr. Montgomery had said in regard to cheese, which was not always to be judged the same as butter; and for that reason it would be better to leave cheese out of the grading provisions of the Bill. They had not only their own experience, but they had the information from other colonies. He thought the House ought to be very wary in doing anything whatever that would result in loss to the manufacturer. He had been told by cheese-makers that a good cheese had no flavour until it was about three months old, and, as most shippers of cheese would want their cheese shipped before it was that age, it would be difficult to tell what the ultimate quality of a cheese would be, and it would be very difficult to grade. Then, there was the question of the four ports of shipment only. He would point out how this might be a grievance to some shippers. In his own electorate there were several factories about forty miles from Napier, and, if these people were compelled to send their cheese and butter to the Wellington port, it would cost considerably more in transit than if sent to Napier. He thought that could be met by freight being charged only on the lesser distance. He did not wish to say anything further at present on the Bill, but when it was in Committee he should do what he could to amend it.

Dr. NEWMAN only wished to suggest to the Minister that in Ireland,—in Cork,—where the butter industry had been carried on to an enormous extent, grading had added a great deal to the wealth of Ireland. Cork was only a day, at the outside, from the market where the produce was sold.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—It has been a success in Victoria.

Dr. NEWMAN asked if they had not some more machinery than was provided in this Bill. He could quite understand this applying to frozen meat, which was in a hard state when it reached the other end. When it reached the other end it was in the same condition as the flesh of mammoths of Siberia, which had been frozen for thousands and thousands of years. But it did seem to him that the butter which was put into a cool-chamber would be in a somewhat different condition when it reached the other end. He knew of some excellent butter having been exported Home some time ago, which, when it arrived, was in a kind of grease—"bosh," he believed, was the technical term—and it fetched almost nothing a pound. There had been cases when a vessel took twelve months to reach England, and the butter would surely be in a different condition when it reached the other end. He would like to ask the honourable gentleman what he proposed with regard to the appointment of experts, to be placed in charge of the shipments of produce on their arrival at Home, whose duty it would be to overhaul them. He thought there should be some arrangement of that kind. Take, as an example, the large shipments of tallow sent away from the colony. All the leading export firms, besides having an expert to overhaul the quantities of tallow before it reached Home, also kept an agent in London to see that the produce arrived in a good condition, and to watch the condition of the market. He would like to ask the Minister to state, in his reply, whether he meant to have any agent in England to see whether the produce was landed in a good condition; and, while an agent could do a great deal of good in that respect, he would also suggest that he could watch the changes in demand for various sorts of tallow in the London market which frequently took place. Unless a grader were kept there, to keep himself thoroughly posted up in all the latest changes, the system would prove thoroughly unsatisfactory.

Mr. Meredith

Mr. HOGG was not prepared to say that this Bill was by any means perfection. He believed in the old adage that "The proof o' the puddin's in the preenin' o't." Very likely the farmers would have an opportunity of ascertaining for themselves whether this was likely to be an improvement on the present law or not. The honourable member who had just sat down had referred to the excellence of Cork butter, and there was not the slightest doubt that the article which was called "Double-rose Cork" had had a high reputation for many years, possibly half a century. But the singular thing was that this excellent product of old Ireland had been produced without the assistance of any Dairy Industry Bills whatever. What he hoped was that this measure would not be found to be of an oppressive character, and that it would not produce too many inspectors, because the result of an over-inspection of dairies and dairy factories would tend to be harassing to those who were carrying on this very important industry. Some reference had been made to the provisions contained in this Bill for the establishment of cool-stores, and he would like to point out that it was quite probable that cool-stores might be established, not merely at the port of shipment, but also in the interior of the country. He believed there was already a cool-store established in Palmerston North, and probably before very long another cool-store would be established in the heart of the Forty-mile Bush. If those who produced butter and prepared it for export in the inland centres, such as Palmerston and Pahiatua, or, possibly, Woodville, had to send their butter to Wellington, to remain there for a statutory term of four days in a cool-store, there would be the additional cost to the manufacturer.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I am providing for that.

Mr. HOGG was glad to hear that, because he maintained that in cases where this industry was established, and the necessary machinery provided for cool-storage in the interior of the country, there would be no need for cool-storage at the port of shipment. Then, again, if honourable members would turn their attention to clause 14A they would find that the Inspector was empowered to suspend or cancel any certificate if the dairies were not kept to his satisfaction, or if the produce was not manufactured to his requirements. Well, he maintained that there was a great deal of danger in intrusting such drastic powers to an army of Inspectors.

An Hon. MEMBER.—We had that a few years ago.

Mr. HOGG.—It was all very well to say "We had that a few years ago," but they knew cases of injustice such as he had alluded to had occurred in the past. There had been cases in the Stock Department where a great deal of gross injustice had been done; and he would warn honourable members against the danger they might incur by passing measures of a drastic character, which empowered Inspectors to use their own sweet will on the manufacturers and producers of the colony.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—It is the law now.

Mr. HOGG said the law had only had a very brief trial. It should not be left to the discretion of an Inspector to close a factory because everything was not up to his requirements, but there should be proper machinery by which a dairy-factory owner might apply to another tribunal, so that he should not be placed entirely in the hands of an Inspector, who was only responsible to the head of his department. They were giving, he thought, an undue amount of authority to departmental officers, who might injure rather than help the industries of the country by hampering those who were carrying on manufactures. He was not going to refer to the various clauses of the Bill, but he hoped they would be very carefully considered in Committee, because he could say there were undoubtedly several which would be improved by amendment, and others which would require to be rejected; otherwise it would be found that the operation of the measure would, in some respects, do more harm than good to the industry.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the discussion that had taken place on this Bill, he was sure, would prove to honourable members the very great difficulty there was in legislating on a subject such as this. Almost every member who had got up had spoken in approval of the Bill, but had raised objections to some portion of it. If all these disagreements were met and amendments proposed and carried to meet their views, it would seem to him that the Bill would then be quite useless. However, he must congratulate the House on the advancement that had taken place in the views of members during the last two years. Honourable members who were here when the present Dairy Industry Bill was put through would remember the difficulty he had experienced in getting any measure of the kind on the statute-book. The argument of the honourable member for Masterton was, on a previous occasion, that they were going to harass the settlers by all sorts of things that were being done. He would tell honourable members that it was his intention to ask the House, before the session was over, to grant a very liberal sum of money to support this important industry, and without this measure that sum of money would be entirely wasted. Unless this Bill became law it would be useless for him to ask the House to vote that money. Now, let them see what was the position. Honourable members must remember that the whole system of dairy production was completely changed, not only in New Zealand, but all over the world. Twelve years ago there was no such thing as a factory in New Zealand. Four years after the first factory was established—that was, eight years ago—there were only four factories in the whole of the colony. Well, they had advanced, up to last year, to 164 factories in New Zealand, and during last year that number had been increased by seventy-four. This was before the report was compiled which he had laid on the table of the House, and since then the department had received intimation that there were forty-three further dairy factories established or about to be established in New Zealand. He asked members representing country constituencies to consider what was the reason that these factories were being established from day to day and were becoming so numerous in the colony. The reason was that they could find a better market for produce made in factories than under the old system, under which farmers produced their own butter. They had now before them the experience of other countries; and if they were to keep pace with other countries, and place their produce on the London market, and obtain for it the same prices as were obtained by other countries, they must keep pace with the legislation that had taken place in other parts of the world. The legislation of other countries had been far more drastic than anything that had been proposed in the Bill before the House. If honourable members would look at the Dairy Acts of Canada, the United States, or Victoria they would find that the regulations were far more drastic than anything he had submitted to the House.

He submitted the Bill to the House 10.0. in its present shape well knowing the difficulties he would have to contend with in getting it through the House in such a shape as he thought necessary. Almost every one of the provisions in the Bill which was not already law was in the Bill introduced by him two years ago. He had at that time to give way to the feeling of honourable members, and cut those provisions out of the Bill. If they were to cut them out again, simply because honourable members were afraid that the settlers would be harassed by this measure, then it would be just as well to retain the Act which was on the statute-book at the present time. Some twelve years ago we sent only a few hundred pounds' worth of dairy produce to the London market, whilst last year we sent over three hundred and fifty thousand pounds' worth; and it was expected this year that the amount of money to be received for dairy produce from Home would be about half a million. He was sure that honourable members who knew the climates of New Zealand and Victoria must admit that we ought, at any rate, to send as much produce from our dairy factories to the London market as was sent from Victoria. Notwithstanding the fact that the climate of Victoria was not nearly as suitable for dairying as that of New Zealand, Victoria last year took £700,000 from England for dairy produce; and if we were to keep pace with Victoria and with the other colonies, and with the Canadian and American people, then we must send our produce to the London market in the same way that they did, otherwise we should be shut out. There were a number of objections which had been raised in connection with the Bill which were simply Committee objections. With regard to the question raised by the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs with reference to London inspectors, and also as to the question raised by the honourable member for Waitaki that we should have a system of grading at the other end, he thought it would be a very great mistake for us to try anything of the sort. Let us first grade at this end, and see how our produce arrived at Home. We could have a system of inspection at the other end; but to say that we were to have a double system of grading would, he thought, be a mistake at the present time. However, we must proceed in this matter as experience taught us, and as we found necessary and in our own interests. He did not desire the House to go further than they could safely go at the present time. If they found, after bringing the Bill into force, that it was not sufficient to carry out what the colony wanted, then they could amend the Act next year, and so on. They were only taking a step further in advance this year upon the experience they had gained during the last two years. He might state that the Bill had been submitted to a very large number of dairy associations throughout the colony, and to a number of the owners of dairy factories. A large number of them had returned replies stating that they were willing to support the Bill. Many suggested amendments were made, and, after going over these amendments very carefully in Wellington, they had as far as possible endeavoured to meet the desires of the dairy associations and the dairy-factory owners. Of course, they had not been able to meet them all—that would be impossible; but so far as they possibly could they had tried to meet all the valid objections raised. The Bill had gone through a Joint Committee of both Houses. He thought it would be found that each clause was considered on its merits, that honourable members would find that the Bill was required, and that, with very slight modifications, it would be found suitable for the purpose for which it was intended. With regard to the question of cool-storage, it was provided that cool-storage should be afforded at the four principal ports of the colony. There was also a clause in the Bill enabling the Government at any time, by Order in Council, to make any other port in the colony a port at which produce could be graded and cooled. He might point this out to honourable members: that whenever the Government declared any port a port to ship dairy produce from, or a port at which it could be cooled and graded, then they would have to find the necessary machinery at such place, and they would also have to find graders at any such place. He thought they should first confine themselves to the four large shipping ports of the colony; and then, in the case of any other place, such as Waitara, where a contract might be carried out by a shipping company to send steamers there, when the Government were satisfied that those steamers would go there and take the produce, they had power to declare that a shipping port in addition. He thought that would meet all objections. He might say it was their intention, for the first year, to give this matter a fair trial, and to provide the storage free at each of the four ports during the time the butter was being graded, so that there would be no extra expense such as had been referred to by the honourable member for Masterton. There was one point which was referred to by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). That was in connection with the 5th clause. The honourable gentleman maintained that that clause would trench upon the powers of the local bodies. That clause did not in any way trench upon the powers of the local bodies. It simply allowed the Government to appoint officers to inspect dairies, but in no way interfered with the duties of local bodies in the matter. At least, he was advised that was so. There were a few amendments which he thought necessary in order to make the Bill clearer. Otherwise, he thought the Bill should go through as it was at the present time. He need not again refer to the very great importance of this question to the colony. If they expected to get a large population upon the soil, it must be done by encouraging the dairy industry as much as possible. This industry had raised other countries from a state of stagnation and ruin. He had no hesitation in saying that before ten years were over the dairy produce of New Zealand would be of as much value in the London market as the frozen mutton was at the present time.

Mr J. McKenzie

Mr. BUCHANAN.—In less time.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said, perhaps so. If they looked back to the very great strides made by this industry during the last twelve years, it must be acknowledged that it was most remarkable, and he had no hesitation in saying that in the next ten years the industry would continue to make great progress.

Bill committed.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 11.—Milk to be cooled or aerated.

The Committee divided on the question, "That this clause be a clause of the Bill."

AYES, 42.
Buchanan	Maslin	Reeves
Buddo	McGowan	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	McGuire	Seddon
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	McLachlan	Stevens
Duncan	McNab	Steward
Graham	Millar	Tanner
Hall	Mills	Ward
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Willis
Heke	Morrison	Wilson.
Houston	Parata	Tellers.
Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton	Flatman
Lang	Pirani	Meredith.
Mackenzie, T.

NOES, 9.

	Lawry	Tellers.
Allen	O'Regan	Harris
Green	Russell, W. R.	Massey.
Hogg
Kelly, W.

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Pere.	Buick.

Majority for, 33.

Clause retained.

Clause 12.—Rate of payment for milk.

Mr. WILSON moved to add to the clause, "Provided this clause shall not affect any contract for supply of milk to dairy factories or creameries prior to the coming into operation of this Act."

Amendment agreed to, and proviso added.

Clause 15.—Particulars to be stamped or marked on cheese or butter.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE moved to strike out the word "person," and insert "owner of a dairy factory or creamery."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 19.—New subsection (1) (a): "Every person exporting butter shall have such butter placed in the cool-store proclaimed by the Governor at the port of shipment at least four clear days prior to shipment, for the purpose of being cooled or frozen. The ports of shipment to be Auckland, Wellington, Lyttelton, and Port Chalmers, and such others as the Governor may from time to time proclaim by Order in Council."

Mr. BUDDO moved to strike out the words "at the port of shipment."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved to strike out subsection (c) of section 2: "Shall, prior to shipment, inspect and grade each lot of cheese, and shall stamp or mark each cheese, and each keg, box, or package containing such cheese, with the official stamp or mark and the figure denoting the grade."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the subsection stand part of the clause."

AYES, 29.

Buddo	Flatman	Lawry
Carnell	Hall-Jones	Maslin
Carroll	Hogg	McGowan
Collins	Joyce	McKenzie, J.
Crowther	Lang	McKenzie, R.

McLachlan	Pinkerton	Ward
McNab	Seddon	Wilson.
Millar	Smith, E. M.	Tellers.
Morrison	Smith, G. J.	Meredith
Parata	Stevens	Mills.
NOES, 15.
Allen	Heke	Steward
Buchanan	Kelly, J. W.	Tanner.
Duncan	Mackenzie, T.	Tellers.
Green	Pirani	Massey
Hall	Russell, W. R.	Montgomery.
Harris

PAIR.

For. Buick. Against. Pere.

Majority for, 14.

Clause retained.

Subsection (3), second paragraph.—“For the purpose of inspecting and grading the quality of any butter or cheese, the grader may open and sample any one or more kegs, boxes, or packages of each lot of such butter or cheese, and affix the official stamp and grade-mark on the lot, or any portion thereof, according to the quality of the sample thereof.”

Major STEWARD moved, That the following words be inserted after the words “sample thereof”: “The Governor may also, if he shall deem it expedient so to do, appoint persons to inspect at the ports of arrival butter produced in the colony and shipped from New Zealand ports, in like manner as is hereinbefore provided in regard to inspection prior to shipment, and the official stamp denoting grading at port of arrival shall be ‘A,’ ‘B,’ or ‘C,’ prefixed by a cross (x), as denoting first, second, or third grade respectively.”

The Committee divided.

AYES, 12.

Buddo	Harris	Smith, G. J.
Carnell	Heke	Tellers.
Crowther	McLachlan	Steward
Flatman	Montgomery	Wilson.
Hall-Jones

NOES, 28.

Buchanan	McGuire	Pinkerton
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Pirani
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Russell, W. R.
Green	McNab	Stevens
Hall	Meredith	Tanner
Hogg	Millar	Ward.
Joyce	Mills
Lawry	Morrison	Tellers.
Mackenzie, T.	O'Regan	Duncan
Maslin	Parata	Smith, E. M.

PAIRS.

For. Allen. Against. Seddon.
Pere. Buick.

Majority against, 16.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 21.—“In all proceedings under this Act for any offence or breach thereof the person against whom such proceedings are taken shall be deemed to have committed the offence or to have done the act charged or alleged, as the case may be, unless he shall prove to the contrary; and such proof shall not be upon the Inspector or other officer who shall have taken any such proceedings.”

Mr. McNAB moved to strike out all the words after “In,” with the view of inserting the following words: “any proceedings for the recovery of a penalty under sections sixteen, seventeen, eighteen, and nineteen hereof, the onus of proof that he is not liable to any penalty shall lie upon the person against whom the information is laid.”

The Committee divided on the question, “That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause.”

AYES, 20.

Buddo	McKenzie, R.	Smith, E. M.
Carnell	Meredith	Stevens
Crowther	Millar	Ward
Lawry	Mills	Wilson.
Maslin	Morrison	Tellers.
McGowan	Parata	Hall
McKenzie, J.	Pinkerton	Joyce.

NOES, 20.

Bell	Hogg	Russell, G. W.
Buchanan	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. R.
Collins	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	McGuire	Tanner.
Flatman	McLachlan	Tellers.
Fraser	O'Regan	McNab
Harris	Pirani	Montgomery.

PAIRS.

For. Buick	Against. Te Ao
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carncross	Bell
Earnshaw	Duthie
Hall-Jones	Mackenzie, T.
Mackintosh	McGuire
Reeves	Green
Seddon.	Allen.

The CHAIRMAN gave his casting-vote with the “Noes.”

Amendment agreed to.

The Committee divided on the question, “That the clause as amended stand part of the Bill.”

AYES, 25.

Buchanan	Lawry	Morrison
Carnell	Maslin	Parata
Carroll	McGowan	Pinkerton
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Stevens.
Duncan	McLachlan
Flatman	McNab	Tellers.
Hall	Meredith	Mills
Joyce	Millar	Wilson.

NOES, 14.

Buddo	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Fraser	McGuire	Tanner.
Harris	O'Regan	Tellers.
Hogg	Pirani	Montgomery
Kelly, J. W.	Russell, G. W.	Russell, W. R.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Buick	Pere
Seddon.	Allen.

Majority for, 11.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

The House adjourned at half-past two o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Thursday, 11th October, 1894.

First Reading—Third Reading—Government Advances to Settlers—Government Railways Bill—Public Works Bill—Native Land Court Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Dairy Industry Bill.

THIRD READING.

Harbours Bill.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO
SETTLERS BILL.On the question, That this Bill be read the third time,

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA said he had the previous day moved that subsection (7) of clause 25 be struck out, and the Colonial Secretary had asked him to wait until the Bill was reprinted. He also objected to the new subsection (8) which had been introduced the previous day by the Colonial Secretary, with reference to the Westland and Nelson Native reserves. These lands had not been mentioned in the Bill until the amendment was inserted. He thought it was unfair to put such a subsection into the Bill, certainly seeing that it had not been inserted in the other House. He strongly objected to these reserves being included. The land in the Greymouth portion of the reserves was town-district land, and he did not think it should be included. No notice had been given to the residents there that such a clause was going to be inserted in the Bill, and he therefore moved, That clause 25 be recommitted for the purpose of amending subsections (7) and (8).

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN asked his honourable friend to withdraw the motion, as the lands referred to were mostly town and suburban, and, as such were exempt, the amendment was quite unnecessary. If there were any rural lands they would come under the operation of the Act, but all the land in Greymouth and in Westland would be exempt.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA stated, in answer to the honourable gentleman, that the Westland and Nelson Native reserves comprised large blocks of land of many thousand acres, which were not town lands, extending from different parts of the Wairau, in the Nelson Provincial District, to the West Coast.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY would call attention to the position of the Bill. It was in such a state that the sooner it went to a Conference, if such Conference were required by the other House, the better, and the point referred to would no doubt be dealt with there. The Bill had been practically destroyed.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said from his point of view it had been, to a certain extent, rendered of very little use, but when it went to a Conference possibly such a concession might be made by the Council as would make it a practical measure. He thought, therefore, the sooner it went to the other House the better. There was nothing in the contention of the Hon. Mr. Talaroa. If he (Sir P. A. Buckley) thought it affected in the slightest degree any interest of the Natives he would consent to the recommittal, but the honourable gentleman was in error in supposing that it did. He would therefore ask the Council to read the Bill the third time.

The Council divided.

AYES, 28.

Barnicoat	Kerr	Reynolds
Bolt	MaoGregor	Richardson
Bonar	McCullough	Rigg
Bowen	McLean	Stevens
Buckley	Montgomery	Stewart
Dignan	Morris	Swanson
Holmes	Oliver	Walker, L.
Jenkinson	Peacock	Whitmore
Jennings	Pharazyn	Whyte.
Kelly

NOES, 4.

Acland	Taiaroa	Williams.
Feldwick

Majority for, 24.

Bill read the third time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—In asking the Council to agree to the amendments made by the Governor in this Bill I should like to explain its position. If honourable members will look at clause 4, subsection (8), they will find that in that clause, after the word "position," the words "in such Service as if they had never left it" are struck out, and it is proposed to insert the following words: "respectively, as if they had continued in the service of the said Commissioners, and as if section seventy-six of 'The Government Railways Act, 1887,' had not been repealed. The provisions of that section shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to any of such persons who shall hereafter retire from the service of Her Majesty." The object of this is to place the officials who entered the service of the Commissioners in the same position in which they were before.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It does not do that.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I admit it would look at the first blush as if it were not so. Up to the year 1887 those who were in the Civil Service and who took employment under the Railway Commissioners had their rights under the Civil Service Act preserved. But they got a great deal more than that: they got the right to retire from the Service on compensation, which no other Civil servant had. As soon as the railways were restored to Her Majesty they would continue to have the same right, with the exception of the gap. That is scarcely fair as regards the other Civil servants. At first sight, I am bound to say one would suppose, without consideration, that that was the idea; but we want to restore them exactly as they were. They took this service not by their own act, but by the sanction of the Legislature; and let me call the attention of honourable members to section 76, to which reference is made:—

“(1.) The rights of all persons, whether absolute or contingent, who at the commencement of this Act were in the Civil Service of the colony, and who by virtue of this Act shall be deemed to be in the service of the Commissioners, shall, as regards claims for compensation for loss of office, or otherwise in respect thereof, or for superannuation allowance, be and the same are hereby preserved up to the time when they enter the service of the Commissioners; and all such persons shall thereafter be subject to this Act and all regulations made thereunder in respect of their classification, promotion, salaries or pay, discipline, and otherwise howsoever.”

Now, it is a well-known fact that many of these men get very high salaries. Their salaries have been increased irrespectively of the question of the Civil Service or anything else. They have been increased out of all proportion to what other Civil servants were allowed, and it would have been conferring on them an advantage which no other Civil servant had. Further on honourable gentlemen will notice,—

“(2.) The compensation for loss of office or the superannuation allowance to be made to any such person as aforesaid shall be paid or granted upon his leaving or retiring from the service of the Commissioners, but shall be calculated only on the basis of his employment in the Civil Service of the colony prior to his entering the service of the Commissioners under this Act:

“Provided that, if any such person shall be unwilling to be or continue in the service of the Commissioners, he may, on giving them written notice, retire from such service, and shall then receive such compensation or be granted such retiring-allowance as he may be entitled to under any Act in force giving or securing such rights.”

Thus honourable gentlemen will see that no injustice of any kind is done to them. Their status is preserved; their right of compensation is only retained up to the time they entered this service. No injustice is done by the intended amendment; on the contrary, they are placed in exactly the same position as before, whereas under the terms of the Bill as it came up here they were getting greater advantages. This affects very few of them, and it is intended that they should be placed in exactly the same position as they were in before the Act of 1887.

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

An Hon. MEMBER.—Do the years under the Commissioners count?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—No; they were not intended to count when they took service, and therefore they are not intended to count now. Their rights are preserved up to the time they entered the service of the Commissioners, and they have the right to retire with compensation now, which no other Civil servant has. Any Civil servant now wishing to retire gets no compensation. It is only if his services are dispensed with that he is entitled to compensation. Should he elect to retire he gets absolutely nothing. But these gentlemen have a right to compensation if they resign.

An Hon. MEMBER.—But they lose a term of years?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Yes; they knew what they were doing; and it would be very unfair to place them in a superior position to other Civil servants. Besides, as I say, their salaries were enormously increased. Then, with regard to clause 12: After the word “October,” in the second paragraph, it is proposed to omit the word “next,” and insert the words “one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four.” That is merely a formal matter, and requires no explanation. I trust I have sufficiently explained the reasons for the amendment. I understand there is some hostility to it, but I do not know why there should be. I may point out to honourable members that if the Governor's amendments are lost the Bill is lost. I move, That the amendments be agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Am I to understand my honourable friend to say that, if a Governor's message sending down an amendment is objected to, the Bill necessarily falls?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Yes; that is so.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—But, Sir, that puts the Council in a very curious position. It throws an entirely new light upon amendments sent down by Governor's message, because, according to that contention, the hands of the Council might be tied in many important matters. I was going to point out this: It appears to me that there is a considerable amount of injustice done to very deserving officers of the country simply because they have been bandied about between one set of masters and the other. It has been said that they voluntarily took office under the Commissioners, and that when the Commissioners took control they could have retired if they had liked, taking compensation. But we all know very well that the greater number of the officials in the Government service are not in a position to thus throw themselves out of employment. The fact is, it was a compulsory handing-over from the one service to the other, and at the time the Act was passed it was certainly supposed that the railway servants were to belong to as permanent a service as the Government service. Now they are put back again into the Government service without any request of their own, and without any power of their own to make any stipulation. I think it is only right they should be dealt with as if there had been no change at all in the service—that is to say, that, so far as they are concerned, the service of the Commissioners and the service of the Crown should be looked on as continuous. With regard to their position in the service, as the honourable gentleman has pointed out, they may have had an advantage in this matter by being enabled to retire if they were prepared to retire. Those who wished to retire from the service did so five years ago when the Commissioners took over the railways, and they got compensation; but the greater number remained in the service of the Commissioners after the Commissioners took control. At present it does not appear likely that any large number would care to retire; and they would be practically penalised under this amendment, simply because the country has chosen to change the control of the Government railways twice. I think the Council will see that a considerable injustice will be done to these men.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Some of them have had their salaries nearly doubled.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—There are very few indeed who have had their salaries largely increased, and in these cases they had every right, I presume, to the increase. Certainly no one has said that the management of the railways was bad during the last five years, and I do not think it is fair that the Council should assume that these men who have received increases in their salaries have got more than they deserved. As I said, there are not many of them in that position, and the five years they have served under the Commissioners have been as distinctly in the service of the country as when they were under the Crown. I think we should ask for your ruling, Sir, about this question which has been raised, as to the effect of refusing the amendment sent down by message from His Excellency the Governor.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—How are you to meet the Governor? There is no provision for it.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—If the honourable gentleman refers to Rule No. 319 he will see that the Council can amend it.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—The effect of doing so would simply be to destroy the Bill. I know of no means of communicating with the Governor after his message has been brought down.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—Rule 319 says, "Governor's amendments are read a first and second time, and may be agreed to with or without amendment."

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Then, going on to the next rule, we find, "The Governor's amendments, if agreed to by the Council, are forwarded to the House of Representatives for its concurrence." If the House does not agree, it is optional for it to dissent; and if the House and Council cannot agree, then the Bill drops.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I wish to call attention to this: If the matter is sent back to the House, assuming we do not agree to the amendments, where are we then? There are no means of communicating, under the Standing Orders, with the Governor. It is not the House's amendment—it is the Governor's message, and there are no means of communicating with the Governor upon a question of this kind.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—I suggest that, as the amendment was proposed by the Governor and adopted by the House, we now receive it from the House of Representatives as an amendment adopted by them.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—The real question seems to me to be one of great simplicity. The Civil servants in connection with the railway service had their status altered by regulation made under the Act of 1887. They were not consulted. We legislated without respect to their wishes. They had certain rights and a certain status at that time. They were Civil servants, and subject to certain regulations. But we, for national purposes, altered that status, and, having tried the experiment with regard to control,—as to which they had no option,—we now revert to the condition of things subsisting before we passed the Government Railways Act of 1887. It seems only fair that the servants of the country in this Railway Department should go back to the same status exactly as they occupied at the time when, without consulting them, we interfered with their status. The Bill which we passed established that as a principle. It says,—

"All persons who were in the Civil Service immediately before the twenty-eighth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine, shall, upon and after the commencement of this Act, be in the same position in such Service as if they had never left it."

That seems to me to be natural justice, and unless some strong reason is given for interfering with it I think it should stand. Now, we have learned from the Attorney-General that he lays stress, to some extent, upon the fact that certain increases of salary have been given to those Civil servants who are in the railway service.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Which could not have been given under the Civil Service Act.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—I believe that is so in the case of one or two, or, at any rate, a very small number; but when they entered the service of the Commissioners they became subject to certain deductions from their salaries, which deductions have been made, and from which they have suffered to a far greater extent—I speak of the service as a whole—than the few who have had their salaries increased and who have benefited. And, Sir, much need not be made of the privilege which they enjoyed of being able to resign and receive compensation on their resignation. A few did resign, and received compensation; the bulk, however, did not resign, and the proportion of those who did resign is infinitesimally small. No advantage has been taken of that power except in very few instances, and some of them were the cases of persons who were on their deathbeds and wished to resign so that they might get compensation to give to their friends before dying. It seems to me that the Governor's message—the basis of sending such a message—is an endeavour to interfere with what really was the natural desire of the Ministry themselves—that is, not to do any injustice in taking the railway servants back under the administration of the Government. They had a certain status and certain privileges. We have altered their status and privileges through the altered state of things of taking the railways back to Government control; and it seems to me natural justice that the railway servants should go back precisely to the same status which they held before. I want to say just one word about the question of dealing with the Governor's message. If it is held that we must, in the event of receiving a message from the Governor, either accept the message, or that the Bill which we have passed, and which the other branch of the Legislature has passed, must be entirely sacrificed, then I say the Council and the House would be acting under duress, which would be an extraordinary position if it were established. I hope nothing of the sort will be established.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—While agreeing with the last speaker, I think the position is nevertheless somewhat awkward, because no doubt the clause must be amended. It is nonsense as it stands, and I do not think it fulfils the intention of the Lower House, because it says the railway servants shall occupy the same position in the Civil Service as if they had never left it. That is manifest nonsense, because in all cases of promotion they would be compelled to go back to their old positions. The intention, of course, was not that; but the effect of the clause as it stands is that all persons promoted since the railways came under the control of the Commissioners would have to go back to their old positions. The intention of the Lower House, I imagine, was that any rights which these men had then regarding compensation for loss of office or otherwise should be preserved; but the wording of the clause has quite a different effect. It would upset the whole Service. Therefore an amendment is undoubtedly required. Such an amendment as we have now before us may not be quite fair, but that we must amend the clause in some way is manifest.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—The point just referred to as to the construction of the 3rd subsection of clause 4 is a perfectly good one. The words we now have, "in the same position in such service as if they had never left it," were no doubt intended to express this: that the railway servants should be deemed to have been in the Civil Service the whole time. That was obviously the intention in these words, but the meaning expressed is certainly the meaning given to them by the Hon. Mr. Whyte, and the clause as it now stands really does not carry out the intention of the Legislature at all, because we all, I think, understood or imagined the effect of this would be to give these railway servants the same rights as if they had been in the Civil Service during the gap in which they were the servants of the Commissioners, which no doubt the Act of 1887 took away from them. But as to that, the question arises as to what is the right thing to do. Now, I think it is perfectly clear that, according to what is just, these Civil servants should be treated as if they had continued in the Civil Service during the time they were in the service of the Railway Commissioners, and that is what was intended to be carried out by subsection (3) of section 4. As to the contention that salaries have been raised more than they would have been raised under the Civil Service, that may be a very good reason why the clause should be modified to meet that. For instance, it might be stated that salaries on which compensation is to be paid, including that term in the computation, should not be more than the salaries to which they would have been entitled under the Civil Service Act. The difficulty might have been met in that way and the objection of the Attorney-General entirely removed.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Their salaries might have been raised in the Civil Service.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—Yes; I do not know that there is much in that contention. It is said that these men had the option of resigning, instead of entering the service of the Railway Commissioners. It was quite necessary that should have been put in the Government Railways Act, so that the men should not be, as it were, forced to enter the service of the Commissioners. But, really, these men were not free men at all; they had no real freedom in the matter, because most of them, as we know, by resigning would simply be giving up their means of livelihood, and to say that men under such circumstances exercised any free choice is an abuse of terms. The right thing to do in this case, the thing we must do with the Governor's message, or with any Governor's message, seems to me to be this: that it should be postponed; and I have not the slightest doubt that it could be amended so as to carry out the intention of the Legislature, and that intention is simply to do what is just to these men.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—As if they had continued Civil servants, and as if this section had not been repealed.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—We could retain the words "as if they had continued in the Civil Service." We should then be amending the Governor's message, and not rejecting it, as we have every right to do. That would probably meet the case.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I should be glad if my honourable friend would move the adjournment of the debate. That would give time to consider the matter. I was not prepared for any contention on this matter, and therefore I should be glad if the adjournment of the debate were moved. My impression is that we have no power to amend the Governor's message.

Hon. Mr. Oliver

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Might I suggest that, while you consider this question of the amendments which will be necessary, you might also consider the status of the Railway Commissioners who have left the service—that is to say, Messrs. Hannay and Maxwell?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—They have received their compensation. The question does not affect them in the slightest degree.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—I think it is a proper thing that the matter should be adjourned for consideration. I move, therefore, That the debate be adjourned.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I agree that the proper way of getting out of the difficulty is by adjourning the debate; but, without entering into the question on the Order Paper, I have only to say that, if it is only a few men who are to be affected, surely there is some way of getting out of the difficulty without doing injustice to the others; but I wish to say that if we cannot amend a Governor's message it is something new to me. If my memory serves me aright, we have amended Governors' messages before, both in this and in the other House. However, that is a question that before all others should be looked into, to see what our powers with respect to a Governor's message are, because it is a serious matter if we are to be taken by surprise, and can do nothing but reject the Bill or adopt the message. I am glad to support the adjournment, in order to ascertain our position.

Debate adjourned.

PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 141.—Toll-gates, &c., may be placed on roads and tolls collected.

Subsection (2).—"But no toll-gate shall hereafter be established within one mile from the boundary of any borough, except for a bridge or ferry."

The Hon. Mr. FELDWICK moved to strike out the words "bridge or."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the subsection."

AYES, 11.

Acland	Montgomery	Richardson
Buckley	Peacock	Stewart
MacGregor	Pharazyn	Williams.
McLean	Reynolds

NOES, 15.

Barnicoat	Holmes	Rigg
Bolt	Jennings	Stevens
Bowen	Kelly	Swanson
Dignan	Kerr	Taiaroa
Feldwick	Oliver	Walker, L.

Majority against, 4.

Words struck out.

Bill reported.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, this is one of the most important Bills that has for some time commanded the attention of this Council. I have from my place here on more than one occasion stated that the state of our Native-land laws was a disgrace to our statute-book. I have not altered that opinion, and the Government has, with the assistance of others, endeavoured to simplify to a certain extent some of the means of dealing with these Native lands. Out of curiosity, for the information of the Council, I have gone to great trouble to ascertain the number of Native-land laws that encumber the statute-books, and I find that the number is sixty-one. Of that number, recently and from time to time forty-two have been repealed: and I am not sure that the repealing Acts have not been worse than the original enactments. There are yet nineteen remaining, and this Bill proposes to remove from the statute-book nine that are almost unintelligible. This Bill is broken up into two Divisions. The First Division deals with the machinery of the Native Land Court, and the other is a policy measure, to which I would ask the serious consideration of members of this Council. With regard to the First Division and the alterations in the existing law, which are principally a consolidation of nine Acts, I will refer to them as briefly as possible. I will not follow them consecutively, but will take them in the way in which they occur to my mind. As honourable members are aware, the restrictions on the alienation of Native lands are now taken off by the Governor in Council. It is proposed to alter that, and to enable the restrictions to be removed if the Court thinks proper. I think it is a very proper thing that the Court should be the authority by which this is done. I am not sure that it should not be provided that, after the Court decides it may be done, then the Governor in Council may remove the restriction on the request of the Court. That is a matter for the Committee, and it is one on which I hold very strong opinions. Then, the Bill proposes to deal with the rights of beneficiaries. As honourable gentlemen know, there has been a practice of placing a certain number of names in the certificate of the Court or the memorial of ownership, and nine or ten persons, perhaps, whose names were inserted, who were the trustees of the estate for the whole hapu, ignored the trusts and dealt with the land as if it was their own, with the result that the Natives were robbed of every right they had. It is proposed to give power to the Court to deal with these trustees, and to bring them to account for breaches of the trust which the Court originally reposed in them. Another great advantage is offered by this Bill. I am bound to say that I have for years endeavoured to follow out the legislation on this subject, but I have had to give it up as a bad job, and I am not the only lawyer who has had to do so. There are scarcely any who have been able to get in touch with our Native-land legislation, and I believe I may say the same with respect to some of the Judges. When a Native-land case is brought before them they get heartily sick of it, because it is almost impossible for them to know exactly what they have to deal with. In order to simplify the law, every title that the Court has adjudicated upon is to be placed immediately under the provisions of the Land Transfer Act. Certificates of title, memorials of ownership, orders of the Court, and provisions of one Act and another rendered it impossible to ascertain who the real owner was. It is now proposed to make one uniform law, so that immediately the decision of the Court is given the provisions of the Land Transfer Act shall apply to the land. Then, the First Division of the Bill provides for the simplification and execution of the deeds, and sufficient provision is made for protecting the rights of the Natives, and seeing that Europeans do not in any way get the advantage. Further, I should say that it is proposed that the Court should exercise the duties of Trust Commissioners in every case. I think this will be found a very desirable provision, because the Court has full knowledge of the facts fresh from the hearing of the parties, and will be in a position to say whether the provisions of the Act to which reference is made are being honestly carried out. Now I come to the vexed question of surveys. This has been a matter which has exercised the Native mind for many years, and has been a burden and trouble and nuisance to them. All persons intending to negotiate for the purchase of Native lands employ a surveyor, who immediately goes to work—whether the Natives understand the process or not I am not aware—and the surveyor gets a lien on the land, and this places the Native at a very great disadvantage. It has sometimes the force of a mortgage, and the surveyor may be able to sell, and this is not at all likely to benefit the Natives. It is proposed that the Surveyor-General shall license the surveyors, and that no surveyor shall enter on the survey of the lands without the consent of the Court. This will protect the Native and the surveyor as well. I come now to another alteration which it is proposed to make, with regard to wills and succession. The Court will have exclusive jurisdiction with regard to the probate of wills of Natives, and it is proposed also to do away with what has been considered a very great injustice to those who ought to succeed to lands. It is proposed by the Bill that the Court, notwithstanding a will, shall be empowered to investigate the matter and say whether the person making the will has left to those who ought to succeed him the property they ought to obtain. This will do away with what has been known as “undue influence.” We have had several cases, especially in the Napier District, by which, through undue influence at the point of death, Natives have given away property to those not entitled to it, to the detriment of those who ought to be the successors, and who have been often found not to have even ordinary means of support. Then, it is proposed also that no Native land should be sold for debt if the Natives have not sufficient means of support. There is another provision with regard to the exchange of land. The Natives have no power to exchange their land one with another, and it has been found by experience that where some portion of a tribe, for instance, resides in one place, and another portion in some other place to which the tribe lays claim, and where it is desirous of remaining, they ought to have the option, as between themselves, of exchanging. There is no such provision now, and it is intended to afford them this facility. Then, it is proposed under the Bill to establish a Court of Appeal. A great deal of the time of the Supreme Court has been taken up for many years in deciding questions of this kind. Our Judges, who are very hard-worked, have to deal with these intricate questions in the short time they have at their disposal. It is proposed to establish an Appellate Court, so that the Supreme Court shall not be troubled with the matter. These are the principal alterations in the First Division of this Bill. I now come to the Second Division, with regard to restriction on alienation. I remember many years ago a resolution was proposed in the Council by the late Hon. Mr. Reeves—it was not carried in the Council, but we had a very able debate on the question—that the time had arrived when the Government should resume the pre-emptive right. I have myself long considered that that is the proper course for the Government; and I thought it was a desirable thing that the Natives should in every possible way be protected. Although some people may differ from me, and think there ought to be free-trade in Native lands, I have no hesitation, after having some experience in matters of this kind, in saying that the Natives would be benefited if the Government were to resume the pre-emptive right in dealing with Native lands. I need scarcely point out to honourable members, who know a good deal more about the matter than I do, that a Native, when dealing with a European for Native land, generally comes worst off, and, though a Native may get 5s. or 10s. an acre for his land, the party negotiating with him very often has to pay double that price, but he does not pay it to the Natives. It is paid to the agitator, the pakeha-Maori, the interpreter, and every vagabond who comes between them.

An Hon. MEMBER.—And the lawyers.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Yes, and the lawyers too. And the banks very often get a share of the plunder, because the unfortunate man often has to get an overdraft, and my honourable friend knows what that means. I am quite certain the Native is in no way benefited by this free-trade; and this Government has at last thought it desirable, after full consideration, to say that the pre-emptive right shall be restored. While I say this, I am much pleased to say the Bill also provides that all transactions now pending shall be protected, so that no injustice shall be done to any one where negotiations are not completed. The time is limited within which negotiations may be completed. If the time is not sufficient, more time should be given, where the transactions are fair and honest. I am prepared to do every justice to those who have interests in pending negotiations, and to protect their rights under the Bill. I can say no more than that. Then, provision is made by which Natives may become incorporated. Honourable members will recollect that for several years there has been an agitation in another place—I do not think it has ever reached this Chamber—to incorporate Natives for the purpose of dealing with their lands. It is quite true that some Natives do not require this, and do not wish it. Some are not socialists, they are individualists, and are very anxious to have their property individualised, with the view of dealing with it as they think fit. These principally belong to the North; but those on the East Coast have been agitating for many years to establish this system of incorporation, so as to enable them to deal with their property through committees; and, after careful inquiry, and after having made himself acquainted with the wishes of these people, the Native Minister, satisfying himself that it is the desire of the people in that part of the country, has given them the option to incorporate themselves in the manner suggested by Part III. of Division II. But all these things must be done through the Land Board; all dealings must be with the Land Board: and that will protect the Natives, and prevent injustice from being done. I hope that the Council will read the Bill a second time, a Bill which has been carefully considered, and which is, I was going to say, as good a measure as could be devised under the circumstances. I trust that before the end of next session, if we are here, we shall be able to repeal every other Native Land Act which is now on the statute-book; and, having made an attempt in this direction, I think we are taking a step in the right way. Of course, I intend this Bill shall go to the Native Affairs Committee, and therefore I ask the Council now to read it a second time. I trust I have sufficiently explained the provisions of the first part, which are simply in the nature of consolidation and machinery; and, as to the second part, I have explained that so far as I have been able to do so, and I do not think there is any other point to which I need call attention. I therefore move, That the Bill be read the second time, and be referred to the Native Affairs Committee.

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—No one at present in the Council can possibly have suffered so much as I have from the administration of the various Native-land laws to which the honourable gentleman has made reference. I could not even approximately say how many there are, but I think our system of passing Acts of this description has been such that it would require a lifetime to master them, and most of them, at all events, are anything but consistent with the next one which came out in the following year. Sir, it is outside the question just now to say how these laws came to be passed. Many of them were passed under a very imperfect knowledge of the circumstances. Many of them were passed by people the majority of whom did not know anything at all of the circumstances of the North Island, and how much it was affected by the Native-land question. And some were passed to meet particular cases of various kinds. In 1879 the Grey Government had their attention drawn to this, and came to the conclusion there was only one possible solution of the question, and that was the resumption of the right of pre-emption by the Crown; and a Bill was drawn giving full protection for all persons who had even gone so far as to survey the land, and the rest of the country was secured by the system at that time in vogue of paying a small sum on account, and proclaiming the land to be under negotiation by the Government. That prevented any new transactions from going on at all. The Grey Government went out of office, and a new Government came in. They seized upon this action of the Grey Government to show that the country was being pauperised to an extent it could not bear in the purchase of Native lands, and all these purchases were thrown away. I dare say some hundreds of thousands of pounds which had been paid by the Government were absolutely sacrificed, and it was declared by Parliament that the Government should never again have anything to do with the purchase of land. The result was that many persons—I among others—foolishly believing that undertakings of that kind were most likely to be carried out, purchased land on the principle of free-trade in land, indorsed as it seemed to me by the voice of Parliament. The result was that in three years a new Native Land Act was introduced,—in 1882, I think,—and there has been a Native Land Act every year since—a Native Land Court Act, or a Native Lands Frauds Prevention Act, or something else of the same kind, to prevent people from completing their titles; and at this moment nobody, not even the most experienced Maori agent, can be trusted to tell you whether you have a good title or not. It is not to their interest, and never has been, to enable you to get a good title. We are under the heel of these men, and have been for the last ten or twelve years. Once the Government ceased to undertake negotiations with the Natives, from that moment we were the slaves of the agent; and the cost of employing these people—who are the laziest people to be found in the world, with no legal knowledge, and no special training at all—the cost of maintaining these people, I say, has been a serious drag both to the Maori people and to those persons who wished to employ their land usefully. Not only they, but there is another class of people, who have managed to become Justices of the Peace, and who sell their services from day to day, and who at present are a clog to all negotiations. Then, you have the Maori lawyers. I do not wish to be very severe on them, but I am bound to say this: In purely Maori districts they have been a serious hindrance to every really bona fide improving settler in the Maori country. No sooner have you got a title which you are advised is perfect than you find yourself engaged in litigation by some lawyer, who thinks himself sufficiently brought up to that kind of work: and on the table at this moment there are protests against the enormity of the charges they have made. Every Act passed caused that, and I think the Bill before us is the first dawn of better things. I personally hail this resumption of the right of pre-emption as being good for both the occupying settler and the Maori race. I shall be glad to see it done, so long as it is done with justice. The Government must never forget,—and it does not propose under this Bill to forget,—that many persons, acting perfectly lawfully, have laid out enormous sums in complying with the law, and the charges incidental to the law, and might perhaps collectively have embarked a million of money, at least, in transactions which are hung up by the requirements of some of these laws, as, for instance, the necessity, after completing the transaction, of hanging the deed up for three months and fourteen days from the time the Court has given its order. For instance, when the Court has given its order as to a survey, that time must necessarily elapse before they can get the survey made. These are things which nobody could have foreseen: or perhaps the Judge was delayed in signing the order, or the surveyor dawdled over his work; and had the Government made this law to come instantly into force a very large number of persons would be ruined, and their hard-earned money confiscated under its provisions. But the Government does not propose to do that. I am quite satisfied, after reading the Bill, that every settler in the North Island who has had anything to do with Native land has become so disgusted that he will be charmed to see that the system under which he has suffered so much is going to be put an end to. I hardly know a person who is engaged in these things who will not be perfectly ready, and, in fact, glad, to see that the Government is going to take this step. Sir, when the Bill goes into Committee I hope the Council will not make any vital amendments. But there are amendments which, I think, in common justice, ought to be attended to. One is that, in providing for an agreement between the Natives, the Bill makes no provision for a Native who holds his land in severalty under a title from the Crown selling to another or to a European. That I do not think is fair, and I hope we shall put it beyond doubt that they have the privilege, in common with the Europeans, of selling their land in the ordinary manner, and under the laws made for the conveyance of property. That, I think, is only a just thing; and I think, moreover—although it is not a point I shall press, considering how important the Bill is—I think the time proposed to be allowed for completing pending transactions, knowing how slow the Maoris are, and how many difficulties there are in getting surveys finished, might be a little extended. When the Bill is before the Native Affairs Committee I hope that will be fairly considered, and that the Council will be asked to make some small amendments in that direction, which, I think, judging from the spirit which has been shown in the matter throughout, the Government will accept. The Attorney-General knows a great deal about these matters, and about the persons who are necessarily employed; and I might just mention one or two little things which, at all events, from my own experience, I know to be true. There was a gentleman, who used to sit in another place, who bought a property something like twenty-five years ago. He employed proper agents, and did everything that was required; but he had actually to do a good deal of it over again, because it turned out that there was something wrong in the transaction, and when it came to the end of the lease it turned out that all the Natives had not signed this deed, and they endeavoured to dispossess him of his homestead and his garden; and, moreover, of those who had signed, very few were admitted into the title. So, practically, he got one-third of what he paid for. I know that he was hit very hard indeed, but I hope it will prove to be a blow from which he will recover. I mention that as an instance of what is taking place all the way from Gisborne to the East Cape. Nobody has known since I have been there—a matter of twelve years—what property he really holds at all; and they have never known, even when they have registered their title, whether it might not be upset. There was a notable case at Gisborne—I may be wrong in the name, but I think it was some such name as Mackay versus Brown, or Matthews versus Brown. There was a property called Kuiti, which was cut up and given to the Natives in severalty. One of these shares belonged to a Native who sold to a person called Matthews, who registered his title, and got a Land Transfer grant, and built a house on the land and improved it,—when he was informed that, under some decision of the Appeal Court, the title was not worth anything, and he must consider his title to be cancelled. There was no attempt even to refund him the money that is called the insurance fund—not even that; and there were a number of other persons who had bought forty or fifty shares in the block who, in spite of the registration of their title, found that they were not worth 2d. That is a particular case, but I could quote hundreds of instances all over the country. At any rate, that suffices to show the enormous intricacy of the Native-land laws, and the extreme injustice done to settlers, who cannot be supposed to know the law, and have to trust to Native advisers or Native agents and the Native laws. I think that honourable gentlemen, when they consider what has been the result of all this Native-land business, how that many men have been absolutely ruined by the mere cost, and the continual difficulties in the way of getting their titles, only to find in the end that they are worthless, must realise the necessity for some such measure as this. There are so few faults in the Bill that I do not wish to point out any in particular. When it goes to the Native Affairs Committee I shall have an opportunity of doing so, and I hope that when we bring the Bill back to the Council honourable gentlemen will find it is a Bill which, for its principle and its policy, ought to be given effect to. I would rather see the Bill go forward without amendment than see it dropped, because there is certainly an honest attempt in the Bill to conserve the pending rights of persons engaged in Native-land dealing, and there is no disposition shown anywhere I know of to take advantage of the circumstance of passing the Bill to injure any settler. On the other hand, with one single exception, we have a Bill that will be a valuable Bill; and all the best part of the country, and the most easily used, will, within a reasonable time, come into occupation; and settlers will be able to devote the whole of their time to improving the country and to working their farms, instead of having to spend it galloping about from their homesteads to the nearest town to attend sittings of the Land Court, or probably having to come down to Wellington to watch a case in the Court of Appeal, diverting their means and their time from more legitimate occupations. I am glad the Bill has been introduced, and that it goes in for the principle of resuming the right of pre-emption, modified as it is here, because it is not wholly resuming the right of pre-emption. I approve of that principle, and I believe that it will turn out, at all events so far as the East Coast, which I know, is concerned, to be productive of a great deal of good, and to give a chance to the hard-working settler to earn money by legitimate means.

Hon. Sir G. S. Whitmore

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMS.—My sympathies are with the Native Minister in this matter, and I think this is an honest endeavour on his part to solve a very difficult problem, and to settle the Maori land. It is monstrous that there should be some thirteen millions of acres of land in the hands of the Maoris, lying waste, and not producing either rates or taxes. But I regret very much that the Minister should have thought it necessary to resort to pre-emption to solve this difficult problem. "Pre-emption" is an ugly word. It is a word that is written in blood in the early history of the colony. It graduated in blood, and was buried in blood in the year 1862, with the hope that we might never hear the term again. One of the first acts or endeavours of the Native Land Department to acquire land for the Crown was in Mangonui, north of the Bay of Islands, and that at once led to a collision between the Natives—two tribes contesting for a block of land. The leader of one of the tribes was Hone Heke. This brought him to the front. He gained the victory, but lost several of his men. This alienated his mind, and so embittered him against the Government that it eventuated in the cutting-down of the flagstaff and in the destruction of Kororareka. Previous to the collision, Commissioner Godfrey was instructed by the Governor to inquire into the cause of the quarrel. He reported,—

"Immediately after my arrival at Kaitaia all Nopera's tribe assembled there in considerable numbers; and, in a public conference, many violent and seditious speeches were made by Nopera and other chiefs. In these harangues they declared—

"1. That the sales of land around Kaitaia already made by Nopera and his party to individuals should be acknowledged, but that any surplus lands—i.e., those the Government does not grant to the claimants—will be resumed by the chiefs who sold them.

"These and many other violent expressions seemed to proceed partly from a feeling that not being allowed to dispose of their lands to whomsoever they pleased, as formerly, is an interference by the Government with a right they are not quite convinced they surrendered to the Crown."

On the same day Mr. Kemp, Protector of Aborigines, wrote,—

"I enclose herewith extracts of the depositions of the respective chiefs taken by me before the Court. Nopera has expressed himself dissatisfied with the purchases effected by the Government in Mangonui. At Kaitaia many of the chiefs, with their tribes, collected together. They made several violent speeches, the substance of which was as follows: 1. That they object to the Government assuming any authority over their possessions. 2. That they strongly protest against any land being sold to the Government. The disaffection towards the Government apparent in the speeches alluded to arises, I think, from the right of pre-emption vested in the Crown prohibiting them from disposing of their lands to any other persons, thus depriving them of a privilege they formerly enjoyed, and from the sales of which they derived a very considerable revenue."

With regard to Kororareka, Mr. Busby,—who had been British Resident for some years in the country,—while in England, wrote to Mr. Hope to this effect:—

"In compliance with your request, I have the honour to address to you in writing the substance of what I verbally stated to you respecting the late disturbances at the Bay of Islands. From an intimate knowledge of the character and conduct of John Heke during the last eleven years, as well as from the sentiments he has more than once expressed to myself, I have no hesitation in affirming that the act of cutting down the flagstaff was a premeditated act of defiance or rebellion against the Government; and, though I am inclined to hope that few of the chiefs in the northern part of New Zealand would be parties to such an act, yet I am firmly persuaded that the majority, if not the whole, of the Natives participate in the distrust and disaffection of which that proceeding is an evidence. This disaffection may be traced almost exclusively to the conduct of the Government with respect to the land question. When it was proposed to the Natives to cede the sovereignty of their country to the Queen the alleged grounds of that proposal were the great influx of Her Majesty's subjects into New Zealand, which she could not prevent, and the impossibility of repressing the disorders which resulted from such a state of things, and of affording protection for the weak and well-disposed of either race from the violence of men of an opposite character. The only motives alleged were those of benevolence and protection. The chiefs were persuaded to agree to the Treaty, so far as it was executed at Waitangi, by their confidence in the missionaries and myself. But had we been aware that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to enter into a competition with the New Zealand Company in colonising the country, by the profits to be realised from the lands of which the Natives were invited for their own protection to yield the pre-emption, we could not, with our knowledge of their feelings and sentiments, have conscientiously recommended them to agree to the Treaty."

Further on, he says,—

"I was a witness of the baptism of John Heke and his children about six or seven years ago, and his fast-flowing tears on that occasion showed how keenly he felt the solemnity of that sacrament, and the obligations it imposed. It is impossible for me to believe that he was at that time otherwise than a sincere, intelligent convert, and, though I have since heard actions imputed to him inconsistent with his Christian profession, I have no difficulty in believing that he considers he was only doing the duty of a patriot to his country in the late disturbance. Heke is married to the daughter of the late Hongi, who visited England, and was introduced to King George IV., and who was the greatest warrior New Zealand has produced. There is much reason to apprehend that his influence would be very great throughout the northern part of the Island should matters be pushed to extremities between him and the Government."

The Government did not take warning from these events, or from the unfortunate affair at Wairau, but continued to purchase large tracts of country for a nominal consideration, without due inquiry as to who were the rightful owners. I will give the Land Purchase Commissioners' own words in this respect. One of them stated,—

"He was totally dissatisfied with the course which the Government had taken, buying the Natives' land for the least possible amount, and making a profit out of it. Hitherto the negotiations of the Government for the Native lands had been conducted on no principle at all, by persons whose only qualification in general was a knowledge of the Native language. Of course these officers had no interest in making purchases complete and indefeasible, but they felt vitally interested in making purchases as soon as possible, and for as little as possible, and sending up reports of purchases said to be made, without minding a little vagueness of boundaries. To that he attributed all the difficulties which now troubled us."

An extract from a letter of the District Commissioner of Hawke's Bay to the Chief Commissioner says,—

"It may be said, in a few words, that at present there is no Native-land question in this province—that is to say, that within the last two years the Natives have put a stop to land-selling to the Government. This step, on their part, arose from the dissatisfaction produced by the sale of lands by some of the chiefs. Finding the sale of land so ready a means of obtaining large supplies of money, the next step was an easy one—namely, that from selling lands they had a right to, or were authorised to dispose of, to selling those belonging to other people, with which they had no business to meddle. The heart-burnings and dissatisfaction arising from this cause at length broke out in war, about which time the Maori King movement began to gain ground in Waikato, from which district a deputation, under W. Thompson, alias Tamihana Tarapipipi, the King-maker, came down with the ostensible purpose of making peace, but really to gain adherents to their party."

And, again,—

"With reference to the general bearings of the question, it cannot be denied that the mind of the Natives is at present thoroughly unsettled on the land question. They are deeply imbued with the idea that the Government wish to obtain forcible possession of their lands."

The heart-burnings and disaffection arising from these proceedings culminated in the Waitara war, and eventually in the King movement and the Waikato war. By a common consensus of opinion it was conceded that to waive the right of pre-emption was the cure for the evil, and in 1862 the first Native Land Act was passed, and free-trade granted in lands. Under pre-emption the lands purchased by the Government were—in the North Island, 5,861,000 acres, at 6d. per acre; in the South Island, fourteen million of acres, at 3d. per acre. The gross amount paid was £170,000, or, roughly, twenty million acres odd for £170,000, or an average of 2d. per acre. The lands sold by the Natives to Europeans direct under the Native Land Act up to 1885 amounted to 2,374,400 acres; the lands leased, 1,683,000; lands still held by Natives, 13,259,600. Of this total, 873,879 acres were paid for, the sum paid being £277,133, or an average of 6s. 4d. an acre. Over and above this, the Government received £27,700 for 10 per cent. duty, and the land was assessed for taxation purposes, for it immediately became taxable, at £905,474. I take these figures from a speech of the late Premier Mr. Ballance, reported in Hansard in 1885, Volume 3, page 393, and I assume them to be correct. It will thus be seen that under the pre-emption the Natives received 2d. per acre for twenty million acres, and under free-trade they received 6s. 4d. an acre for their lands. The pre-emption landed the colony in war, which cost six millions sterling; free-trade satisfied the Natives, pacified them, and ended the war; so much so that at the present time the Government have suggested the repeal of the Arms Act, which prohibits the sale of arms to Natives. But why cannot the two systems go side by side? There are large areas which may be dealt with by the Government for settlement purposes; while there are other tracts which might be better dealt with by private enterprise—rough, broken country, serviceable only for pastoral land. The Government have the necessary machinery for purchasing under "The Native Land Purchase Act, 1892," "The Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act, 1893," and "The Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Act, 1894"; and there is no reason why they should not be able to purchase all the lands that they require; and surely the Frauds Prevention Acts furnish a sufficient guarantee that the Natives would not be imposed upon by the settlers under free-trade. The return to pre-emption now will be considered by the Natives a breach of faith, seeing that they have enjoyed the right to sell their own land for over thirty years; and, finding themselves boycotted by the Government, they will boycott the Government in return, and the consequence will be that there will be no sale of land, and settlement will be stopped. The Act of 1886 proved a dead-letter, and it is just possible that the present Bill, if ever it comes into force, will also prove a dead-letter. The present Government cannot, of course, be blamed for the errors of others, but they may take warning from the past. It is a remarkable fact, and very suggestive, that, although the Crown obtained twenty millions of acres at the very low price of 2d. an acre, yet when you add to that the cost to the country owing to the hostilities with the Natives—namely, £6,000,000—that brings the price up to 6s. 2d. an acre, or very nearly the amount paid by settlers under free-trade.

Hon. Mr. Williams

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA.—I should like to ask the Colonial Secretary whether he would agree to adjourn this debate until to-morrow. Although I tried to follow this Bill through the other House, I really have not had the time to look at it, and I have only just got it with the amendments made by the other House.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I do not think any advantage will be gained by delay, and, as some honourable members who understand this matter are desirous that the Bill should go to the Native Affairs Committee as soon as possible, my honourable friend, who is a member of that Committee, I trust will have every opportunity of discussing the measure there, and when the Bill comes back from the Committee he will have a further opportunity of addressing the Council upon it. I think we should read the Bill a second time now, and refer it to the Committee, because no advantage would be gained by delay.

Bill read the second time.

The Council adjourned at seven minutes to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, 11th October, 1894.

First Reading—Second Readings—Third Readings—Education Board Members' Expenses—Abattoirs and Slaughterhouses Bill—Public Works Statement—Sitting of the House—Privileges of the House—Ministerial Residences Sale Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—Harbours Bill—Tramways Bill—Tongariro National Park Bill—Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill—Water-Supply Bill—Stamp Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Native Land Court Certificate Confirmation Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Trustees Bill, Native Land Claims and Boundaries Adjustment and Titles Empowering Bill, Legitimation Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Criminal Code Bill, Trustees Bill, Legitimation Bill.

EDUCATION BOARD MEMBERS' EXPENSES.

On the motion of Mr. COLLINS, it was ordered, That a return be laid before this House showing the amounts charged as expenses by members of the various Education Boards throughout the colony for the years 1892, 1893, and 1894; such return to state the amounts charged as travelling-expenses, whether by railway or other methods of locomotion.

ABATTOIRS AND SLAUGHTERHOUSES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 3.—No slaughtering permitted within half a mile of any borough.

Dr. NEWMAN moved the addition of the following words at the end of the first subsection: "unless with the consent of the Council of such city or borough, or the Board of such town district."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 18.

Button	Lang	Russell, W. R.
Carncross	Lawry	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McGuire	Wilson.
Fraser	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Graham	Pinkerton	Buchanan
Green	Russell, G. W.	Newman.
Hutchison, W.

NOES, 39.

Allen	Joyce	Montgomery
Bell	Kelly, J. W.	O'Regan
Buddo	Kelly, W.	Parata
Buick	Mackintosh	Pirani
Cadman	Maslin	Saunders
Carroll	McGowan	Seddon
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Duncan	McKenzie, R.	Stout
Duthie	McLachlan	Ward
Earnshaw	McNab	Willis.
Hall	Meredith	Tellers.
Harris	Millar	Morrison
Hogg	Mills	Tanner.
Houston

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Cadman.	Mackenzie, T.

Majority against, 21.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 6.—County and Borough Councils may erect abattoirs.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word 'city' be inserted, as proposed by the Abattoirs Committee."

AYES, 45.

Buchanan	Heke	Morrison
Buddo	Hogg	Parata
Cadman	Houston	Pirani
Carncross	Joyce	Reeves
Carnell	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Lawry	Russell, W. R.
Collins	Mackenzie, T.	Saunders
Crowther	Mackintosh	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	Massey	Stout
Duthie	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Earnshaw	McLachlan	Ward
Fraser	Meredith	Willis.
Graham	Millar	Tellers.
Green	Mills	Button
Hall	Montgomery	Pinkerton.
Harris

NOES, 10.

Hall-Jones	McGowan	Tellers.
Hutchison, G.	McNab	Hutchison, W.
Kelly, J. W.	Steward	McKenzie, R.
Maslin	Thompson.

Majority for, 35.

Word "city" inserted.

Sir R. STOUT moved to strike out the following words: "within the limits of such city, borough, or county"; with the view of inserting "so long as the abattoirs are not within the limits of any city or borough."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 37.

Allen	Hogg	Pinkerton
Buchanan	Joyce	Pirani
Cadman	Lang	Reeves
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Russell, W. R.
Carroll	Mackintosh	Saunders
Crowther	Massey	Seddon
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Earnshaw	McKenzie, R.	Ward
Fraser	McLachlan	Wilson.
Graham	Meredith
Green	Millar	Tellers.
Hall	O'Regan	Button
Harris	Parata	Mills.

NOES, 18.

Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Maslin	Steward
Collins	McGowan	Tanner.
Hall-Jones	McNab	Tellers.
Heke	Morrison	Smith, G. J.
Hutchison, G.	Newman	Stout.
Hutchison, W.

Majority for, 19.

Amendment negatived.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause as amended stand part of the Bill."

AYES, 40.

Allen	Harris	Morrison
Buchanan	Hogg	Parata
Buddo	Joyce	Pirani
Button	Lang	Reeves
Cadman	Lawry	Russell, W. R.
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Saunders
Carroll	Mackintosh	Seddon
Crowther	Massey	Smith, E. M.
Duncan	McGowan	Ward
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Wilson.
Fraser	McKenzie, R.
Graham	McLachlan	Tellers.
Green	Meredith	Mills
Hall	Millar	Pinkerton.

NOES, 13.

Carnell	Kelly, J. W.	Stout.
Collins	Maslin
Hall-Jones	McNab	Tellers.
Hutchison, G.	Newman	Russell, G. W.
Hutchison, W.	Smith, G. J.	Tanner.

Majority for, 27.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 30.—By-laws relating to abattoirs, &c.

Subsection (9).—"For prescribing the conditions subject to which meat from beyond the district over which the local authority has jurisdiction may be brought for sale or consumption within such district."

Mr. MORRISON moved the addition of the proviso: "Providing that no local authority shall have power to prohibit within its boundaries the sale of meat which has been killed in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and which has been inspected in the manner provided by this Act."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 44.

Buchanan	Hutchison, G.	Mills
Buddo	Hutchison, W.	Montgomery
Buick	Kelly, W.	O'Regan
Carncross	Lang	Parata
Carnell	Larnach	Pirani
Collins	Lawry	Reeves
Crowther	Mackintosh	Russell, W. R.
Duncan	Maslin	Seddon
Duthie	Massey	Stevens
Flatman	McGowan	Steward
Fraser	McGuire	Ward
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Wilson.
Hall	McLachlan	Tellers.
Harris	McNab	Kelly, J. W.
Hogg	Millar	Morrison.

NOES, 8.

Earnshaw	Pinkerton	Tellers.
Joyce	Russell, G. W.	Allen
Mitchelson	Tanner	Button.

Majority against, 36.

Proviso added.

Clause 32.—By-laws to have same effect as if made under Acts relating to municipal districts.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON moved to add the words, "Provided that all such by-laws made in this behalf shall not come into operation until the assent of the Governor in Council has been given to the same."

Amendment agreed to.

New clause 49A.—"Nothing in this Act contained shall apply to any bonâ fide farmer who, as incident to his farming operations, slaughters on his farm for sale or barter large or small cattle: Provided that the proof shall at all times lie on him to satisfy the Court that his principal avocation is farming and not slaughtering."

Mr. BUCHANAN moved, That the following proviso be added: "and provided that the local authority from time to time may make by-laws regulating the number of large and small cattle which may be slaughtered or bartered."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 18.

Allen	Mitchelson	Russell, W. R.
Bell	Montgomery	Stout
Duthie	Newman	Wilson.
Heke	Parata	Tellers.
Lang	Pinkerton	Buchanan
Mackenzie, T.	Russell, G. W.	Fraser.
Millar

NOES, 87.

Buddo	Houston	McLachlan
Buick	Hutchison, G.	McNab
Button	Hutchison, W.	Morrison
Carncross	Kelly, J. W.	O'Regan
Carnell	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Crowther	Larnach	Saunders
Duncan	Lawry	Seddon
Earnshaw	Mackintosh	Tanner
Flatman	Maslin	Ward.
Graham	Massey
Hall-Jones	McGowan	Tellers.
Harris	McKenzie, J.	Hall
Hogg	McKenzie, R.	Mills.

PAIR.

For. Against.
Carroll. Te Ao.

Majority for, 19.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

PUBLIC WORKS STATEMENT.

(For all Tables and Returns referred to in this Statement, see Appendix D.-1.)

Mr. SEDDON.—Mr. Speaker, it is again my pleasure to lay before you the Public Works Statement. Exception has been taken to the delay in bringing it down, but this was quite unavoidable, seeing that the ways and means available could not be ascertained until the recent legislation in reference to improving Crown lands and purchasing Native lands was effected.

It will, no doubt, be contended that the policy measures dealing with finance should have been brought forward and passed at an earlier period of the session. Against this I may fairly urge that questions of great moment required the attention of the Legislature. These questions were of such an exceptional character that they could not brook delay, but, when they were dealt with, no time was lost in promoting the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Act, which was only passed by the Legislative Council on the 3rd instant, and now awaits the assent of His Excellency. I hope, however, the delay will not have made the Statement less attractive.

ROADING CROWN LANDS AND PURCHASING NATIVE LANDS.

The Colonial Treasurer, in the Budget, indicated a new departure with respect to the improvement of lands and the roading of the same, and the purchase and roading of Native lands. Details in connection with the proposed expenditure under these heads will be found in the estimates of expenditure under the head of "Lands Improvement Account" and "Native Lands Purchase Account." The necessity for the increased expenditure in connection with improving and roading the lands of the Crown, and for the purchase of Native lands and roading the same, will be conceded by every true colonist. If this necessity is not met it will be impossible to keep pace with the demands of those who desire to settle upon our lands, and the sons of our fathers will leave our shores and seek homes elsewhere. Others also, who for years have found intermittent employment in our towns, and who now seek to settle in the country, and with that object are engaged on the co-operative works, would also become disheartened and return to the towns, there to eke out a miserable existence, and, in many cases, ultimately become a burden on the ratepayers. The Government believe it to be their duty to meet the urgent demands for land for small settlements, and that in so doing they are acting in the true interests of colonisation. By settling the people on the lands permanent prosperity will also be assured, and the loss of population effectually prevented.

Making provision for the purposes hereinbefore enumerated has had the effect of swelling the proposed expenditure of the year to considerably more than was appropriated last year. On reference, however, to Part I. it will be seen that the amount asked for under that Part of the Fund is only £564,980, being less by £48,880 than was appropriated last year. The difference is principally accounted for by a reduction of nearly £100,000 in the votes for roads, and an increase of nearly £40,000 in the vote for development of goldfields, and about £10,000 in the vote for public buildings.

The total increase in the appropriations under all heads will be £229,708, made up as follows:—

Lands Improvement	£	£
Account ..	150,000
Native Lands Purchase
Account ..	150,000	800,000
Decrease under Part I.	48,880
" " " II.	26,417	70,297
Increase	..	229,708

PROVISION FOR ROAD-WORKS GENERALLY.

An increased expenditure is proposed under the head of "Main Roads" amounting to £16,961. The principal portion of this is owing to the necessity for provision being made for the main roads north of Auckland, the maintenance of roads generally, and especially the roads from Nelson to Westland and Hokitika to Christchurch. The local authorities are absolutely unable to maintain these roads. In some of the districts mentioned there has been no other public-works expenditure; they have no railways; and, whilst there are vast areas of Crown and Native lands, there is very little rateable property. The keeping-open of these roads is of colonial as well as local importance, more particularly in regard to the tourist traffic.

Another cause which has necessitated an increased expenditure this year is the exceptionally bad harvest, low prices, and the inability of the owners of property from various causes to make improvements: thus throwing out of employment a very large number of very deserving colonists. The distress during the winter—more particularly in the large centres—has been exceedingly great, and it devolved upon the Government to meet this unforeseen difficulty and to make provision to alleviate as far as possible the wants and requirements of those who, through no fault of their own, were thrown out of work. The Government has, however, rigidly adhered to the policy that it was the duty of the State to find employment only on reproductive works, and on improving lands the property of the Crown. Accordingly, the roads put in hand are only such as are required for the promotion of settlement and the development of the resources of the colony. The other works undertaken have been bush-felling and other improvements on Crown lands, and by this means also settlement has been promoted. The colony will lose nothing in connection with this class of expenditure, for the amount expended will be added to the capital value of the land. Those employed in doing the work will in many cases become settlers, and be located on the land they have been employed to improve, and they will subsequently pay the interest on the moneys which have been expended in making the improvements. By these means the men become accustomed to a country life, and a large percentage of them will never again trouble either the Government or the local authorities as "unemployed."

That the General Assembly should have to perform the functions of a General Board of Works cannot be said to be satisfactory, but as matters stand it is a necessity. By the local-government legislation of 1876 it was no doubt intended, in regard to minor works, such as roads and bridges, that the local governing bodies should deal with these questions. All the machinery was then provided; but a serious defect, and one which has not yet been rectified, crept in—namely, the local authorities were not provided with an assured revenue upon which they could depend for the construction of necessary works, and for the maintenance of the same when constructed.

The Government has already stated its intention of introducing next session amended proposals with regard to local government. Pending the necessary legislation being passed, and the necessary funds being thus provided, Parliament is asked to follow the usual course and make due provision for the several works enumerated in the estimates. The amounts required for road-works are in excess of those asked for during the last three years, but this excess is largely due to the purchase of Native lands, and to the amount required for roading the lands purchased. A large amount is also required for farm-settlements, and for land-improvements and main-road maintenance. In respect to the latter, as previously stated, the condition of the finances of the local authorities is such that it is impossible for them to bear the expense of these roads.

ROAD AND RAILWAY EXPENDITURE.

A pleasing feature will be found in the fact that, whilst there has been a large increase in the expenditure on roads—which are a great and urgent necessity, in fact, the lifeblood of settlement—there has been a considerable decrease in the expenditure on railways.

The appropriations asked for for railways this year also show a decrease on last year's votes, and the decrease would have been still more marked had it not been for the fact that a much larger sum is asked for by the Railway Commissioners for additions to open lines this year than was voted last year. Last year the amount voted was £18,978; this year £40,000 is required; and on going carefully into the matter the Government has come to the conclusion that the Commissioners have not been unreasonable in their demands.

Notwithstanding the smallness of the expenditure it will be found that the outlay during the last two years has been the most advantageous that has taken place for a considerable period, for the finishing of partly-constructed lines and bringing them to remunerative points was considered to be of the first importance.

In another part of the Statement will be found a comparative return showing the appropriations for and expenditure on railways and roads respectively for the years 1890-91, 1891-92, 1892-93, and 1893-94, from which it will be seen that there has been a gradual reduction in the expenditure on railways, and a largely increased expenditure upon roads. Honourable members will, I feel sure, agree with me that the construction of district roads and the maintenance of main roads in the settled districts is, owing to our defective system of local government, to some extent defensible as a charge upon the Consolidated Fund; but in regard to railways, which remain for the benefit of posterity, it is a reasonable contention that this class of work should be constructed out of funds which the present generation should not be asked wholly to provide. So long, however, as we have partly-constructed lines, and a judicious expenditure will bring them to a payable point and make the past expenditure remunerative, then a grant from the consolidated revenue for such works is warranted, leaving the further extension and completion of such railways to be dealt with in the future.

Mr. Seddon

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.

The state of the Public Works Fund on the 31st March last (including a small asset of £78 due to Part I. under "The Government Loans to Local Bodies Act, 1886") was as follows:—

Parts of Fund.	Unexpended Balances, 31st March, 1893.	Receipts during 1893-94.	Totals.	Expenditure, Year ended 31st March, 1894.	Balances remaining, 31st March, 1894.	Liabilities existing, 31st March, 1894.	Net Balances available, 31st March, 1894.
	£	£	£	£	£	£	£
Part I. ..	177,685	419,353	597,038	339,300	263,738	214,742	48,996
Part II. ..	152,943	2,428	155,371	76,174	79,197	28,866	50,331
Totals ..	330,628	421,781	752,409	409,474	342,935	243,608	99,327

From the above table it will be seen that the receipts during the year more than met the expenditure, so that the Fund was in a better position, to the extent of £12,307, on the 31st March last than it was at the commencement of the year. The receipts under Part I. consisted of £250,000 transferred from the Consolidated Fund, £163,713 of released sinking funds, £3,757 from the Ellesmere Railway Trust, and £1,868 from miscellaneous sources. The £2,428 shown as a receipt under Part II. was a transfer from Part I. to cover expenditure on the purchase of Native lands to that amount which had been charged to Part II. in excess of the allocation authorised.

TOTAL WAYS AND MEANS AVAILABLE.

The Colonial Treasurer has already mentioned, in the Financial Statement, the proposal to again transfer a sum of £250,000 from the Consolidated Fund for general public-works purposes. An amount of £54,681 will also be available from released sinking funds under our loan-conversion operations. A further sum of £250,000 will be available for roads and bridges, and the preparation of lands for settlement, and for assistance to settlers to enable them to make improvements, under the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Act; and a further similar sum for the purchase and roading of Native lands under the same Act.

The total ways and means available for public-works purposes this year will therefore be as follows:—

Public Works Fund, Part I.—	£
Balance remaining on 31st March, 1894	263,738
Transfer from Consolidated Fund	250,000
Released sinking funds	54,681
	568,419
Public Works Fund, Part II.—
Balance remaining on 31st March, 1894	79,197
Total Public Works Fund	647,616
Lands Improvement Account	250,000
Native Lands Purchase Account.. ..	250,000

Gross total ways and means £1,147,616

APPROPRIATIONS PROPOSED.

The appropriations proposed under these several heads are as follow:—

Public Works Fund, Part I. ..	£ 564,980
Public Works Fund, Part II. ..	75,183
Total Public Works Fund	640,163
Under the Lands Improvement Account	150,000
Under the Native Lands Purchase Account	150,000

Gross total appropriations proposed £940,163

This will leave an unappropriated balance of £7,453 under the Public Works Fund to be carried forward to next year, besides £100,000 each on the Lands Improvement and the Native Lands Purchase Accounts, or a total unappropriated balance of £207,453.

The votes proposed under Part II. nearly absorb the balance of the ways and means standing to the credit of that Part of the Fund, which means that on their expenditure the one million specially raised for the North Island Main Trunk Railway will be practically exhausted. Honourable members will doubtless desire to know how this amount has been expended. The figures are as follow:—

North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan.

Amount of loan	£ 1,000,000
Receipts from lands purchased	7,580
Total	1,007,580

Expenditure.

Survey and construction of North Island Main Trunk Railway	548,911
Purchase of Native lands	220,000
Roads to give access to railway	164,095
Charges and expenses of raising loan	51,788
Departmental expenditure	18,772
Balance unappropriated	4,014

Total 1,007,580

This expenditure has given or will give us 59 miles of finished railway; 12½ miles additional on which the formation-works will be completed, and the rails in process of being laid; 9 miles on which the formation-works will be in an advanced condition; 70 miles of line permanently surveyed; and 65 miles of preliminary survey. It will also give us good coach-roads affording access to the railways at both ends, and leading through the centre of the North Island—namely, from Hunterville to Turangarere and Tokaanu; also from Pipiriki, on the Wanganui River, to Ohakune, Karioi, and Moawhanga; also about 65 miles of road between Stratford and Ongarue, leaving about 40 miles of that road still to be made; besides many miles of minor roads and exploration tracks, and temporary and permanent service roads and bridges. It has also provided us with an estate of 1,137,377 acres of freehold and 129,148 acres of leasehold land, besides other large areas which have been partially acquired.

Total Expenditure to End of 1893-94.

The expenditure on all works and services throughout the colony out of the Public Works Fund up to the 31st March last, including the value of the provincial and the purchase-price of the district railways, has amounted to a total sum of £29,293,451. The principal items are as follow—namely: Railways, £15,806,308; roads, £3,855,455; immigration, £2,145,552; buildings, £1,890,711; purchase of Native lands, £1,297,517; lighthouses, harbour-works, and harbour defences, £906,958; telegraph extension, £679,793; development of goldfields, £572,441; defence-works (general), £429,719; departmental expenditure, £376,162; and cost of and discount on raising loans, £1,026,828.

CO-OPERATIVE SYSTEM.

The co-operative principle of constructing public works continues to give very satisfactory results both to the State and the workmen, and the interest in the matter has also become more widespread.

As time wears on, the advantages claimed for the system of constructing public works on the co-operative principle are being more and more amply verified. As compared with the contract system, a much better class of work has been done, whilst the cost to the colony has been no greater. Another advantage is the power which is left in the hands of the Government to regulate the expenditure on public works. As a case in point, during the months of April, May, June, July, and August, whilst work was available in the settled districts, the Government reduced its expenditure on roads, railways, and other public works. This enabled the settlers to take advantage of the labour that was thus set free, and it removed the complaints which were made in the past that the local bodies and the settlers could not obtain the labour when required.

A very pleasing feature in connection with this matter was the few complaints made by those who were retired from the works, for only in one or two isolated cases did they complain—thus negating once and for all the objection that was taken to the co-operative system by those who asserted that the co-operative men would become a political power, and that pressure would be brought to bear by them to force upon the colony an increased public-works expenditure.

In previous years inquiries were received from the neighbouring colonies in reference to the system, and during last year similar inquiries came from America, while recently the British Government has, through the Agent-General, requested to be furnished with the fullest information with regard to it. An article in explanation of the system has been prepared by the Under-Secretary for Public Works, and will appear in the next issue of "The New Zealand Official Year-book." Copies of this article will be sent to England and elsewhere, and the Government confidently expect to hear of the scheme being largely adopted in the carrying-out of public works in other countries.

The number of men employed under the system during the last twelve months has been as follows:—

Month.	Public Works Department.	Lands Department.	Total.
September, 1893 ..	840	1,115	1,955
October, " ..	829	1,060	1,889
November, " ..	900	1,098	1,998
December, " ..	1,028	1,094	2,122
January, 1894 ..	984	1,042	2,026
February, " ..	981	1,081	2,062
March, " ..	911	951	1,862
April, " ..	744	896	1,640
May, " ..	780	960	1,740
June, " ..	756	1,018	1,774
July, " ..	694	974	1,668
August, " ..	695	1,094	1,789
Average monthly number	845	1,082	1,877

The works on which the men have been employed have been of a very varied character. Almost all classes of railway-work have been carried out under the system, including earth-works, bridges (wood, stone, and iron), culverts (wood and stone), fencing, platelaying, ballasting, supply of sleepers, and the erection of station and other buildings. All sorts of road-works have also been undertaken, and the erection and repair of public buildings have likewise been carried out under it.

The earnings of the men have varied a good deal, according to their capabilities and industry. The total earnings of the co-operative contractors employed under the Public Works Department during the year have been £69,603, and under the Lands Department £88,377, or a total of £157,980 distributed amongst the co-operative contract workmen of the colony.

Mr. Seddon

PUBLIC WORKS LEGISLATION.

The laws relating to public works have, in the Public Works Bill now before Parliament, been carefully revised and consolidated. The new Bill will be found to be a great improvement, both in substance and arrangement, on the Public Works Acts previously existing, and administrative work thereunder will consequently be accomplished with less difficulty in the future by the officers of the Government, as well as by the local authorities working under the Act.

A new Tramways Bill has also been prepared, and is now before Parliament. This Bill has been modelled on the Act at present in force in Victoria, and it is believed that it will be a great improvement on the previous tramway legislation.

An amendment to the Inspection of Machinery Act has also been introduced and passed. Under this Act the administration of this branch of the public service has been formally placed under the Minister for Public Works, who has, as a matter of convenience, been administering the Act for some time past. The Act also provides for drivers of certain classes of engines holding certificates of competency.

DEPARTMENTAL.

In submitting this Statement to Parliament, I think it is due to the valuable departmental officers and engineers and the whole staff to state that they have performed their duties in a most satisfactory manner; and the careful supervision exercised over the expenditure is most commendable. It might appear to those uninitiated in the working of the department that with a smaller expenditure the duties of the staff would be lighter. This is, however, not the case, for with the working of the co-operative system the departmental work, and also the work thrown upon the engineers and overseers, is very much increased.

WORKING RAILWAYS.

The Mangaonoho Section of the North Island Main Trunk Railway and the Mokihinui Extension of the Westport-Ngakawau Railway were handed over to the Railway Commissioners for working in the early part of last financial year, and the fact was mentioned in last year's Public Works Statement. In addition to these lines, the section of the Rotorua Railway between Putaruru and Tarukenga, 23 miles 5 chains in length; the Blenheim to Omaka Section of the Picton-Awatere Railway, 2 miles 43 chains in length; and the Greymouth-Hokitika Railway, 24 miles 37 chains in length, were also handed over to the Commissioners during the latter part of the year. Since the close of the financial year the Hikurangi Extension of the Whangarei-Kamo Railway, 8 miles in length, and the Middlemarch-Hyde Section of the Otago Central Railway, 16 miles 20 chains in length, have also been handed over; and the last section of the line to Rotorua, 8½ miles in length, will, it is hoped, be ready for handing over on the 1st December next.

The policy of the Government since its advent to office has been to complete the unfinished lines, so as to turn unproductive expenditure to profitable account. In pursuance of this policy, no less than 135 miles of railway have been completed and opened for traffic during the three and three-quarter years that the Government has been in office. Of this total length, 61 miles 7 chains were opened during the late financial year.

The amount voted for additions to open lines last year was £18,978, of which amount £9,700 was for additional rolling-stock. Only £8,042 of the total amount was actually expended during the financial year, however, and, of this sum, £8,161 was for rolling-stock. For the current year the Commissioners ask for £46,910, of which £22,175 is for rolling-stock, and £6,000 for the extension and improvement of the Railway Wharf at Port Chalmers. A vote for £40,000 has been provided on the estimates.

A pleasing feature in connection with the increased amount asked for under this vote is the demand for trucks specially fitted for bringing dairy produce to ports for shipment; also an additional supply of trucks specially designed for carrying frozen meat.

The results of last year's working were not equal to those of the previous year. The total receipts during 1892-93 amounted to £1,181,521, against £1,172,792 for 1893-94; and the net profit, after deducting working-expenses, amounted to £497,434 in the latter year against £449,380 in the former—a deficiency of £11,946. This, in the face of an increased capital expenditure of over £400,000, and an increase of sixty-one miles in the length of line worked, cannot be regarded as a very satisfactory result. The percentage return on the total capital invested in the railways also declined from £3 1s. per cent. to £2 17s. 9d. per cent. The shortage in the receipts was doubtless due to the poor harvest, which had the effect of diminishing the tonnage of grain carried as compared with the previous year by 112,446 tons.

STATE CONTROL OF RAILWAYS.

During the late general election the question of the control of the railways engaged public attention from one end of the colony to the other, the majority of the electors being in favour of the Government having sole control. A large section favoured the reconstruction of the Board to provide for a Minister acting with the Commissioners, whilst a few favoured the continuance of the control of the railways by the Railway Commissioners. The demand for a change in the railway administration being so general, the Government considered it advisable to have an infusion of new blood on the Board, and, on the engagement of Messrs. Maxwell and Hannay expiring, Messrs. Ronayne and Scott were appointed to take their place. These appointments were made for a period of nine months only, leaving Parliament untrammelled to decide as to the future management of the railways. In the reappointment of Mr. McKerrow as Chief Commissioner a break in the continuity of the control was avoided. In not reappointing Messrs. Maxwell and Hannay we wish it to be clearly understood that no reflection was intended in regard to their competency as railway experts. The refusal to reappoint them was owing to the fact that the policy which had been pursued in regard to the management of the railways did not meet with general approval, and a change in the personnel of the Commissioners was considered advisable. The law under which they were appointed contemplated that at the end of the engagement of the Commissioners the Government of the day and Parliament should be able to review the position—the non-political control of the railway system being purely experimental. The course adopted has proved beneficial, for, as will be seen by reference to the estimates, a substantial reduction in the cost of working has been made, the railways are being worked efficiently, the general public is satisfied, a slight change in policy has been effected, and a better feeling exists on the part of the railway employes. The passing of the Government Railways Bill of this session will, however, restore the railways to popular control, and the result will, I feel sure, fully justify the change. The lesson taught in the past must be borne in mind, and those who have worked to restore to the people the control of the railways should not forget what led to the Railways Act of 1887 being passed, and under which for six years the Parliament and the people have been subordinated to three irresponsible Commissioners.

Firmness in resisting unreasonable demands for reductions in the tariff will be essential, and fairness and tact in dealing with the employes imperative. It has been urged that concessions can be made in respect to promoting local industries and in the carriage of lime and manures, so as to increase the natural products, and that the reduction made will be more than compensated for by the increased freights.

It has been further urged that by a reduction in excursion rates and passenger-fares the increased number travelling will enlarge the revenue, and that without entailing any material augmentation in the working-expenses. Great responsibility will devolve upon the Minister for Railways, and the greatest caution will require to be exercised, for, whilst it is necessary to bear in mind that the railways have been constructed for the convenience of the travelling public and the promotion of settlement, yet at the same time the question of revenue must not be overlooked, for a serious reduction in the railway revenue would mean additional burdens on the people generally.

In justice to the Railway Commissioners, and in fairness to all concerned, the Government will, on assuming control of the railways, have a thorough examination made alike of the permanent-way, the rolling-stock, and the bridges.

Mr. Seddon

RAILWAYS UNDER CONSTRUCTION.

The several railway-works that have been under construction during the late financial year are as follow :—

Kamo-Kawakawa.

The section of this line between Kamo and Hikurangi, 8 miles in length, was practically completed within the year, and was handed over to the Railway Commissioners for working on the 2nd July last. The expenditure on the line during the year amounted to £8,929, exclusive of the value of permanent-way materials supplied; while liabilities existed at the close of the year to the amount of £5,434 in addition. For the current year it is proposed to ask for a vote of £12,000. A survey has been made of a portion of the proposed extension of this line to Whakapara and Hukerenui. The total length of the proposed extension is 6 miles 35 chains, and it will not be an expensive line to construct. It will open up a large extent of very good land, and it will also tap the far-famed Puhupuhi kauri forest. Owing to a large portion of the valuable kauri bush of this forest having been fired some time ago, it is absolutely necessary that the trees should be felled and utilised without further delay, or they will become valueless. The sale of this timber, and the enhanced value given to the Crown land through which the line will pass, will more than pay for its construction, and the Government therefore proposes to ask Parliament to authorise the work. The vote proposed for this year will provide the greater portion of the funds required for the section to Whakapara.

A very largely-signed petition has been presented to the House this session praying for the construction of the entire line between Kawakawa and Hikurangi, so as to establish a connection between the Kawakawa-Opuā and the Whangarei-Hikurangi Railways. The construction of this connection may become necessary in the future, but we are unable to see our way to propose to do more this session than I have already indicated.

Helensville Northwards.

Practically nothing has been done on this line since my last Statement was delivered, the total expenditure thereon during last financial year having amounted to £329 only. The Makarau Contract is the only work in progress, and on this work the contractors have met with unexpected difficulties in piercing a tunnel. Operations were entirely suspended for a time, but have recently been resumed, and, with the return of fine weather, the contractors will doubtless be able to overcome their difficulties and complete the contract.

The liabilities already existing on account of this railway amount to £8,995, but, as the whole amount is not likely to come in for payment during the current year, a vote of £7,000 is asked for. This also includes a small amount to provide for the commencement of a new section of the line of about three miles in length.

Grahamstown—Te Aroha.

The formation of the twelve miles of this railway between the Ohinemuri River and Te Aroha is finished, and the platelaying and ballasting are now in progress, all the rails and sleepers required for the work being already on the ground. The plans for the bridge over the Ohinemuri River have been completed, and the ironwork ordered from England, and on its arrival in the colony the erection of the bridge will be put in hand under a co-operative contract. The formation of the station-yard at Paeroa will be proceeded with directly the Ohinemuri Bridge has been fairly started. The department hopes to be able to have the whole line between Te Aroha and Paeroa—13 miles 3 chains in length—ready for traffic shortly after the end of the current financial year. The expenditure on this railway last year amounted to £5,489, exclusive of the value of rails and sleepers, and a vote for £13,000 is asked for this year.

Putaruru—Rotorua.

The section of this railway between Putaruru and Tarukenga—23 miles 5 chains in length—was opened for traffic on the 24th November last, thus enabling tourists to easily reach Rotorua from Auckland in one day. The formation and bridge-works between Tarukenga and the Rotorua terminus, a distance of 8½ miles, have also been completed, and contracts let for the platelaying and ballasting, as well as for the necessary station-buildings. The works on both contracts are actively in progress, and it is confidently expected that the line will be ready for traffic all the way to Rotorua by the 1st December next. The expenditure on this line during last financial year was £18,357, while liabilities to the amount of £5,448 existed at the close of the year. We ask for a vote of £17,000, which will complete one of the most necessary and useful railways in the colony.

North Island Main Trunk Railway.

At the northern end of this railway the Mokau Section, 11 miles 9 chains in length, which carries the line up to the Poro-o-tarao Tunnel, has been under construction throughout the year, and is now nearly completed. For the current year we ask for a vote of £25,000 for this end of the line.

This amount will provide for the completion of the formation-works on the Mokau Section, and for commencing the platelaying thereon. It is very desirable that the northern end of this railway should be completed to the junction with the Stratford—Ongarue Road at Kawakawa, so that when this road is finished there may be a direct connection by road and rail between Auckland and Taranaki.

At the south end the Mangaonoho Station has been completed, and a considerable amount of work done on the Makohine Section, the ordinary earthworks on this section being practically finished, and the culverts are now being built and three tunnels excavated. The rails have also been laid as far as the site of the viaduct over the Makohine Ravine, so that the materials for the structure can be transported to the site without difficulty. The plans of the viaduct are nearly ready, and tenders for its construction will be invited shortly.

For this end of the line we also propose an appropriation of £25,000 this year. This will provide for proceeding with the formation-works now in hand, and for making a beginning with the Makohine Viaduct.

The expenditure on the North Island Main Trunk Railway last year, including the cost of surveys, amounted to £39,220, while liabilities existed at the close of the year to the amount of £14,676. The total vote proposed for the current year is £52,778, which, in addition to the works already mentioned, includes an amount of £2,500 for carrying on the surveys.

The surveys which were put in hand on the recommendation of the Select Committee of the House appointed during the session of 1892 have been proceeded with, but I am sorry to say the result has not justified the expenditure. The Urenui route, projected by Mr. Ralph Donkin, has been partially surveyed by that gentleman. Mr. Donkin, with a party of from five to nine men to assist him, was engaged on this work for ten months, and during that period he only succeeded in making a trial survey of eight miles of the line, and a rough traverse of five miles more. The small amount of work accomplished in the time is in itself an evidence of the difficulties met with, and the memorandum on the subject by the Engineer-in-Chief, which has already been laid before Parliament, shows that the line surveyed cannot be regarded as superior in any respect to the Waitara—Mimi line, previously surveyed by Mr. James Blackett, and it is also longer than that line. The results of this survey being so unsatisfactory, instructions were issued in May last for further work thereon to be discontinued.

Mr. R. W. Holmes has made two exploratory surveys with the view of effecting improvements in the central route, but these surveys also have been barren of beneficial results. Mr. Holmes's carefully-prepared and detailed report has already been laid before Parliament, together with the minute of the Engineer-in-Chief thereon, and it is unnecessary for me to say anything further on the subject here. Mr. Holmes is now engaged in permanently locating the line along the central route, on which he finds he is able to effect a number of minor improvements.

Mr. Leslie H. Reynolds has also made careful surveys for the purpose of eliminating the very steep grades at present existing on some parts of the opened line between Marton and Eltham, so as to ascertain the cost of effecting the necessary improvements in that portion of the line in the event of the main line to Auckland being constructed by that route. Mr. Reynolds's report has been laid before Parliament, and shows that some rather extensive deviations from the existing line would be necessary—one of them being 11 miles 68 chains in length, and estimated to cost £128,150. The total length of the deviations required between Marton and Eltham would be about 27½ miles, the total estimated cost of the same being £271,130.

Eketahuna—Woodville.

The early completion of this railway is very desirable, as when completed it promises to be one of the best-paying lines in the colony. During the year the works have made considerable progress, the bulk of the earthwork being now completed. The concrete piers of the Makakahi Bridge have also been built, and the iron girders, for which a contract was let some months ago, will shortly be placed in position. A contract has also been let for the large bridge over the Mangatainoko River, and the platelaying to the site of this bridge is about to be commenced. The expenditure on the line during last year amounted to £16,716, while liabilities existed at the close of the year to the amount of £7,887, and further liabilities to the amount of £22,160 have since been incurred. We ask this year for a vote of £40,000, which will cover the large liabilities existing, and provide for the completion of nearly all the formation-works on the line, as well as for the platelaying as far as the Mangatainoko Bridge.

Blenheim—Awatere.

The small amount of work done on this line was merely for the purpose of putting the formation-works on the Utawai and Dashwood Sections into a state of repair, and for the purpose of preventing, as far as possible, damage to the works by flood-waters, &c. The amount expended was £1,224, and liabilities existed at the close of the year to the further amount of £772. We ask this year for a vote of £2,500 to cover these liabilities, and to provide for necessary expenditure in connection with the line.

Westport—Ngakawau—Mokihinui.

The last section of this railway was completed and handed over to the Railway Commissioners in August, 1893. This section established through-communication between the Mokihinui Coal Company's railway and Westport, and since it has been opened has had the effect of considerably increasing the output of coal from the mines in the Mokihinui basin. The increase would have been much larger, however, but for an unfortunate dispute as to the rates of haulage of coal over the company's line, which has had the effect of temporarily closing the mines of the Westport Cardiff Coal Company. As a means of effectually settling this dispute, and of preventing any others of a like character arising in the future, a Bill will be introduced empowering the Government, after a careful valuation has been made, to purchase the company's railway for a sum not exceeding £18,000. The Bill will provide for the payment of the purchase-money out of the funds of the Westport Harbour Board, and for endowing that Board with the profits on the working of the line.

Mr. Seddon

Greymouth—Hokitika.

The whole of this railway, 24 miles 37 chains in length, was handed over to the Railway Commissioners, and opened for regular public traffic, on the 20th December, 1893. A good deal of work remained to be done to the stations, however, and this has since been in hand, and is not yet quite completed. The expenditure on the line last year amounted to £10,894, while liabilities existed at the close of the year to the amount of £8,619, and further liabilities to the amount of £4,343 have since been incurred. The vote asked for this year—£15,000—will cover these liabilities, and the few remaining works required to complete the railway. The returns in connection with the working of this railway effectually disprove the statement made that when completed it would not pay working-expenses.

Otago Central.

The works on this railway have been very vigorously proceeded with throughout the year. Nearly three hundred men were employed upon the line at one time, and an average of about two hundred have been at work for the whole year. The section between Middlemarsh and the Rock and Pillar Station, 8 miles in length, was opened for traffic on the 1st May last, and the section between Rock and Pillar and Hyde, 8 miles 20 chains in length, was also handed over and opened on the 24th of the same month. The formation-works on the Hyde-Kyeburn Section were commenced in June last year, and good progress has been made therewith for a distance of about 4½ miles. The next workable section of this railway will be the portion between Hyde and Ryan's Crossing, 10 miles 30 chains in length, and considerable further work is now being put in hand, including the construction of the tunnel, and the masonry culverts and abutments of bridges, with the view of completing the line to that point.

The expenditure on the line last year, exclusive of the value of the permanent-way materials supplied, was £33,061, and was by far the largest expenditure on any railway-works in the colony, with the single exception of the North Island Main Trunk Railway. If the value of the permanent-way material supplied is added the total expenditure would amount to £46,872. The liabilities existing at the close of the year amounted to £11,261, while further works, entailing a liability of £15,134, have since been authorised. We ask for a vote of £45,000 for the line this year. This will cover all the liabilities, and will provide for the work being rapidly pushed on with.

As a great deal of misconception seems to exist in some quarters on the subject of the amounts specifically borrowed for and allocated to this railway, I have thought it desirable to have the following statement prepared, showing the amounts specially borrowed for the Otago Central Railway, and the amount expended thereon up to the 31st March last:—

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY.
Allocations out of Loans.

	£	s.	d.
Under "The New Zealand Loan Act, 1882,"—
Construction, permanent-way, &c....	300,000	0	0
Under "The New Zealand Loan Act, 1886,"—
Construction	£140,000	0	0
Permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock	60,000	0	0
	200,000	0	0
Under "The New Zealand Loan Act, 1893,"—
Construction	£85,000	0	0
Permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock	20,000	0	0
	105,000	0	0
	605,000	0	0
Expenditure in excess of allocation ...	32,273	0	0
Total	£637,273	0	0

Expenditure.

	£	s.	d.
Total expenditure on Otago Central Railway for construction, permanent-way, and sleepers to 31st March, 1894 (as per Table 3, Public Works Statement, 1894)	621,7	0	0
Add rolling-stock provided, and charged to separate vote	15,504	0	0
Total	£637,273	0	0

The amounts shown in this table as allocations for permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock were not specially allocated to this railway under any Act, but are the proportions of the total allocations for permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock in the different Acts which are fairly due to the Otago Central Railway on a mileage basis. These figures show that not only have the total funds allocated to this railway been actually expended thereon, but a sum of £32,273, taken from other sources, has been expended in addition.

Callin's River Railway.

The works on this railway were at a standstill when the last Public Works Statement was made. They were, however, resumed in November last, and have been pushed along steadily since that date. The work in hand comprises the formation of the line for a distance of about four and a half miles, which will complete the railway to Owaka (Vial's). The expenditure during the last financial year amounted to £1,338 only, but liabilities existed at the close of the year to the amount of £900, and further liabilities to the amount of £5,134 have been incurred since. A vote of £10,000 is asked for this year, which will provide the bulk of the funds required to complete the line to Owaka.

Seaward Bush Railway.

The formation of this railway has been completed as far as the Maitara Swamp, the rails laid, and the ballasting is now in progress. The line is expected to be ready for opening to the Gorge Road in December next. Borings have been made to test the foundations for the bridge over the Maitara River, and plans of the bridge are being prepared, and tenders for its erection will be invited shortly. The expenditure on this line last year, exclusive of the value of permanent-way materials supplied, was £5,042, while liabilities existed at the close of the year to the amount of £2,735, and further liabilities to the amount of £6,815 have since been incurred. The vote proposed for the current year is £15,000.

Other Projected Railways.

Riversdale-Switzer's.—A petition presented to Parliament this session by the member for Wakatipu prayed for the completion of this railway. About two miles of the line was completed several years ago, and the formation-works executed on a further length of six miles, the total expenditure on the work having amounted to about £7,500. The completion of the line as far as Muddy Creek would not be a very expensive undertaking, the principal obstacle in the way being the bridge over the Maitara River, which is estimated to cost £7,500. The Government is not able to propose any appropriation for this line this year, but during the recess the question of resuming its construction will receive careful consideration.

Waipahi-Heriot Extension.—Two petitions have been presented praying for the extension of this railway to Roxburgh. The Government has no information in its possession as to the probable cost of the line, as no survey has yet been made. A survey will be undertaken during the recess, however, so that full information may be available by the next meeting of Parliament.

Gore-Kelso.—The desirableness of constructing this railway has been strongly urged upon the Government recently. The line was projected several years ago, and partly surveyed. It would be about twenty-four miles in length, and would probably cost about £85,000. The country which it would traverse is of the very best quality, and would doubtless yield a considerable traffic, so that the line would probably pay. The question of undertaking the construction of this railway will be considered during the recess.

Kingston-Frankton.—A petition was presented to Parliament last session urging the construction of the extension of the Invercargill-Kingston Railway to Frankton, and further representations on the subject have since been made to the Government by the local authorities of the district. This extension would, however, be a very expensive one to construct, as for many miles it would traverse the eastern shore of Lake Wakatipu. The line would, moreover, have to compete with water-carriage on the lake; and the country between Kingston and Queenstown, being very mountainous, would yield little or no traffic. I am therefore unable to hold out any hopes of the Government being able to take the construction of this work in hand at present.

Summary.

The total appropriations proposed for railway-works this year, including additions to open lines, surveys, and permanent-way, sleepers and rolling-stock, amount to £313,028, as against £316,628 voted last year. The amount proposed to be voted this year is the smallest appropriation asked for for railway purposes since the public-works scheme was initiated.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.

The section of this railway between Lake Brunner and Jackson's, which was in progress when my last Public Works Statement was delivered, has since been completed and opened for traffic. This brings this company's total length of completed railway up to 75 miles 50 chains.

The acceptance by the company of the recommendations contained in the report of the Select Committee appointed during the present session to inquire into matters affecting this railway will, it is hoped, lead to a speedy and vigorous resumption of work on the line. The intervening section between Jackson's and Paterson's Creek, which still remains to be constructed, is 57 miles 44 chains long, and the company hopes to be able to complete it within four years from the date of signing the new contract. The completion of this section will establish through railway-communication between the east and west coasts of the Middle Island, a boon long looked for, which, when realised, will to some extent compensate for the way in which settlement has been retarded owing to the locking-up of the lands on the West Coast for the last ten years. By the proposed new contract the company is to complete the line from Belgrove to Norris's Gully. This will tap the Motueka Valley, and shorten somewhat the journey to Reefton. The abandonment, however, of the construction of the Reefton-Belgrove Section for a time is a matter for deep regret, and that this should be resented by the people of Nelson is only natural, seeing that for ten years settlement has been retarded, and the expectant hopes of an early connection by railway with Reefton have now been somewhat suddenly shattered. The Government strongly sympathizes with the Nelson people in their disappointment, and, but for the impossibility of arranging with the company on any other terms, would not have agreed to the abandonment of this portion of the company's original contract.

ROADS.

Roads controlled by the Minister of Lands.

Under the head of "Main Roads" £23,039 was voted last year, and £22,235 spent, with liabilities at the end of the year of £9,242. For "Miscellaneous roads and roads to open up Crown lands" £148,287 was authorised, including £90,000 from the Government Loans to Local Bodies Account, and £88,042 spent, while liabilities amounting to £87,381 were outstanding at the end of the year. For grants-in-aid £11,663 was voted and £8,951 spent, with liabilities at the end of the year of £3,389. Village settlements: Voted, £3,380; spent, £2,898; liabilities, £1,480. And, finally—Roads to give access to Marton-Tē Awamutu

Mr. Seddon

Railway: Voted, £40,800; spent, £35,155; liabilities, £14,191.

The following summary shows the road-works performed during the year:—

Dray-roads constructed ..	296 miles.
Dray-roads improved ..	223 "
Dray-roads maintained ..	1,215 "
Bridle-roads constructed ..	238 "
Bridle-roads improved ..	155 "
Bridle-roads maintained ..	405 "

The roads from Hunterville to Murimotu and Tokaanu, and from Pipiriki (at the head of the steamer navigation of the Wanganui River), viâ Karioi, to Moawhanga, have been formed throughout, but not wholly metalled.

The Stratford-Ongarue Road has been formed for 31½ miles from the Stratford end, and for about 16 miles from the Ongarue end: leaving about 57 miles to complete the connection with Auckland.

The main road from the Catlin's River to the Waikawa River, through the Tautuku Forest, has advanced so far that only a bridge over the Tautuku River remains to complete the whole distance of thirty-four miles. The large area of forest-land which will no doubt be settled upon, and the produce from which must pass over this main road, will fully justify its construction.

Of roads through Crown lands, and roads to give access to them through settled districts, 1,402 miles were constructed and maintained last year. These roads are essential to advancing settlement. Without them the Crown lands would be almost valueless. They must be continued if the land is to be made use of.

The several works which are proposed to be undertaken during the current year are detailed in the estimates which accompany this Statement.

The cost of constructing and maintaining main roads during the past year was about £10,000 more than in the previous year; and for the current year the expenditure is estimated at a still higher rate.

It must be evident to those who have travelled over the principal main roads and bridges of the colony—which are wholly or partly maintained at the expense of the County Councils—that they are fast falling into disrepair; and as it would be false economy to permit such works, constructed at great expense, to get into such a state as to require further large expenditure to restore them, it is proposed in some cases to entirely take over control, and in other cases to assist the counties. It is abundantly evident that many of the local authorities are financially unable to bear the burden of the cost of maintaining such roads as carry the through traffic of the colony, especially in parts where no rates can be collected.

For main roads the large sum of £40,000 is asked for, in order to execute the works detailed, and which works the local authorities are unable to provide.

The provision made for miscellaneous roads amounts to £20,000. These roads are mainly for the convenience of settlers who have in years gone by acquired lands from the Crown, but who are not yet provided with reasonable means of access to their properties. A few of the works are for the convenience of tourists, and others are such as should reasonably be provided for.

The sum of £20,605 is required for roads to give access to the North Island Main Trunk Railway. The principal work to be undertaken is a further length of the Stratford-Ongarue Road, to connect Auckland with Taranaki. The other sums applied for are to metal the Pipiriki-Karioi Road and a portion of the Hunterville-Tokaanu Road, and to open further tracks into the Crown lands adjacent to the railway-line.

Out of the Lands Improvement Account it is proposed to expend £150,000 in the construction of roads and tracks to open up Crown lands. This, as already stated, is of prime importance to the further settlement of the country.

Under the heading "Grants-in-aid" there are three items which call for some notice. These are—(1) Co-operative works for unemployed, £5,000; (2) improved farm settlements, £20,000; and (3) advances to co-operative workmen, £500. The first is intended to meet unforeseen demands for employment, and for works the necessity for which may arise during the year. The second is to provide means to pay for the felling, burning, and grassing of Crown lands in moderate areas, suitable for working-men of small means. In this way a start will be given to the farmer, and the Government will receive interest, in the way of rent, on the improved value of the land let. The third item is to enable the Government to make small advances to co-operative workmen employed on the construction of roads through Crown lands, to enable them to bring their families on to the works and out of the cities, where they are paying rent. The advances will be refundable out of the men's earnings. It is proposed to lease to men who desire it a small area around each dwelling.

The roads which it is proposed to construct out of the Land-purchase Account will probably absorb £40,000 during the current year. This amount will be used in the laying-out of permanent roads, and the construction of tracks to show how best to subdivide and settle newly-acquired lands.

It is proposed to obtain under the Government Loans to Local Bodies Act the full amount of £50,000 which the Act authorises. The land upon which this sum will be expended has been placed in the market, or disposed of, loaded with sums sufficient to pay interest and sinking fund, in accordance with regulations made under the Act.

It has often been said by persons in whose district no railway works were under construction that the Government was expending too much money on railways and too little on roads. I have therefore had a statement prepared showing the amounts voted for and expended on roads and railways respectively during the last five years, which I think will show that, whatever blame may attach to former Governments in this respect, no such charge can be laid at the door of the present Government:—

Work.	1890-91.	1891-92.	1892-93.	1893-94.	1894-95.
Amounts voted.
Railways ...	£ 362,919	£ 490,276	£ 369,755	£ 316,628	£ 313,028
Roads ...	181,119	204,464	231,193	244,169	316,060
Amounts expended.
Railways ...	179,012	154,416	220,894	176,256	...
Roads ...	71,683	109,710	135,359	177,667	...

This table shows that, while the amounts voted for railways have generally declined during recent years, the amounts voted for roads have steadily increased. The same also applies to the expenditure, the expenditure on railways having been greater in 1890-91 than in 1893-94, whereas the roads expenditure in the former year was less than half the amount expended in the latter.

Roads on Goldfields (Mines Department).

The expenditure authorised under the above head last year amounted to £47,000. The amount, however, included some items that do not properly come under the head of "Roads," and which this year are provided for under "Development of Goldfields." It was not practicable to expend the whole amount voted within the year, the net expenditure to the 31st March last having amounted to £20,387 only; but liabilities existed at the same date to the further amount of £20,081.

The opening-up of roads and tracks upon our goldfields, especially for prospecting purposes, is admitted on all hands to be of the utmost importance as an avenue whereby the mining industry may be advanced and the hidden wealth of the colony developed. We therefore propose a vote of £45,455 for works of this class this year.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The total appropriations for public buildings and domains last year was £143,375—namely, £92,485 under the Public Works Fund, and £50,890 under the Consolidated Fund. The actual expenditure within the year amounted to £92,021—namely, £44,082 under the Public Works Fund, and £47,939 under the Consolidated Fund.

Under the Consolidated Fund the sum of £30,999 was expended on school-buildings, the remainder of the expenditure under that fund being almost entirely for maintenance and repairs.

The principal works carried out under the Public Works Fund were—the new lunatic asylum at Porirua, and more or less extensive works at the asylums at Auckland, Sunnyside (Christchurch), and Seacliff (Dunedin); additions to the post-office at Invercargill; new post-offices at Danevirke and Kaikoura; new Customhouse at Westport; new Courthouse at Rangiora; purchase of site for a new Court-house at Pahiatua; and new police-stations at Dargaville, Westport, Greymouth, and Naseby. An amount of £15,000 was also provided out of this fund for school-buildings, to supplement the vote under the Consolidated Fund.

The total appropriations proposed for public buildings this year amount to £159,925—namely, £50,500 under the Consolidated Fund and £109,425 under the Public Works Fund. The Consolidated Fund vote provides £31,000 for school-buildings, and the usual votes for maintenance and repairs of public buildings generally. Under the Public Works Fund provision is made for the new laundry and other works at the Sunnyside Asylum; for sundry works at the asylums at Auckland, Seacliff, and elsewhere; for a new prison at Dunedin; for completing the Government Printing Office, and for sundry works at the Parliamentary Buildings; and new Courthouses, police-stations, post-offices, &c., at numerous places throughout the colony. A vote of £15,000 is also proposed for school-buildings—the same as last year.

MISCELLANEOUS CHARGES ON THE PUBLIC WORKS FUND.

Lighthouses and Harbour-works.

The vote for the various works under the above heading last year amounted to £7,400, and the expenditure brought to charge within the year was £6,588—namely, £2,612 on lighthouses, and £3,976 on harbour defences. The lighthouse expenditure was wholly on the new light on Stephen Island (Cook Strait), which was completed within the year, the light having been regularly exhibited since the 29th January last.

The expenditure on harbour defences at the different ports was as follows:—

Auckland	£	897
Wellington	£	2,251
Lyttelton	£	647
Dunedin	£	181
Total	£	3,976

The vote proposed for the current year is £13,500—namely, £3,500 for sundry harbour-works and towards the erection of a wharf at Howick, and £10,000 for further works under the head of "Harbour Defences."

It is intended during the current year to push on with the defences of the four principal ports. The first in importance are those at Wellington, and next those at Lyttelton, and after these those at Auckland and Dunedin respectively. The works will be carried out on the suggestions of the Military Adviser of the Government, and in accordance with the recommendations of the recent conference on the subject of our defences.

Purchase of Native Lands.

The operations of the Native Land Purchase Department since the passing of "The Native Land Purchases Act, 1892," have been carried on out of funds raised under the provisions of that Act.

Mr. Seddon

During the year ended the 31st March last the area added to the public estate through purchases finally completed was 345,850 acres, including the bulk of the better portions of the Awarua Block—in all, 143,000 acres—and the Ngaere Swamp, 7,500 acres. Settlement is now rapidly proceeding on these lands.

Full details as to completed and uncompleted negotiations will be found in the return G.-3, 1894, presented to Parliament on the 12th July last. Considerable progress since the date of the above return has been made with the purchase of the balance of the Awarua Block and other lands in various parts of the North Island, especially in the Waipatu district and the King-country.

The further provision made by the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Act this session for the purchase of Native lands must result in a commensurate impetus to bonâ fide settlement in the North Island.

Development of Goldfields.

A vote of £5,000 was taken last year for waterworks on goldfields, and rather more than that amount was spent, the actual expenditure having amounted to £5,272.

Further works in the shape of water-races and reservoirs are necessary in order to command the auriferous drifts, of which we have such large areas in the Middle Island, and which can only be profitably worked by hydraulic sluicing on a large scale. We therefore ask this year for a vote of £10,000 for water-races.

The introduction of hydraulic sluicing in the alluvial mining centres has rendered it necessary to make provision for the large quantity of tailings and débris which must find their way into the ordinary watercourses, sometimes raising the beds of these streams to such an extent as to injure the occupiers of low-lying lands adjacent thereto. It would be suicidal to allow the stoppage of mining operations in such places, and provision is therefore made in the estimates for meeting some of the cases which most urgently require to be dealt with.

For many years past our mining population has been demanding that provision should be made for testing auriferous lodes at deeper levels than hitherto worked in our quartz-mining centres. Hopes have also been held out by various Governments that some assistance in this direction would be granted. The vote proposed for prospecting deep levels, for dealing with the tailings difficulty, and to provide for resumption of land for mining purposes, is £30,000.

Telegraph Extension.

The amount voted under this head last year was £30,078, but the expenditure coming to charge within the year amounted to £16,137 only (including £4,559 on the telephone exchanges), but liabilities existed at the close of the year to the amount of £9,581.

The most important new lines of telegraph constructed during the year were those from Matakana to Leigh, the line to Tokatoka, Otaki to Shannon, extension to Peel Forest, Owaka to Ratanui, Middlemarch to Hyde, Winton to Brown's Siding and Hokonui, the Island Block line, and Riversdale to Waikaka.

The vote proposed for the current year is £31,000, which, in addition to covering the liabilities, provides for a new cable across Cook Strait; for additions to existing telephone exchanges; the construction of telephone-lines from Ross to Hende's Ferry, Culverden to Hamner Plain, and others; and for improvements and additions to existing telegraph-lines.

CONCLUSION.

The total appropriations proposed in the estimates accompanying this Statement amount to £940,163, as compared with £710,460 voted last year. If the proposed expenditure is not distributed over the whole colony in exactly even proportion, honourable members will perceive that the reason for this is the great and pressing need of those localities where settlement is proceeding most rapidly. The utmost efforts have been made to deal fairly with every district, and each district's special needs and claims have received most careful consideration.

SITTING OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the House, at its rising, adjourn till half-past eleven to-morrow. The House divided.

AYES, 31.

Buddo	Lawry	Pinkerton
Button	Massey	Reeves
Carnell	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Collins	McLachlan	Smith, E. M.
Graham	Meredith	Stevens
Guinness	Millar	Stout
Hall	Mills	Ward.
Harris	Mitchelson
Houston	Montgomery	Tellers.
Lang	Morrison	Kelly, J. W.
Larnach	Parata	O'Regan.

NOES, 29.

Buick	Heke	McNab
Carncross	Hogg	Pirani
Crowther	Hutchison, G.	Russell, G. W.
Duncan	Hutchison, W.	Russell, W. R.
Duthie	Joyce	Tanner
Earnshaw	Kelly, W.	Thompson
Flatman	Mackintosh	Wilson.
Fraser	Maslin	Tellers.
Green	McGowan	Allen
Hall-Jones	McGuire	Buchanan.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mackenzie, T.
Carroll.	Te Ao.

Majority for, 2.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the Legislative Council, stating that it had passed the Government Advances to Settlers Bill with amendments, and requesting the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

